1773) were determined to eradicate the "sect" altogether. Mainly one Father Delphini became of evil repute among the Brethren for his activities. Emigration (to Russia) was the only way out. The same enforced conversion to Catholicism happened also in Slovakia (then Hungary) during the time of Maria Theresa. In the 1750's and 1760's children were taken away, men were imprisoned, books were confiscated, until finally the backbone of these brethren was broken. Those who turned Catholic are now known as "Habaner" (q.v.). Even the last Hapsburg ruler to be considered in this rapid survey, Emperor Joseph II (q.v.), 1780-90, famous in history as an "enlightened despot," and rather indifferent to religion, was in no way better than his forerunners with respect to things Anabaptist. The Klein-Geschichtsbuch reports an interview of the Emperor with a Hutterite brother (of Carinthian descent) in which the question of the property of the transmigrants was discussed. Joseph refused to yield, and the brethren lost everything that had once been theirs.

However, there is at least one positive note in this theme of Hapsburg's attitude toward radical Christians. In 1775, at the first partition of Poland, Maria Theresa received a large area of territory, partly Polish, partly Ukrainian, called Klein Polen or Galicia (q.v.). Since it was then but sparsely populated, Joseph II issued a special patent or decree to stimulate colonization of this country. This enabled Mennonites from the Palatinate to migrate to this eastern country and to settle in the vicinity of Lemberg (1784). Their thriving colonies existed there up to World War II (see Ferdinand I, Maximilian II, and Leopold I). R.F.

W. Wiswedel, "Kurze Charakteristik etlicher Herrscher Oesterreichs hinsichtlich ihrer Stellung zum Täufertum," in Der Sendbote (Cleveland) 1937, 191; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch; ML II, 217 f.

Harbin (Manchuria) Refugees. In the early 1920's a settlement of Mennonites from West Siberia was established along the Amur River in Far Eastern Russia on the border of Manchuria, hoping for better living conditions and more freedom from Communist oppression. After a few years, however, the group decided to flee from Russia and in the middle of winter crossed the Amur into Manchuria and finally reached Harbin. Here through a Mennonite physician, J. J. Isaac (d. 1956 at Vallejo, Cal., having reached the United States in 1952), they made contact with Mennonite relief organizations in Europe and the United States. Given German passports, some 200 were admitted to the United States in the spring of 1930, most of them settling in the Reedley area of California. A small settlement made in Eastern Washington near Roseo failed. H. P. Krehbiel was active in assisting the Harbin movement to California and Washington.

The remainder of the Harbin refugees were finally moved to Paraguay and Brazil in 1932, with the aid of the Nansen International Office for Refugees under the sponsorship of the League of Nations, and a loan from the Protestant Aid Office, headquarters in Geneva, Switzerland, and the Mennonite Central Committee. The first group of 373 Mennonites was settled in Fernheim Colony, Paraguay, in the "Harbin Corner," while 397 Lutherans were settled in Brazil. In 1934, 180 Mennonites were settled in Brazil, also 100 others. H.S.B.

A. Loewen and A. Friesen, Die Flucht über den Amur (Steinbach, 1946); W. Quiring, Russlanddeutsche suchen eine Heimat (Karlsruhe, 1938).

Harde Vriezen (Friezen), also called Oude Vriezen, a branch of the Mennonites in the Netherlands: see Frisian Mennonites.

Hardelop (Hardloop, Hardeloep, Harrloop, Harloop, Harrlop) is a Mennonite family name in Eiderstedt, Stapelholm, and Hamburg. Gerrit Hardelop was received by baptism at Glückstadt in 1634, by the elder of the Friedrichstadt Flemish Church. Jacob and Jan Hardelop, without doubt brothers, members of the High German congregation, lived in Witzwort. The former carried on a thriving export trade in cheese, bacon, and wool with Hamburg and other towns in 1658 and after.

Claas Hardelop lived in the Süderstapel parish, Stapelholm district. In 1683 the officials of the church and school demanded of the Anabaptists living in the parish the same fees as the Lutherans paid. As spokesman for the group Hardelop appealed to Duke Christian Albrecht; orders were then given that the Anabaptists should not be burdened but protected in coming there.

Johann Hardelop was a deacon of the Flemish congregation in Hamburg. Jacob Hardelop in the Groothusenkoog of Eiderstedt was one of the very few Mennonites to hold public office; in 1736-44 he was "overseer of the beach"; his oath of office was a "Christian yea and nay." The Hardelop family was probably lost to the church through marriage. At any rate it is no longer found in the Friedrichstadt church books after 1700.

About 1675 Pieter Ariaens Hardloop and a group of members of the Waterlander congregation of Wormerveer, Dutch province of North Holland, insisted on a more conservative policy in maintaining the confessions and accused the church board of Socinianism (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 900-5; ML II, 252.) R.Do.

Hardenberg (Ritzes), Albert (1510-74), a Reformed theologian, born at Hardenberg, Dutch province of Overijssel, was educated at the Aduard Monastery near Groningen and Louvain, Belgium. After some time at Wittenberg he went to the Archbishopric of Cologne to help Hermann von Wied with the Reformation (1544). It was during the same time that Menno (q.v.) Simons worked in this area. John a Lasco, a friend of Hardenberg's, stopped here twice during this time. They corresponded about Menno's activities. Hardenberg also wrote to Vadian about Menno's successful work in this area. No doubt Hardenberg was also in touch with the Mennonites during his activities at Emden, where he served as a minister from 1567 until his death on May 18, 1574.

Of interest is what Hardenberg says about Menno: "One who has had stupid teachers during his studies hardly teaches with understanding. Those who have left monasteries without study and without correct understanding or are self-taught have done much damage to the church. Such a one is a certain Menno Simons, whom I knew as a rural priest, who after reading fanatical books indiscriminately and taking the Bible into his hands without judgment and formal education has done much harm among the Frisians, Belgians, Menapiers, Saxons, Cymbrians, over all Germany, France, Britain, and all surrounding countries, so that posterity will not be able to shed sufficient tears on this account." C.K.

"Hardenberg (Albertus Rizaeus of Ritzes)," Biogr. Wb. III, 504; Bernhard Spiegel, D. Albert Rizaeus Hardenberg (Bremen, 1869) 117; C. Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936) 59, 62 ff.

Harder (Haerder) is a common Mennonite name of Prussian background. The Danzig church record first lists the name in 1677. It also appeared in the records of the Mennonite churches of Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Fürstenwerder, and Heubuden. In 1940 it took the eighth place as to frequency of Mennonite names in East Germany, having a total of 184 bearers. From Prussia the name was transplanted to Russia, the United States, Canada, and South America.

Who's Who Among the Mennonites (1943) lists B. W. Harder, minister; H. N. Harder, minister; and M. S. Harder, professor at Bethel College. See also names of the numerous outstanding representatives of the name below. M.S.H.

Reimer, Familiennamen, 109; Franz Crous, "Mennonitenfamilien in Zahlen," Gesch.-Bl., August 1940, p. 41.

Harder, Abraham A. (1866- ?), the founder of the Mennonite orphanage at Grossweide, Molotschna Mennonite settlement of South Russia, was born Sept. 29, 1866, at Hierschau, Gnadenfeld district, the son of Abraham Johann Harder, who was a teacher in the village school. After he had completed his schooling, his parents moved to a farm at Alexanderwohl. He was baptized after catechetical instruction when he was about 21 years old and joined the Alexanderwohl Church, of which his father was a preacher.

When Mennonites began to settle in the Crimea, Abraham A. Harder joined the movement, settling at Neu-Toksaba, about 27 miles from the seaport Evpatoriya. Here Harder and his wife were rebaptized by immersion and joined the Mennonite Brethren Church at Spat, Crimea, near Simferopol, but about 1900 moved back to the Molotschna settlement, making his home at Rosenort. Following an inner call to care for Mennonite orphans Harder used the proceeds from the sale of his farm in the Crimea to buy a house in Grossweide, which he turned into an orphanage in 1906. In later years a large modern school building with a boys' dormitory was added. Many Mennonite orphans educated here became valuable citizens of Mennonite communities. The orphanage, however, was taken over by the Communists after the Revolution. Mrs. Harder died in an underground hut at Spat, where she and her husband had fled to escape the terror of the Communists. Harder was still living in Tchongrav, Crimea, during World War II and is thought to have been exiled with many others to Central Asia when the German army invaded Russia, but has not been heard of since then. (ML II, 252 f.) Er.H.

Harder, Bernhard (1832-84), an outstanding Mennonite minister, teacher, and poet of the Molotschna, Russia, was born March 25, 1832, the eighth son of Abraham Harder and his wife Marie Heide Harder (according to Friesen, 743, nee Berg). His mother made an ineradicable impression on him. He lost his father at the age of 12.

Early in his childhood Harder felt called to teach and preach. He was accepted as a pupil at the age of ten in the newly established Halbstadt Zentralschule, from which he graduated after six years. For a while he served as secretary of the Gebietsamt (county seat). Finally his heart's desire was fulfilled and he became a teacher, serving in the elementary schools of Yuschanlee, Halbstadt, Blumstein, Friedensruh, and Alexanderwohl. During his teaching career he was chosen minister by the Ohrloff-Halbstadt Mennonite Church (q.v.) at Christmas 1860. Friesen (Brüderschaft, 744) states that he accepted this call "not with fear, tears, and complaint, taking upon himself the 'heavy office and cross' as it was customary at that time, but with rejoicing and tremendous energy he became a servant of his Saviour." For 15 years he combined the offices of teaching and ministry and the care of a large family.

On March 16, 1854, Harder married Katharina Boschmann. They had eleven children, four of whom preceded him in death. His wife died Oct. 13, 1878; he married Helena Ewert on Feb. 13, 1879. Three daughters were born to them.

He had already "given his heart to the Lord" when he attended the Zentralschule (Friesen, 744). His son Gerhard states, "After four years of teaching, the Lord succeeded in making of him His disciple. This happened at Blumstein where Elder Johann Harder lived" (Harder, XI). A. Harder's preaching was revolutionary, inspiring, and most successful. He broke with the tradition prevalent among the Mennonites of Russia of reading a sermon from a manuscript. His ideals were Elder B. Fast (q.v.), Halbstadt, Ludwig Hofacker, and Eduard Wüst (q.v.), who influenced Harder's spiritual awakening and activities greatly. He had been one of Wüst's listeners and admirers since 1850. With great zeal and a thundering voice Harder opposed everything he thought to be ungodly, but most of all he protested against formalism which threatened the very life of the church. He was motivated by an ardent love for the Saviour and for lost sinners, trying "to reach the hearer through eye and ear." When he preached he preached with his entire being. His live enthusiasm and clear convictions made his sermons particularly effective. Untiringly he preached from various pulpits and as an evangelist in numerous settlements and villages.

Friesen says, "Multitudes of people who found salvation through Harder could not understand how he could criticize his church so severely without leaving it" (as many did who joined the Mennonite Brethren). Harder did more than anyone else during the second half of the past century to revive the spiritual life of the Mennonites in Russia and to prevent unbalanced and unsound elements from taking advantage of the situation. He was the greatest evangelist and pulpit orator the Mennonites of Russia produced. His son Gerhard says, "Had Harder, with his great love and zeal to win souls for the Lord, had the same measure of gift to evaluate situations and people and had he had more emotional stability and pedagogical wisdom, his work in church and school would have been even more blessed" than was now the case. The fact that he was strongly evangelistic and defended the sound practices of the newly organized Mennonite Brethren Church caused criticism by representatives of the Mennonite Church. On the other hand, the Mennonite Brethren criticized him because he did not join them. He visited numerous meetings of the Mennonite Brethren and reported his impressions, some of which were published (Menn. Bl., February 1863, 15 ff.). His strength and contribution lie in the fact that he followed an independent, warmly evangelistic course within the entire brotherhood, aiming to lift its spiritual and cultural aspects, thus making a singular contribution comparable to that of Johann Cornies in the economic realm.

In 1872 Harder discontinued teaching and spent three years as traveling evangelist, in which capacity he was supported by a group of friends. After this term he taught again for three years at Alexanderwohl. In 1879-80 he served as secretary of the Gebietsamt at Halbstadt, after which he taught Bible for one year at the Zentralschule at Halbstadt. The last three years of his life he again devoted entirely to his task as traveling evangelist (Reiseprediger), being again supported by a group of friends. Four months of each year he worked in his home congregation at Halbstadt.

From his early youth Harder showed poetic inclinations, which increased in maturity. He composed many poems for special occasions; many of them were collected and edited by Heinrich Franz, Sr., and published in 1888 under the title Geistliche Lieder und Gelegenheitsgedichte, with 584 songs (Part I) and 539 poems for various occasions (Part II). The book contains a valuable biography of the author written by his son, Gerhard (VIII-XXIV). Another son, Peter B. Harder, selected and edited from this collection 213 songs which were published by J. Friesen under the title Kleines Liederbuch. Geistliche Gelegenheitslieder (1902). Thus Harder was also a pioneer in the realm of the literary activities among the Mennonites of Russia.

In addition to the many trips as a traveling evangelist Harder was also called upon to represent various Mennonite causes and groups. In 1867 he was sent to Petersburg to investigate settlement possibilities in Turkestan. Again in 1882 he made the same trip. In 1879 he was twice sent to Odessa to interview von Totleben regarding Mennonite alternative service. He also visited the Mennonites in the Volga region in 1868 and in Prussia in 1873. On Sept. 27, 1884, he returned from a journey to Zagradovka, ill with pneumonia. He had preached strenuously four times daily. On Oct. 1, 1884, he died.† C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 211 ff., 743-54; G. Harder, "Mittheilungen aus dem Lebensgange des Verfassers," in B. Harder, Geistliche Lieder (Hamburg, 1888, VIII-XXIV); ML II, 253 f.

Harder, Cornelius D. (1866-1946), was born at Blumstein, Molotschna, South Russia, on Dec. 1, 1866. He grew up in the Zagradovka settlement, and attended and later taught school there. On Feb. 22, 1890, he was married to Katharina Janzen. Fourteen children were born to them. In 1896 the family moved to the Suvorovka Mennonite settlement in the Caucasus, where he was elected minister July 6, 1897. On Feb. 17, 1912, they went to Siberia to the village of Schönsee, Slavgorod district. On Oct. 7, 1912, Harder was ordained elder of the Orloff Mennonite Church of the Barnaul settlement by Jakob Gerbrandt. In 1926 Mrs. Harder and two children went to Canada, and the following year he followed them. He became elder of the Bergthal Mennonite Church of Didsbury, Alberta. In 1937 he went to Rosemary, Alberta, where he organized the Westheim Mennonite Church and the Conference of Mennonites in Alberta. He died there on Oct. 3, 1946. C.K.

J. G. Rempel, Fünfzig Jahre Konferenzbestrebungen 1902-1952 I (1954) 244-46.

Harder, David, teacher and minister, was ordained in 1909 and served as leading minister of the Glyaden Mennonite Church, Slavgorod, Siberia (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 718)). Dirks (Adressbüchlein, p. 7) lists him in this capacity in 1913. On Sept. 10, 1923, he wrote a report on conditions of the settlement, entitled "Einst und Jetzt." (Copy in Bethel College Historical Library.) C.K.

Harder, David E. (1872-1930), a Mennonite (KMB) teacher and minister, was born April 2, 1872, in the village of Annenfeld, in the Crimea, South Russia, the youngest of the six children of Johann and Elisabeth Fast Harder. In 1874 the family joined the Russian Mennonite migration to America and settled in the village of Gnadenau, which was established near Hillsboro, Kan., under the leadership of Elder Jacob A. Wiebe, the founder of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church. When the village system of life was found impracticable in America, the Gnadenau village was dissolved and the Harder family moved to their farm 2½ miles south of Hillsboro.

David Harder received his elementary education in the parental home where his father conducted a private school until school districts were formed and public schools organized. When he reached the age of 15, he attended the Hillsboro High School for a few months. He obtained a teacher's license, and began to teach in a rural school near Goessel, Kan. For several spring and summer terms he attended McPherson College, McPherson, Kan. During the school years 1898-1900 he attended Bethel College, and in 1927 he received his Master's degree at the University of Oklahoma. In June 1897 he was married to Margaret Flaming.

To this union five children were born—Menno, David, Rozella, Theodore, and Joseph.

David E. Harder served on the faculty of a number of Mennonite colleges: Tabor College, 1909-22; Bethel College, Newton, Kan., 1922-27; Freeman College at Freeman, S.D., 1927 until his death in October 1930. He served the teaching profession 35 years.

As a minister Harder was in great demand. In 1914 he became moderator of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Conference, and was re-elected to this position 12 consecutive times. Under his leadership the Conference experienced growth in membership and great extension of its services. His "History of the Hutterian Brethren" is still an unpublished manuscript.† M.S.H.

Menn. Life I (July 1946); Tabor College Herald, November 1930.

Harder, Ernst (1854-1927), a German Mennonite leader, was born Nov. 29, 1854, at Königsberg in Prussia, the son of Karl Harder (q.v.). He studied history and modern languages, and for a time served as tutor in the home of the British ambassador in Lisbon. Later he was an editor on the staff of the Tägliche Rundschau in Berlin, as well as a teacher of Spanish and Portuguese. As one of the first students of his noted brother-in-law Martin Hartmann, he finally devoted himself entirely to the study of Arabic. He was one of the founders of the Berlin Mennonite Church, serving on the church board from 1904 to his death, and as chairman of the board the last two years. In 1912 he compiled the Festschrift celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the congregation. He died at Charlottenburg on Sept. 15, 1927. E.C.

E. Crous, Karl und Ernst Harder (Elbing, 1927); ML II, 254.

Harder, Gerhard (1857-1931), evangelist and minister of the Halbstadt congregation, Molotschna, Taurida, Russia, was born in 1857 as fourth child of Bernhard Harder, well-known minister, teacher, and poet of Halbstadt. Gerhard was educated at the Halbstadt Zentralschule and pedagogical classes and—after teaching in an elementary school until 1883—at St. Chrischona near Basel, Switzerland. Harder then took a private course in Russian and became a teacher of the Halbstadt Musterschule (q.v.) connected with the pedagogical classes of the Halbstadt Zentralschule, serving here for five years (1885-90). He then became a minister of the Ohrloff-Halbstadt congregation and was appointed evangelist (Reiseprediger) by the Mennonite General Conference (Bundeskonferenz). He wrote a biography of his father Bernhard Harder in the volume Geistliche Lieder und Gelegenheitsgedichte (Hamburg, 1888).

Gerhard Harder was married to Justina Peters Harder; they had four sons. His son Johannes graduated from the Teachers' Institute at St. Petersburg and taught at the Halbstadt Zentralschule from 1909 until his death during the Revolution.

Harder was arrested in January 1931 together with Elder A. Klassen, spent several months in jail at Halbstadt, was sentenced to banishment to Siberia but fell ill and died at the Muntau hospital the day before the execution of the sentence. Earnestness and at the same time a great kindliness were outstanding features of his character and work. (Friesen, Brüderschaft.) H.G.

Harder, Gustav (1856-1923), pastor of the Emmaus Mennonite Church (GCM) near Whitewater, Kan., was born March 19, 1856, in Heubuden, West Prussia, the son of Bernhard and Agatha Wiebe Harder, Chorister (Vorsänger) of the Heubuden congregation. His mother died when he was five years old. At 16 he was baptized.

When the Mennonites of Prussia were faced with compulsory military service, a number of Heubuden families, including the Harders, emigrated to America, and settled about 15 miles east of Newton. In 1877 the Emmaus congregation was organized and Gustav Harder was chosen as chorister. Seven years later he was ordained as pastor and in 1902 as elder of the congregation. Four years after coming to America, Gustav visited his former home in West Prussia, and met Helene Kroeker to whom he was married on May 20, 1880. They became the parents of two children, Helen and Bernhard.

Gustav Harder had great interest in missions. In 1890 the General Conference elected him on the Foreign Mission Board. Soon thereafter this board chose him as its treasurer, which position he held to his death. Emergency relief greatly interested him and his congregation, especially on behalf of the Mennonites of Russia.

Gustav Harder was also active in the establishment of Bethel College and for many years served as a member of its board of directors. He also served as a member of the board of directors of the Bethel Deaconess Hospital. He never fully recovered from the death of his wife in 1919, and died on June 16, 1923, at the age of 65. Both he and his wife were buried just across the road from his home in the small Harder cemetery. (ML II, 254.) E.G.K.

Harder, Johann (1811-75), a Mennonite elder in the Molotschna, South Russia, was born Sept. 18, 1811, in the Blumstein settlement, Halbstadt district, and died on Sept. 10, 1875. He was ordained as minister of the Ohrloff-Halbstadt congregation in 1855 and as elder in 1860 to replace Bernhard Fast (q.v.), who had retired. He was characterized by great talents, gentleness, and kindness. The beginning of his service coincided with the rise of the Mennonite Brethren. In their struggle for recognition he was conciliatory, and to him belongs the credit for the peaceful outcome of the separation. Many of his letters regarding this matter were published in the Mennonitische Blätter (February 1863, pp. 13-16), by Isaak, P. M. Friesen, and others. Some of his unpublished letters have been preserved in America. He served as elder for 15 years, and died at the age of 64 with the affectionate regard of both the Mennonite Church and the Mennonite Brethren. D.H.E.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 195, 198, 200, 212-14; Fr. Isaak, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908); ML II, 254 f.

Harder, Johann J. (1836-1930), Mennonite Brethren pioneer minister, the son of Johann Harder (1811-75), was born in Blumstein, Molotschna, Russia, on Aug. 20, 1836, attended the local school, and was for one year a pupil of the well-known Bernhard Harder (his father's uncle). On Nov. 16, 1858, he married Elisabeth Fast, daughter of Johann Fast. After having taught the Friedensruhe school for three years he taught the Schönau school for another four years.

In 1865 Johann Harder joined other landless pioneers who moved to the Crimea. In 1869 he and his wife and 17 others were rebaptized by Jacob A. Wiebe and thus became members of the newly organized Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church. The correspondence between him and his father, a leading minister of the Molotschna Mennonite Church during this time, gives valuable insight into the spiritual atmosphere and struggle of that time. In 1871 Harder was elected to the ministry and assisted Jacob A. Wiebe in the organization of the church. Having had more education than Wiebe he played a major role in the early years of the group. In 1874 he emigrated to America, settling first in the Gnadenau village near Hillsboro, Kan. In 1900 he returned to Russia for a visit. He died Feb. 23, 1930. He was the father of David E. Harder (q.v.). M.S.H.

Harder, Karl (1820-98), a Mennonite preacher in Prussia, was born in Königsberg, and died on March 4, 1898, at Elbing. He was by trade a lithographer, but wanted to study theology. His wish was fulfilled with the support of Hermann Warkentin (q.v.) of Königsberg and a financial grant of the Danzig Mennonite Church. He studied at the universities of Danzig and Halle.

In 1845 Harder returned to his home. A number of members of the Elbing congregation wanted him to become their pastor, but he accepted a call to Königsberg. Thereupon about 24 families of the Elbing-Ellerwald congregation built a small church and joined the Königsberg congregation. In 1857 Harder went to Neuwied on the Rhine, and for 12 years served here as pastor and kept the scattered Mennonite congregation intact. He was also the tutor of Prince Hermann of Wied, and thus became the teacher of the highly gifted Elizabeth, who later was Queen of Rumania, and who became famous as a poet under the nom de plume of Carmen Sylva. Until her death she corresponded with Harder. In 1868 Harder was called as pastor to Elbing, and served here for 30 years, taking an active part in the life of the city. He established and presided over a trade school for girls. For his services to city and state he was honored with the Order of the Red Eagle. In 1846-48 he published Monatsschrift für die evangelischen Mennoniten. Harder was also the author of the following works: Das Leben Menno Symons (Königsberg, 1846); Predigten (10) (Neuwied, 1859); Blätter für Religion und Erziehung (3 vv. 1869-71); Die Christliche Religion (Elbing, 1896); Kurzgefasste Geschichte der Elbinger Mennonitengemeinde (Elbing, 1883); and posthumously, Das Leben—Ein Gebet, Für meine lieben Kinder und Freunde (Rauschen in den Sommerferien 1891 and 1892). Harder also frequently wrote articles for the Menn. Blätter (1858, p. 60; 1888, pp. 2, 70, 117; 1890, p. 51; 1892, pp. 3, 18; 1893, p. 15; 1896, p. 51; 1898, p. 25), admonishing warmly to unity in love and peace. NEFF.

A. Siebert, Rede zur Einweihung des Denkmals für Karl Harder (Neuwied, 1899); Ernst Crous, Karl und Ernst Harder (Elbing, 1927); DB 1868, 136; 1885, 10 f.; 1886, 9, 21, 49, 51, 53, 55; ML II, 255.

Harder, Kornelius, a leading minister of the Nikolaifeld Mennonite Church in the province of Stavropol, Caucasus, Russia, from 1897. He was also a member of the local Mennonite school board. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 717.) C.K.

Harder, Peter B., a Mennonite educator and writer, was born July 15, 1868, at Halbstadt, Molotschna, Taurida, Russia, a son of Bernhard Harder, prominent minister, teacher, and poet. P. B. Harder was a schoolteacher for 36 years and wrote a German grammar which was used in most Mennonite schools in Russia. Of his literary works the best known are the novel Die lutherische Cousine, and Lose Blätter, a collection of short stories and poems in which Harder with great ability and power of observation portrays Mennonite life in Russia in his time. The latter appeared in Aufwärts (q.v.). A larger work, also about Mennonite life, ready in manuscript, could not be published because of the outbreak of World War I. Peter B. Harder selected and edited 213 of the songs written by his father Bernhard Harder, which were published by J. Friesen in 1902 with the title Kleines Liederbuch. Geistliche Gelegenheitslieder. Because of his small salary and large family Harder through all his life had to battle against poverty and died of starvation on Sept. 15, 1923, in the province of Ufa in northern Russia, where he was teaching school. H.G.

J. H. Janzen, "The Literature of the Russo-Canadian Mennonites," Menn. Life, January 1946, 22 f.; Aufwärts (ed. K. G. Neufeld); H. Görz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1951) 167; ML II, 255.

Harderwijk, a town (1947 pop. 11,124, with 15 Mennonites) in the Dutch province of Gelderland, was once the seat of a small Flemish Mennonite congregation. In 1649 the congregation sent no representative to the Flemish conference at Haarlem; it is thought to have had no ministers at that time. Apparently it died out soon after. Of its history nothing is known. About 1540 there were some slight traces of Anabaptism in this town. vdZ.

C. Hille Ris Lambers, De Kerkhervorming op de Veluwe (Barneveld, n.d., 1890) 23, 36, 75, CIX, CXII-CXVII.

Haren, near Groningen city, Dutch province of Groningen, the seat of a Mennonite fellowship (kring) of members of the Groningen congregation. A first meeting was held here in 1923; an occasional service was held in 1936; a ladies' circle was founded in December 1936. Since April 11, 1937, services have been regularly held in a building belonging to the Liberal Reformed Church. At first services were conducted by Pastor Knipscheer of Groningen. In 1939 the church board of Groningen appointed a minister specifically for the care of its members living at Haren: J. Meerburg Snarenberg 1939-40, J. S. Postma 1940-42, A. H. van Drooge 1946-51, and since 1951 Miss C. E. Offerhaus. When the group was founded in 1937 its membership numbered 97; it is now (1954) 102. vdZ.

Harich, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) in 1563-65 baptized 13 persons. A congregation was not found here. Those baptized by Bouwens may have joined the Balk (q.v.) congregation. vdZ.

Haring (Haaring, Haaringh), a Mennonite family name found at Zaandam, Dutch province of North Holland. In the 17th and 18th centuries the Harings were shipbuilders at Zaandam. Jooris Dirksz Haaringh, d. May 19, 1729, was a preacher of the Frisian congregation (Oude Huijs). Other members served as deacons. vdZ.

S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huijs (Zaandam, 1937) 47, 190, 193.

Häring(in), Christina, an Anabaptist martyr, a member of a "zealous" Anabaptist family, for her brothers Christian and Thomas had a good reputation in the Moravian brotherhoods. Of Christina the Geschichts-Bücher state that she was seized and put in chains at Kitzbühel. She remained steadfast. Because she was pregnant she was permitted to go home until her confinement. Though she could have escaped during this period, she remained. When she was returned to Kitzbühel she still persisted in her faith, and was therefore beheaded, "Which is unusual for a woman," as the chronicles remark. Her corpse was burned. Her brothers escaped to Moravia. Christian, who is mentioned in the chronicles in connection with the martyrdom of Thomas Herrmann (q.v.), was made deacon in 1552 (not 1550) and Thomas in 1568 (not 1567); the latter was also a preacher after 1572, and died in 1593 at Altenmarkt near Lundenburg, after he had been a "brother" for 53 years. Loserth.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 107 f., 198, 253, 260, 297, 319; J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol (Vienna, 1882) 509; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Mart. Mir. D 34, E 441; ML II, 255 f.

Harleysville, a town situated in Lower Salford Twp., Montgomery Co., Pa., on Route 63 at the intersection with State Route 113, pop. 900, named after Samuel Harley who built a tavern here in 1790 and is regarded as the founder of the town. It is surrounded by a Mennonite rural community; within shopping distance there are six Mennonite churches: Salford (MC) with 425 members, Franconia (MC) with 845 members, and Towamencin (MC) with 223 members, Eden Mennonite Church (GCM) with 275 members, a Mennonite Brethren in Christ church with 59 members, and the Calvary Mennonite Church (independent) with 158 members. Mennonites have lived in this area for two hundred years. Christopher Dock (q.v.), the pioneer Mennonite schoolmaster, bought a farm a few miles from this place from the sons of William Penn in 1734. The farm is owned today (1953) by Elmer Wolford, Salfordville, Pa. A white oak, labeled the "Dock Oak," is still standing on this property. J.C.C.

Harleysville (Pa.) Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church had a membership of 59 in 1953, with Ernest B. Hartman serving as pastor.

Harlingen, a seaport (1947 pop. 10,865, with 562 Mennonites) in the Dutch province of Friesland, in which there have been Mennonites from early times. Though the origin of the congregation is unknown, there was a congregation here at the time of Menno Simons, who visited this congregation in 1556, while Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized a considerable number of persons here (80 in 1551-54; 40 in 1554-56; 88-90 in 1557-61; 648 in 1563-65; 324 in 1568-82, making a total of 1180-82). Leenaert Bouwens lived about 15 years in the neighborhood of Harlingen. By this influx of members the Harlingen congregation, at the same time largely increased by the emigration of Mennonites from Flanders, was the largest in Friesland. In 1566 there were about 450 male members, and about 1680 it is said that more than one fourth of all the citizens of Harlingen were Mennonites.

In the meanwhile the Harlingen congregation had been divided into a number of branches, as had occurred in all the Dutch congregations in this period. With Franeker the Harlingen congregation played an important role in the Flemish-Frisian schism of 1566-67, and numerous meetings, at which the congregations in Flanders and North Holland were also represented, were held in Harlingen.

By the close of the 16th century there were found here at least six separate congregations: (1) Waterlanders, mostly called "de Keetsche Gemeynte," after their meetinghouse, which was a keet (former salt barrack), dedicated June 17, 1632, by Idzart van Hettinga, preacher of this congregation, of which Yeme Jacobsz de Ringh (q.v.) was an elder; (2) Frisians; (3) Flemish; (4) High Germans, often called "Blaauwe Schuur Gemeente" (after their meetinghouse "the blue barn," built in 1614 and enlarged in 1641); (5) Huiskopers; (6) Jan Jacobsgezinden. As early as 1603 a number of High Germans (4) united with the Waterlanders (1). In 1610 the Flemish (3) formed a union (Harlinger Vrede, q.v.) with the Frisians (2). The High Germans (4) (those who had not united with the Waterlanders) merged with the Flemish (3) in February 1643. About this time, or perhaps one or two decades before, a number of conservative members in the Flemish congregation had organized as a separate church, calling themselves (7) Old Flemish and were usually called Ukowallists. Soon after, the Huiskopers (5) merged with the Old Flemish (7). When the High Germans had united with the Flemish in 1643 the meetinghouses of both former groups were in use until the former Flemish church was sold in 1677. This united congregation was a rather large one. Its deacon was Claes Huyberts, who in 1672 presented to the government of Friesland an amount of 500,000 guilders, raised by a collection taken in all the Mennonite congregations of Friesland and loaned to the government for the building of warships. In this year the Waterlanders (1) united with the Flemish-Frisian-High German congregation; both meetinghouses, the "Blaauwe Schuur" and the "Keet," were used until in 1695 the latter was put out of use, causing some dissension in the congregation. This congregation also possessed an orphanage and a house for the poor, which in 1688 were granted freedom from taxation.

About 1700 there were still in Harlingen—(a) the United Church (1, 2, 3, 4), (b) Old Flemish (5 and 7), (c) Jan Jacobsz group (6), (d) "Jan Tammes-volk" (followers of Jan Tammes), which was a splinter of the Jan Jacobsz group (6), and of which Jan Jansen Blauw became a preacher in 1708; nothing further is known about it; (e) "Het Kleine Hoopke," a small group of conservative Mennonites separated about 1696 from the United Church (a), of which Douwe Feddriks (q.v.) was the preacher. In the Jan Jacobsz group (6) Lieuwe Willems Graaf (q.v.) and Lambert Klaesz Aker were preachers. Aker served until his death in 1690. It is not known when this congregation died out, but since it is not found in the first Naamlijst of 1731, it was by that time at least no longer in existence.

The Old Flemish congregation (b), which in the 18th century was often called the congregation "in de Nieuwe Kerk" (in the new meetinghouse), was until its end served by untrained and unsalaried ministers. It was very conservative and never joined a conference. It died out about 1796.

The United congregation (in the 18th century usually called the congregation "van de Oude Kerk," i.e., of the Old Meetinghouse) was among the first to promote the Mennonite Conference of Friesland in 1695. Gillis Vermeersch of Harlingen was its first treasurer from 1696 until his death in 1721. Three following treasurers were also members of Harlingen: Simon Johannes Stinstra 1722-39, Robijn Arjensz 1749-70, and Claas Fontein 1771-87. The congregation seems to have been rather liberal even in this period. A Remonstrant (q.v.) minister was admitted to the pulpit as early as 1705. Incidentally we are informed that under the influence of Collegiantism (q.v.) baptism was several times performed by immersion. The old meetinghouse, "de Blaauwe Schuur," was replaced by a larger one in 1706, which was used until 1857 and then replaced by the present meetinghouse, dedicated Sept. 17, 1858, by P. Cool.

During the first decades of the 18th century the congregation contributed liberally for the Fund of Foreign Needs and in 1711, 21 Mennonite Swiss refugees were provided with shelter and even farm land.

Among the Mennonite families of Harlingen we find since the 17th-18th century in the records the following names: Boomsma, Braam, Dreyer, Fontein, Hannema, Hingst, Huidekoper, Menalda, Oosterbaan, Stijl, Stinstra.

The membership of the United Church, which numbered about 560 in 1695, decreased in the 18th century. In 1838 it numbered 272; in the 19th century it increased again, 1861, 437; 1900, 556. Then in the 20th century, paralleling the decline of Harlingen as an import and export center, the membership declined to 324 in 1930, rising by 1954 to 375. Often it was served by prominent preachers: Reiner Clasen Fontein (1655-1727), a merchant, served from 1694(?) until his death; Joannes Stinstra (q.v.) 1737-85, who was suspended by the government of Friesland 1742-57 on charges of Socinianism (q.v.); Jan Boelaart 1744-56; Cornelis van Engelen (q.v.) 1748-58; Jan Franken 1756-63; Nicolaas Klopper 1764-86; Heere Oosterbaan, formerly professor of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, from 1786 until his death in 1807; Matthijs van Geuns 1787-92; Freerk Hoekstra 1792-1836; Pieter Cool 1836-72; J. Boetje 1872-84; J. W. van der Linden 1884-1912; E. Engelkes HGzn 1918 until his death in 1929; A. L. Broer 1929-38; J. P. H. Grootes 1939 until his death in 1945, and H. H. Gaaikema from 1946 to the present (1954). There is now a ladies' circle, youth group, Bible circle, and Sunday school for children. A large part of the membership lives in the villages outside Harlingen.

The archives of the congregation contain records (membership, resolutions, etc.) from 1632 and a large number (about 400) of separate documents. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, passim; see Index; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 522, 523, 539, 557, 558V, 1180, 1216, 1871 f., 1881; II, Nos. 1523, 1890-1904; DB 1861, 135; 1877, 115-32; 1878, 78-97; 1880, 1-41; 1893, 1-90 passim; 1909, 147; J. Loosjes, Jan Jacobsz en de Jan-Jacobsgezinden, in Nederl. Archief v. Kerkgesch. XI (1914) 3, pp. 229-31; P. Cool, De stichting der nieuwe Doopsgezinde kerk te Harlingen. Redenen en geschiedkundige mededeelingen daartoe betrekkelijk (Harlingen, 1858); ML II, 256.

Harlingen liederen (Harlingen hymns), six hymns from the old Haarlem Mennonite songbook, revised by P. Cool (q.v.) and his Reformed colleague M. A. Jentink, and printed at Amsterdam in 1856. These hymns were formerly used in Harlingen and some other congregations. (DB 1865, 74-76.) vdZ.

Harlinger Vraagenboek, thus is usually called the Dutch Mennonite catechism Vraagen over den Godsdienst tot onderwijs der jeugd, Geschikt door de Leeraaren der Christelijke Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Harlingen. It was published at Harlingen in 1751, reprinted at Haarlem and Amsterdam in 1776. This catechism, to which Joannes Stinstra (q.v.), minister at Harlingen 1733-85, was the prominent contributor, contains in its first edition on 214 pages 931 questions. It is written in a moderate and somewhat rationalistic tone, and influenced by the practical philosophy of English philosophers like Clarke (q.v.) and Tillotson. Chr. Sepp in his biography of Stinstra is of the opinion that the Harlinger Vraagenboek depreciates "the dogma of God's mercy in Christ as the source of new life." This catechism was much used in Dutch congregations, often even until 1860. vdZ.

C. Sepp, Joannes Stinstra en zijn tijd II (Amsterdam, 1865) 267; DB 1867, 94; 1868, 76, 107, 109.

Harlinger Vrede (Peace of Harlingen). On Oct. 25, 1607, the Flemish congregation of Harlingen (q.v.), Dutch province of Friesland, wrote a letter to a number of other Flemish congregations which had elders, saying that they, like the Frisian Mennonites in their town (see Bekommerde Friezen), believed that the division of 1567 between the Flemish and the Frisians was wrong and regrettable and that peace should be made between the two groups. The answers made by the Flemish elders to this letter are not known, but in Harlingen peace was concluded in 1610, and the Flemish and Frisian congregations united. A number of Flemish elders, like Pieter Jansen Mooyer at Amsterdam and Claes Claesz of Blokzijl, welcomed the union, but others, especially Jan Luies (q.v.) and a number of congregations in the Dutch province of Groningen and elsewhere, condemned this "false peace" and even banned those who favored the union. For two decades the Flemish congregations in the Netherlands were stirred up by the Harlinger Vrede, which was the precursor of other unions between the divided Mennonites. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 522-23, 539, 557, 558V, 560-64, 571; II, Nos. 1232-41, 2310.) vdZ.

Harman Coenraetsz (Herman van Kelder), a Dutch Anabaptist who was a native of the district of Cleve, Germany, was sentenced to death by the Court of Holland on Jan. 7, 1539, because of being rebaptized. He was executed by beheading at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, together with ten others. According to his own confession he had practiced polygamy. Obviously he and his companions were followers of David Joris (q.v.). vdZ.

G. Brandt, Historie der Reformatie I (2nd ed., Amsterdam, 1677) 134; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 749; DB 1899, 158-60; 1917, 115, No. 51, 160-67.

Harman Hoen, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, a native of Zwolle, baptized by Hans Speck at Deventer in the fall of 1534, was in a revolutionary group of Anabaptists in the province of Groningen in April 1535 and shortly after in Amsterdam, where he was arrested in May 1535 after the Anabaptist attack on the city hall had failed. During his trial Harman confessed that he had been aware of the intended attack but that he had not participated in the revolt. He was executed by beheading on July 28, 1535, at Amsterdam. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 125, 134-40; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index.) vdZ.

Harman Jansz van Sellem, an Anabaptist martyr: see Herman Jansz.

Harm(en) Schoe(n)maker, a Dutch Anabaptist, who by his unsound bigoted fanaticism (he called himself the Messiah and even God the Father) caused a tumult at 't Zandt, Dutch province of Groningen, in January 1535. On the farm called "De Arke," owned by Eppe Pietersz, a wealthy farmer, a large crowd gathered, over 300 of whom were baptized in one night by Schoenmaker, assisted by Cornelis int Kershof (q.v.). Schoenmaker was arrested and put in prison in Groningen, where he soon died insane. He clearly took the Münsterite views and initially considered himself an elect to bear the banner of God from Groningen to Münster; i.e., to be the leader of the revolutionary Anabaptists of the Groningen region to the New Zion, which Jan van Leiden had erected in Münster. vdZ.

P. G. Bos, "De Groningsche Wederdooperswoelingen," in Ned. Archief, v. Kerkgesch. (N. S. VI, 1909); Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 145-48; Mellink, Wederdopers, 66 f., 74, 257-60.

Harmen de Verwer (House painter), an Anabaptist martyr, found in van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 552, E 885); this "Verwer" is an error of van Braght; from the documents it has become evident that he was not a painter, but a weaver. (See Harmen de Wever.) vdZ.

Harmen de Wever (Harmen de Verwer, i.e., the Dyer, in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror and Harmen der Färber in ML II, 256), an Anabaptist martyr, a weaver by trade, of Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel, was burned there between May 24 and June 16, 1571. On March 11, 1571, he was arrested together with 11 other members of the congregation by the Spanish soldiers of Alba (q.v.). When in prison he at first recanted, scandalizing his fellow prisoners by his dice-playing, but soon he regretted his apostasy and finished his earthly life by suffering bravely and steadfastly. On the scaffold he was gagged in order to prevent his speaking to the crowd. (Mart. Mir. D 552 ff., E 885; DB 1919, 29 ff.; ML II, 256.) vdZ.

Harmonia Sacra, a hymnbook published in 1832 by Joseph Funk (q.v., 1778-1862) of Mountain Valley near Harrisonburg, Va. Remembered as "the father of song" in Northern Virginia, Funk was a pioneer leader, teacher, author, translator, and publisher of music. The book originally bore the title, A Compilation of Genuine Church Music (Winchester, Va., 1832, pp. 208 long octavo), but was renamed Harmonia Sacra in the 5th edition (Mountain Valley, 1851) with the first title continued as subtitle. This music textbook, now in the 21st edition (Harrisonburg, 1952), has reached a total issue of approximately 85,000 copies.

Designed for use in singing schools, the book contained a variety of meters, all harmonized for three voices (four since the 11th or 12th ed.) together with "a copious elucidation of the science of vocal music." Four syllables, faw, sol, law, mi (the master note), seven since the 1851 printing, were used. As an aid to reading the notes in the various keys the compiler invented "patent" or character notes, a different shape for each syllable, which with slight modifications persist in a number of modern hymnals.

In addition to the theoretical part, the book is composed almost entirely of hymns and anthems, a considerable portion of which is of very high quality. Many of the songs look at the Christian life as a pilgrimage and in joyful mood anticipate heaven.

In 1847 a hymnal adapted for church use was compiled from selections drawn from the book and published under the title Psalms, Hymns, and Spiritual Songs. This new book was used widely in Mennonite churches and became a source from which in 1902 the Church and Sunday School Hymnal was compiled. The Old Folks' Singing movement, originating in 1902 and held annually on New Year's Day at Weavers Mennonite Church near Harrisonburg, Va., together with similar singings held elsewhere, has kept alive the spirit and vision of the Harmonia Sacra. C.K.L.

Harms (Harm, Harmssen, Harmsen) is a Dutch-Prussian Mennonite family name which is still common in the Netherlands as a given name (Harm). The name occurred in the Mennonite congregations of Danzig, Elbing, Thiensdorf, Orlofferfelde, Tragheimerweide, Montau-Gruppe, and Deutsch-Kazun. From these congregations the name was transplanted to Russia, United States, Canada, and South America. Outstanding representatives are G. N. Harms (q.v.), elder of the Gnadenberg Mennonite Church; J. F. Harms (q.v.), educator and editor, Hillsboro, Kan.; Orlando Harms, editor and manager of the M.B. Publishing House, Hillsboro, Kan. Who's Who Among the Mennonites (1943) lists A. J. Harms, minister; E. M. Harms, M.D.; Ervin F. Harms, minister; F. L. Harms, M.D.; H. H. Harms; J. H. Harms, M.D. C.K.

Harms, John F. (1855-1945), educator, editor, and minister of the Mennonite Brethren Church, was the only son of Jacob and Anna Foth Harms. He was born at Kleefeld, Molotschna Mennonite settlement, South Russia, April 29, 1855. After his elementary education he attended a school in Steinbach for two years and the Zentralschule at Halbstadt for one year to prepare for the teaching profession. He taught school in the village of Lichtfelde, 1873-78. In the fall of 1873 he married Marie Isaak. To them two children were born, but in the spring of 1876 both the children as well as his wife died. In the fall of 1876 he married Margaret Isaak. To them five children were born.

In the summer of 1878 the family emigrated to America, locating at Mountain Lake, Minn., where they lived two years. In 1880 Harms went to Elkhart, Ind., where he assisted John F. Funk in his printing establishment. At this time the Mennonitische Rundschau began to be published, and Harms became its editor for six years. For two years he attended an Evangelical college at Naperville, Ill.

In 1884 Harms moved to Canada, Kan., joined the M.B. Church west of Marion, and began to publish the Zionsbote, which soon became the official organ of the M.B. Church. He also conducted a Bible school in his own home for some time. Shortly after this he established his own printing house at Hillsboro, Kan., where he continued his publication work.

Having been used extensively for preaching, Harms was ordained to the ministry in 1896. During the winter 1897 to 1898 Harms made a trip to Europe with his wife, and visited many congregations in Russia and Poland. Upon their return they settled at Medford, Okla., where Harms continued the publication of the Zionsbote until 1906, when it was given over to the M.B. Conference.

Harms was one of the most noted M.B. Conference workers for many years, serving as its general secretary as well as member of its Foreign Mission Committee. The cause of education in the conference found in him one of its strongest advocates.

Because of his wife's ill health the Harms family moved to Canada in 1906, and after living in Edmonton, Alberta, two years, settled in the vicinity of Herbert, Sask. Here Harms earned his living by farming and taught Bible classes during the winter months. He was one of the founders of the Herbert Bible School and one of its first teachers. In 1918 the family lived in Seattle, Wash. After that they made their home in Reedley, Cal., until the spring of 1921, when they returned to Hillsboro, where his wife died a few weeks after their arrival. On Nov. 27 of the same year he married Mrs. Adelgunda Jost Prieb. She preceded him in death in 1935.

At Hillsboro Harms again entered publication work, assuming the position of assistant editor of the Zionsbote. He also contributed many articles to the Hillsboro Vorwärts. His most valuable writing is the Geschichte der Mennoniten Brüdergemeinde, 1860-1924, a work of 342 pages. In 1943 he published Eine Lebensreise, an autobiographical discourse on his early life. After World War I he took a very prominent part in gathering support for the relief work for the suffering Mennonites in Russia. He died at Hillsboro, Jan. 7, 1945, and was buried at the local M.B. cemetery. (Hillsboro Journal, Jan. 11, 1945; ML II, 256.)† J.H.L.

Harms, Peter, a Mennonite preacher in the Tilsit lowlands, then Lithuania, (q.v.), wrote a letter to the Amsterdam Committee of Foreign Needs on Jan. 28, 1724, giving important information concerning the persecution of the Mennonites in this district by Frederick William I of Prussia, which led to their expulsion. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 715.) vdZ.

Harnish Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, was a preaching station of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference near New Bloomfield, Perry Co., Pa., in 1881, taken care of by William Auker who lived in Pfoutz Valley and Juniata brethren. In 1861 Christian Harnish with a large family joined the earlier families of Forrey, Miller, and Ayles. They converted a dwelling into a meetinghouse where services were held for some decades. I.D.L.

Harp, Maerten (1650-1736), physician-preacher of the Mennonite congregation at Zaandam-West and Den Ilp (Waterlander congregation) in the Dutch province of North Holland. He is the author of Lijk- en Pligtpredikatie over Gerrit Dirksz (Amsterdam, 1701), and Troost in droefheit wegens de sterfte van het Runtvee en reden van blydschap voor lievelingen Gods wegens de geslootene vreede met de koningen van Vrankrijk en Spanje (Amsterdam, 1717). (Biogr. Wb. III, 530 f.; ML II, 257.) vdZ.

Harpe, De, of des Herten Snarenspel, a Dutch Mennonite hymnbook, published in 1609 by Gillis Rooman at Haarlem, contains 136 hymns without notes. There was a reprint (Rotterdam, n.d.).

Harper (Kan.) United Missionary Church had a membership of 35 in 1949, with C. A. and Mrs. Neil serving as pastors.

Harper County, Kan., is located in the south central part adjoining the Oklahoma line. It was organized in 1873, but its organization did not become legal until 1878. The county seat is Anthony. Being in the bread basket of the world, it ranks thirteenth in the value of wheat produced among Kansas counties. It is also adapted to diversified farming. Several nationally known dairy herds are found in the county.

Harper County is the home of three Mennonite congregations. Pleasant Valley (MC) was organized in Pilot Knob Township in 1888. The Crystal Springs (Amish Mennonite) congregation was organized in Lake Township in 1904. The Mennonite Brethren in Christ (UMC) congregation in Harper Township was organized about 1890. The total membership of the three congregations is 339 (1953).

The chief trading centers of Harper County are Danville, Harper, Anthony, Crystal Springs, and Attica. Mennonites trade at all of these centers. G.G.Y.

Gideon G. Yoder, "The Crystal Springs, Kansas, Community," Menn. Community, June 1948.

Harriett United Missionary Church, located near Hillsboro, Marshall Co., Ohio, was organized in 1900. The church building, erected in 1903, has a seating capacity of 125. In 1954 the membership was 20, with L. Sydenstricker serving as pastor. F.A.H.

Harrisburg (Pa.) Civilian Public Service Unit No. 93 at the Harrisburg State Hospital was opened in April 1943 and was closed in August 1946. During its existence, 69 men were assigned to the mental hospital unit. In 1944-45 a Christian Workers' School was conducted in the unit. The Anniversary Review—Mental Hygiene Number (May 1945) gave a history of the unit. M.G.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949).

Harrisburg Conservative Amish Mennonite Church, located 2½ miles northeast of Harrisburg, Linn Co., Ore., unaffiliated, was organized in August 1911 with nine families, under the leadership of Daniel J. Kropf and Peter Neuschwander, who served as the first pastor and deacon. The present membership (1955) is 110, consisting of rural people. The first meetinghouse, built in 1915 and enlarged in 1935, was destroyed by fire in 1944. A new church with a seating capacity of 300 was dedicated on Nov. 22, 1945.

Bishops who have served the church are Daniel J. Kropf, Joseph C. Hostetler, and John P. Yoder; ministers Enos Hostetler, Joseph Schrock, Jacob Roth, Levi D. Kropf, Jacob S. Roth, and Noah D. Miller; deacons Peter Neuschwander, Joseph C. Hostetler, John P. Yoder, and Ira J. Headings. The present (1953) bishop is John P. Yoder and the minister Levi D. Kropf. At one time there were 14 deaf members in the congregation, but at present there are only seven members who use the sign language; they participate in the worship services through an interpreter. During World War I, because of its nonresistant faith, the church was locked up and also damaged. During World War II the church was destroyed by fire for the same reason. Activities of the church include preaching services, Sunday school, young people's Bible meetings, midweek prayer service and Bible study, summer Bible schools, mission Sunday schools, and a sewing circle. F.D.K.

Harrisburg (Pa.) Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church had a membership of 108 in 1955, with N. H. Wolf serving as pastor.

Harrison (Mich.) Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church was organized in 1912. For a period of years services were held in the Amble School 7½ miles northeast of Harrison, Clare Co., Mich. The 1956 membership was 59. A new church was dedicated in January 1952. Wilbert Koehn is leader of the congregation. Ch.B.

Harrisonburg, Va., the county seat (pop. 12,000) of Rockingham County, is located in the heart of the Shenandoah Valley. In 1880 Harrisonburg was made a town by act of the Assembly on 50 acres of the Thomas Harrison Plantation. By 1916 the town had grown to such an extent that it could qualify for a city charter. The city manager form of government was adopted in 1950. The city is supplied with good water from Riven Rock on the foothills of the Shenandoah Mountain west of Harrisonburg. It is a prosperous city with good stores, factories, hospital facilities, and 19 churches, three of which are Mennonite (MC), Chicago Avenue, Broad Street, and Ridgeway. It has two colleges—Madison College, a state college for women, and Eastern Mennonite College, located in a suburban town 1½ miles northwest of the courthouse. Harrisonburg is the shopping center for the largest settlement of Mennonites (MC) in the Valley. H.A.B.

Harteveldt, P. Z.: see Zachariasz, Pieter.

Hartford, a small town in Lyon Co., Kan., located in the northeast corner of Elmendaro Township near the Coffee County line, the site of a former Amish Mennonite congregation. A few Amish settlers located near Hartford about 1880. During the early eighties several Amish Mennonite settlers also arrived. Most of these came from Iowa and Pennsylvania. In 1885 a large part of the congregation in Union Co., Pa., moved near Hartford, and a new congregation was organized with Andrew Miller and David Stoltzfus as ministers. Joseph Schlegel of Nebraska served as bishop of the congregation during the early years. A younger Joseph Schlegel of Hartford was ordained a minister and later a bishop of the congregation. He spent the last years of his life at Hydro, Okla. Because of church dissension and crop failures, the congregation became extinct, the last members leaving about 1910. Hartford was the chief trading center of the Amish and Amish Mennonite settlers.

G.G.Y.

J. S. Umble, "Mennonites in Lyon County, Kansas: 1880-90; A Memoir," MQR XXV (July 1952) 232-53.

Hartigveldt, Joan, b. 1616 or 1617 at Rotterdam, Netherlands, d. there Oct. 22, 1678, was descended from a Reformed patrician family, studied law at the University of Leiden, entered a diplomatic career at London and Paris, and was converted shortly after 1645. He then abandoned all posts of honor and retired to a farm near Brielle, province of South Holland, henceforth living soberly and wearing plain black clothes. He gave serious consideration to joining a Christian church, but both the Reformed and the Remonstrants seemed to him to have forsaken the Christian simplicity of life and church ceremonies found among the earliest followers of Christ. He laid much stress upon the claim that in the meeting of Christians everyone was competent to preach the Gospel, not only the ministers appointed to this end. He rejected baptism as an obsolete ceremony. About 1650 he joined the Rijnsburg Collegiants (q.v.) and soon became an influential member of the "college" at Rotterdam, which was also attended by a large number of Mennonites, both of the Flemish and the Waterlander congregations. These Mennonites, influenced by Hartigveldt, tried to introduce his ideas in the congregations (free speaking, open communion, baptism by immersion and even joining without baptism). This caused trouble in the Flemish congregation (in 1652) as well as in the Waterlander congregation of Rotterdam (in 1661 and 1672-73). Anonymously Hartigveldt wrote a book, in which he tried to promote a union between the Remonstrants and the Mennonites: Schriftuerlijke waardeeringe van het hedendaaghse Predicken en Kerckgaan, . . . (Rotterdam, 1672). He was a man of noble character and rejected government offices, repudiated war, and championed an absolute nonresistance. He was very charitable; he gave away nearly his entire fortune, left to him by his mother, and willed his remaining property to the Collegiant orphanage.

Of some interest to Mennonite history is his book, published posthumously: De recht weerlooze Christen. Of Verdediging van het gevoelen der eerste Christenen en gemartelde Doopsgezinden; Weegens het Overheyds-ampt, Oorlog en geweldige teegenstand (Rotterdam, 1678). vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. III, 531-34; J. C. van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895) see Index.

Harting, Dirk, a Dutch Mennonite theologian, b. 1817 at Rotterdam, d. 1892 at Enkhuizen, studied philology and later theology, was the minister of the Enkhuizen congregation 1840-88. From his pen flowed a number of important scholarly works, many of them in the field of the New Testament; in 1848 a treatise on the genuineness of Ephesians (received a prize from the Hague Society), and in 1863 a Greek-Dutch Dictionary of the New Testament. He also participated in the new translation of the Bible instituted by the Dutch Reformed Church. His versatility is shown in numerous articles in periodicals. He was a journalist in the best sense of the word, e.g., one of the founders of the Enkhuizer Courant in 1870. He wrote excellent articles on music. He was also familiar with the field of Mennonite history. In 1850 he published De Munstersche furie of het oproer der Wederdoopers. In 1861-71 he and P. Cool (q.v.) edited the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen, in which a number of his articles are found. He also wrote a Levensbericht (Leiden, 1870) of his friend G. Vissering (q.v.). His services to scholarship are generally acknowledged. He was a member of the Royal Academy of Science, and in 1849 he received an honorary doctor's degree from the university of Utrecht. His service for and influence on elementary education was recognized by his appointment as an honorary member of the Dutch Educational Association. In 1888 he retired. When he died in 1889 the world lost a versatile scholar, a truly "cultured man." He had occupied a position of honor in the Mennonite churches of the 19th century. vdZ.

Winkler-Prins, Levensberichten Mij van Nederl. Letterkunde (1892) 150; N.N.B.Wb. III, 544 ff.; DB 1901, 21 and 24; ML II, 257.

Hartitsch, Dietrich von, captain of the Hungarian city and district of Oedenburg, and provost of Lower Austria. In the Habsburg domains of Austria there was in the 16th century a police officer, the provost, who served as a security and court officer in civil as well as military service. It was the duty of this officer to clear the country of disorderly elements, such as vagrants, retired soldiers, etc. He was also to serve as informer, and to report on the state of roads and bridges. For police duty he was given as many as 50 peasants to assist him. In Styria he had halberdiers at his side. Two horses were assigned to him; as a salary he received the considerable sum of 1,200 guilders, from which he paid also his aides.

At the end of the 1520's the provost had a difficult task in ferreting out and delivering all elements suspected of heresy. In the days of Hut and Hubmaier Dietrich von Hartitsch played an important role as a persecutor of the Anabaptists. The Hutterite Geschichts-Bücher say, "In 1528 in the first week of Lent, King Ferdinand sent the provost to Lower Austria. He now and again caused great indignation, sorrow, and persecution. For he put some into prison, and if he seized anyone in the field or on the streets he had him beheaded; those in the villages who would not renounce their faith he hanged on the pillars of the gates. Then many people were moved to go from Austria to Nikolsburg. Many also fled to the mountains with wife and children."

This was the execution of the royal mandate of Feb. 26 and March 20, 1528: "We have sent Dietrich von Hartitsch to eradicate heretical and seductive sects and doctrines, to spy out the ringleaders of the Anabaptists and such persons as have accepted their sect, and to proceed against the ringleaders straightway, without any mercy and without the dignity of law."

This action cost many bloody sacrifices. Many Anabaptists fled over the border of Austria to Moravia, where persecution had ceased for the moment. But in a forest near Lengbach a group of 35 fell into the hands of the provost; 17 of them were killed, the others branded through the cheeks. At other places Hartitsch acted in similar fashion. The above commands of King Ferdinand were followed on April 12 by a directive to the governor of Lower Austria to have a gang of scouts ferret out persons moving away from the places where Hartitsch was in action. At the same time the courts of Lower Austria were shown the characteristics by which the Anabaptists might be recognized. LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, J. Loserth, Balthasar Hubmaier und die Anfänge der Wiedertaufe in Mähren (Brünn, 1893); Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML II, 257 f.

Hartknoch, Christoph (1644-87), a Prussian historian, professor at the Gymnasium in Thorn, and the author of Die Preussische Kirchen-Historie (1686), which is still valid as a collection of source material for the 16th and (especially) the 17th centuries. This is true also for the history of the Prussian Mennonites, who are here treated for the first time, but from a biased, ecclesiastical viewpoint. (ML II, 258.) NEFF.

Hartman, an American Mennonite (MC) family appearing first as immigrants from the Palatinate, Germany, 1832-40, and locating (after stops in Lancaster Co., Pa.) in Ashland Co., Ohio (1835 ff.), from where some pushed on to Tazewell Co., Ill. (Peter, who came from Germany in 1837), and to Elkhart Co., Ind., e.g., Adam (1811-94), who left Germany in 1832, came to Ashland County in 1835 and settled in the Yellow Creek (Ind.) area in 1849, and Valentine (d. 1886 in Elkhart Co.), who left Germany in 1837. Peter, of Washington, Ill., was the father of Preacher John Hartman of Ashland County and Bishop Emmanuel Hartman (1849-1912), who served as bishop of the Washington Mennonite Church 1877-97, then transferred to the Apostolic Christian Church (q.v., "New Amish"). The Hartman family was closely associated with the Bally and Beutler families in the emigration from Germany and settlement in Ashland County. Other known Hartman immigrants to Ashland County were Samuel and Henry. The only identification of the exact German origin is that Adam Hartman came from the Kaiserslautern area.

Another Hartman line, that of Harrisonburg, Va., apparently having no connection with the Ashland County line, is that of David Hartman (1812-81), the father of Peter S. Hartman (q.v.), whose origin is unknown. He may have come from Lancaster Co., Pa., where a Henry Hartman, a lifelong member of a congregation in East Lampeter Township, died in 1867 at the age of 90. The Virginia Hartmans all descend from him.

The origin of the Hartman name is puzzling, since it is not found in the earlier Swiss or South German Mennonite records and practically unknown in European Mennonite circles today. In 1936 there was only one Mennonite in Germany bearing the name, a member of the Friedelsheim (Palatinate) congregation. It is possible that the family transferred from a Lutheran background to the Mennonite Church in the Palatinate about 1800 and that the entire family connection emigrated to America. H.S.B.

J. Umble, "Extinct Ohio Mennonite Churches, Ashland County," MQR XIX (1945) 41-58, 215-37.

Hartman, Peter S. (1846-1934), the son of David and Elizabeth Burkholder Hartman, was a successful farmer, businessman, and lay church worker of Harrisonburg, Va. Though he at first opposed the Sunday-school movement, he later became an active leader and teacher in the Sunday school. He was the first solicitor for the Eastern Mennonite College and was one of its founders and ardent supporters. He was an enthusiastic speaker and the talk which appealed most to the students was entitled, "Reminiscences of the Civil War." Students knew him as "Uncle Pete." He served as a member of the General Mission Board for a number of years. He was a strong temperance advocate. H.A.B.

P. S. Hartman, "Civil War Reminiscences," MQR III (July 1929) 203-19; H. A. Brunk, Life of Peter S. Hartman (Scottdale, 1937?)

Hartman, Pieter, b. 1736 at Barsingerhorn, d. Feb. 6, 1810, at De Rijp, a lay preacher of the Mennonite congregation of De Rijp (q.v.), Dutch province of North Holland, author of the "folk-book" Hendrik en Anna (2 vv.), which was awarded the unusual silver medal by the society Tot Nut van't Algemeen in 1792. Hartman served as the preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Barsingerhorn-Kolhorn 1773-80 and De Rijp from 1780 until he became blind and resigned in 1805. vdZ.

DJ 1837, 115 note; Biogr. Wb. III, 544; DB 1880, 92, 95 and 1917, 61 f., 64; Naamlijst 1810, 68; ML II, 258.

Hartmann, Heinrich. Neither the Hutterian "Väterlied," which is not sparing in its expressions of praise, nor the Geschichts-Bücher have much to say about Heinrich Hartmann, the head of the entire brotherhood in Hungary. On March 17, 1631, he was ordained preacher with two other brethren; he served "about 28 years." The Geschichts-Bücher report that after the death of Valentin Winter (q.v.), all the preachers and deacons and many other trusted Brethren assembled at Sobotiste and after adequate deliberation unanimously entrusted the leadership to Hartmann on Dec. 3, 1631. The "Väterlied," however, says he was elected by a majority vote rather than a unanimous vote. Great difficulty befell the brotherhood in the following year, when Niagy Michaly Ferencz, part owner of the household at Sobotiste, tried to compel the Brethren to perform gratuitous labor, contrary to the terms of the contract given them. Hartmann was most rudely treated. With two other Brethren he was placed in a dark, stinking, filthy chamber. Even the intercession of the Palatin benefited them little, for Ferencz openly scoffed at the right of anyone, whether Palatin or even the king, to interfere with the rights granted him by Hungarian law. Hartmann was finally released, of course upon payment of a sum of money. The Geschichts-Bücher discuss this incident at great length, in order (they say) that their descendants may see what Hungarian laws can accomplish. Heinrich Hartmann died Sept. 29, 1639. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 363, 440 ff.; ML II, 258.)

Loserth.

Hartog, a Dutch Mennonite family, originally of farmers in the province of North Holland, has produced a number of Mennonite preachers.

The first known is Jacob Hartog Jansz, b. 1656, Mennonite minister of Middelie about 1710-40. His son Jan Jacobsz Hartog (de Jonge), b. at Middelie about 1706, d. at Beemster February 1772, served the congregation of Middelie 1727-47 and then that of Oosthuizen (later called Beemster) from 1747 until his death in 1772. Klaas Hartog, who was a preacher of Middelie 1720-ca. 70, may have been his brother. Another Jan Jacobsz Hartog was serving at Middelie 1727 until he resigned about 1780. He died in 1783. A son of Jan Hartog de Jonge was Jacob Hartog, b. April 17, 1734, at Middelie, d. Dec. 9, 1808, at Beemster, who served the congregation of Oosthuizen (Beemster) 1764-93. In 1795 he was a representative of the Dutch National Assembly; this fact caused some trouble in his congregation. As a preacher he was assisted and followed by his son Jan Hartog, b. Feb. 3, 1772, at Beemster, d. there April 16, 1840. The Amsterdam Mennonite library (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 20) possesses a manuscript by this Jan Hartog, containing historical particulars concerning the congregation of Beemster and Oosthuizen. These preachers were all farmers and not specially trained for the ministry. Another Jan Hartog was a (also untrained) preacher of the Frisian congregation of Wormerveer 1745-ca. 60. Jacob Hartog Jansz (1803-94), a son of Jan Hartog (1772-1840) of Beemster, was a preacher at Westzaan op het Noord 1828-70. His son was Jan Hartog (q.v.), the first trained minister from this family. A son of this Jan Hartog, Marc Leonard Hartog, b. March 9, 1862, at Westzaan, d. Dec. 30, 1929, at Oosterbeek, studied at the University and the Mennonite Seminary of Amsterdam and served the congregation of Noordhorn 1889-91 and Joure 1891-1928. (See various issues of Naamlijst.) vdZ.

Hartog, Jan, b. 1829 at Westzaan, Dutch province of North Holland, d. 1909, became a minister of the Mennonite congregation at Joure in 1853, Zaandam-Oost in 1859, Utrecht in 1861, retired in 1899. He was a popular preacher of the conservative wing of Mennonites and had made extensive studies in the history of preaching, the results of which he published in Geschiedenis van de predikkunde en van de evangelieprediking in de Protestantsche kerk van Nederland (1861). A revised edition appeared in 1887 with the title Geschiedenis van de Predikkunde. It is an excellent work. Aside from his own views he gave a clear picture of the development of preaching and its position in the Protestant Church in the past and present.

Of his innumerable other articles in periodicals, and especially his historical writings dealing chiefly with the 18th century, these should be mentioned: De spectatoriale geschriften uit tweede helft der achttiende eeuw (Utrecht, 1872, 2d ed., 1890), and De Patriotten en Oranje van 1647-1787 (Amsterdam, 1882). His knowledge of the "Patriot" period was very wide and intensive. He was a man of industrious and especially critical scholarly work. The theological school of the University of Utrecht awarded him an honorary degree in 1878.

On Mennonite history Hartog published the following booklets and papers: Levensbericht van Jacob Honig Jzn Jr (Leiden, 1871); Menno Simons, persoon en werk (Utrecht, 1892); "Uit de Broederschap der Doopsgezinden," in Geloof en Vrijheid XXX, No. 12 (Rotterdam, 1896); and in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen he published "Iets van de publieke opinie over de Doopsgezinden in het midden der 18de eeuw" (1867), "Uit de aanteekeningen van Joannes Cuperus" (1868), "De laatste resolutie van den magistraat te Deventer tegen de Doopsgezinden in die stad" (1870), and "De ergernissen van Antje Dirks" (1872). vdZ.

J. Craandijk, Levensberichten Mij van Nederl. Letterkunde, 1904 f., 54 ff.; Biogr. Wb. III, 544-47; N.N.B.Wb. IV, 712 ff.; DB 1901, 36; ML II, 258.

Hartsen, a former Mennonite family in Holland. According to a family tradition they came originally from French Flanders and in the 16th century were living at Antwerp, Belgium, where Jacob Hartsen was a burgomaster about 1530. From Antwerp the Hartsen family, according to the tradition, moved to Haarlem, Holland, because of religious persecution. But this tradition is not very exact. As the ancestor of this family we may consider Jacob Hertzen (Hartsen) of Goch, who was a Mennonite, and who moved about 1600 from Goch to Haarlem, where he was married to Antoinette Anselmi, a Mennonite refugee from Antwerp and a relative of Joost van den Vondel (q.v.). Their son Anselmus Hartsen moved from Haarlem to Amsterdam and was employed by the cloth merchant and well-known Mennonite preacher Cornelis Claesz Anslo (q.v.) and was married to his daughter Maria. Their children and grandchildren were merchants and came to great prosperity. A number of them served the Amsterdam Lamist congregation and after 1801 the United congregation as deacons, among whom were Anthony Hartsen, b. 1719 at Amsterdam, d. there 1784, who besides being a merchant and a deacon was also a poet. One of his poems, "Aen onze Doopsgezinde Gemeente, ter nagedachtenis van onzen leeraar Klaas de Vries . . . ," is found in A. Hulshoff, Lykrede op Kl. de Vries (Amsterdam, 1766).

Cornelis Hartsen (1823-95) was a minister in the Department of Foreign Affairs. He also served as a deacon at Amsterdam (1858-63, 1868-72, 1878-82). In the 17th century this family was ennobled by the queen of Sweden and in the 19th century also by the Dutch king. Now most members of this family belong to the Reformed Church. (Nederland's Adelboek 1909, 189-93; 1954, 206-8; DJ 1840, 113; N.N.B.Wb. X, 333 f.) vdZ.

Hartshuizen (Hartshuysen), a village in East Friesland, Germany, where Leenaert Bouwens in 1551-65 baptized 14 persons, who may have joined the Emderland (q.v.) congregation, since there is no indication that there was a congregation at Hartshuizen. vdZ.

Hartville Mennonite Church (MC), located 1½ mile south and ½ mile west of Hartville, Ohio, a member of the Ohio Mennonite and Eastern A.M. Conference, was organized Dec. 10, 1944, under the leadership of Bishop O. N. Johns and H. N. Troyer, with 49 charter members. The first meetinghouse, 40 x 60 ft., was built in 1945. This was a basement church. The present building, 40 x 90 ft., with a Sunday-school wing 40 x 30 ft., was built in 1951. In 1956 the membership was 242, with Lester A. Wyse as pastor. L.A.W.

Hartwich, Abraham, a historian of West Prussia, Germany, was called on Aug. 4, 1698, from Königsberg to Lindenau in the Gross-Werder of Marienburg to serve as Lutheran pastor, after he had taught in the local school in Löbenicht at Königsberg for five years. On June 20, 1712, he accepted the pastorate in Barenhof. He wrote a description of the Werder (river islands), a preliminary account of which he had written in 1719. After his death the book was printed and published in Königsberg in 1722. Part I presents the geographic and historical description of the Werder.

Part II deals with the religion and the divine services of the Catholics and the Protestants, the Lutheran church regulations, churches, and preachers, and the Reformed, the Mennonites, and the Quakers. Reformed preachers and laymen worked in Danzig, Marienburg, and Elbing as well as in the country from 1650 to 1750, but were gradually crowded out. In Marienburg, the Werder, and along the Vistula, in Elbing and Danzig there were Mennonites in the first half of the 16th century, who (1581) held meetings in various villages. In 1646 they were expelled from all Poland by the diet at Warsaw, but by paying large sums they were given permission to remain. The author also mentions two confessions of faith, one printed at Hoorn in 1640, one written in 1698; and a catechism with about 26 questions and answers. He writes about their ideas on baptism and communion, their doctrine, services, preachers, the ban, and their resistance against paying fees to the Lutheran preachers, and records a few transfers to the Lutheran Church.

Part III deals with government, housekeeping, war, and damage by fire and water. (ML II, 259.) A.D.

Hartzler: see also Hertzler.

Hartzler, Chancy A. (1876-1947), bishop in the Illinois Conference (MC), son of Bishop John J. Hartzler, was born in St. Joseph Co., Mich., on May 5, 1876, grew up in Cass Co., Mo., married Mary Neuenschwander Dec. 23, 1900, had one son, John. Ordained preacher at the Sycamore Grove Church (MC) in Cass Co., Oct. 22, 1906, he served 1908-12 as a worker and then superintendent of the Kansas City (Kan.) Mission, then 1913 (1914 ord. bishop)-1947 (d. Oct. 15) as pastor of the Willow Springs (Tiskilwa, Ill.) Mennonite Church. He was active in Illinois Conference work, serving as moderator and secretary, as well as in the General Mission Board (Elkhart) and in the Mennonite Board of Education. H.S.B.

Hartzler, John J., bishop of the Sycamore Grove (Mo.) Mennonite Church (MC) for more than 40 years, was born May 3, 1845, in Mifflin Co., Pa., died Aug. 11, 1936, at the age of 91 years, the son of Abraham and Magdalene Zook Hartzler. When he was nine years old his parents moved to northern Indiana and later to Michigan, where he grew to manhood. He was married to Magdalene Mast Feb. 25, 1872, in Elkhart Co., Ind. Eight years later he with his family of four children moved to Cass Co., Mo., near Garden City, where he resided the remaining 56 years of his life.

Hartzler was converted when a young man, and united with the Amish Mennonite Church. In 1894 he was ordained bishop in Cass Co., Mo. Besides his home congregation he had charge of churches in Johnson Co., Hickory Co., and Vernon Co., Mo. He also helped to organize churches in Arkansas, Oklahoma, and North Dakota. He was of a quiet and unassuming disposition, yet his work took him into many homes. He officiated in 82 marriages, and baptized over 300 persons in his home community and quite a number in other churches, and also officiated at a number of ordination services.

He was a farmer all his life. In Missouri he purchased a small farm and always supported himself and his family, and was always ready to sacrifice his time and service. In his early ministry his preaching was all in German, but he lived through the transition to English language, and in his later years preached in the English language.

Two of his sons were bishops (MC): Chancy A. Hartzler of Tiskilwa, Ill.; Joseph D. Hartzler of Flanagan, Ill. He is buried in the Clearfork (Mo.) cemetery. J.D.H.

Hartzler, Jonas S. (1857-1953), Mennonite (MC) author, teacher, and preacher, was born near Topeka, Ind., on Aug. 8, 1857, the eldest son of Samuel and Sarah (Smucker) Hartzler, and died at the Mennonite Home for the Aged near Rittman, Ohio, on April 1, 1953. His maternal grandfather was the immigrant minister Christian Brandt (1783-1866), who moved to Wayne Co., Ohio, from the canton of Bern, Switzerland, in 1818. Reared on a farm, Hartzler early became interested in education, attended Wooster College and the Cook County (Ill.) Normal, and taught school in Noble and Lagrange counties, Ind., before he was called to the Elkhart (Ind.) Institute as instructor in Bible in 1895. There and later at Goshen College his industry, his practicality, and his varied talents and endowments enabled him to render a unique service to the educational, missionary, and organizational activities of the Mennonite Church as minister, teacher, business manager, treasurer, and secretary. He had been ordained minister in 1881 and became known as an exhorter, evangelist, and Bible teacher even before coming to the Elkhart Institute. At this school and later at Goshen College he served as instructor, but he also helped to carry a large share of the heavy financial burdens of the Board of Education and its schools for nearly a quarter of a century. He was the first pastor of the Goshen College congregation, served as secretary of the Mennonite General Conference from the date of its organization in 1898 until 1924, was secretary of the Indiana-Michigan Amish Mennonite Conference from 1888 to 1896, when his connection with the Elkhart Institute dictated the advisability of uniting with the Prairie Street Mennonite Church, secretary of the Indiana-Michigan (united) Mennonite Conference from its formation in 1916 until 1924, member of the Mennonite Board of Education 1895 to 1917 and treasurer (and member of the executive committee) of the Mennonite Board of Education from 1907 to 1917. Always keenly interested in foreign missions, he began in 1911 a long period of service as a member of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. After ending his connection with Goshen College in 1917 he returned to Elkhart where, in 1923, he accepted the pastorate of the Prairie Street Mennonite Church and served until 1940. For many years he was editor of Rural Evangel, published by the Indiana-Michigan Conference. He was the author (with Daniel Kauffman) of Mennonite Church History, published in 1905, and (with J. S. Shoemaker) of Among Missions in the Orient and Observations by the Way (1912). In 1921 he wrote Mennonites in the World War or Nonresistance Under Test. He was twice married: in 1880 to Fannie Stutzman (1857-1929) of Johnson Co., Iowa, and 1930 to Mrs. Catharina (Christophel) Bauer, who survived him. He had one son Vernon (1881-1907).† J.S.U.

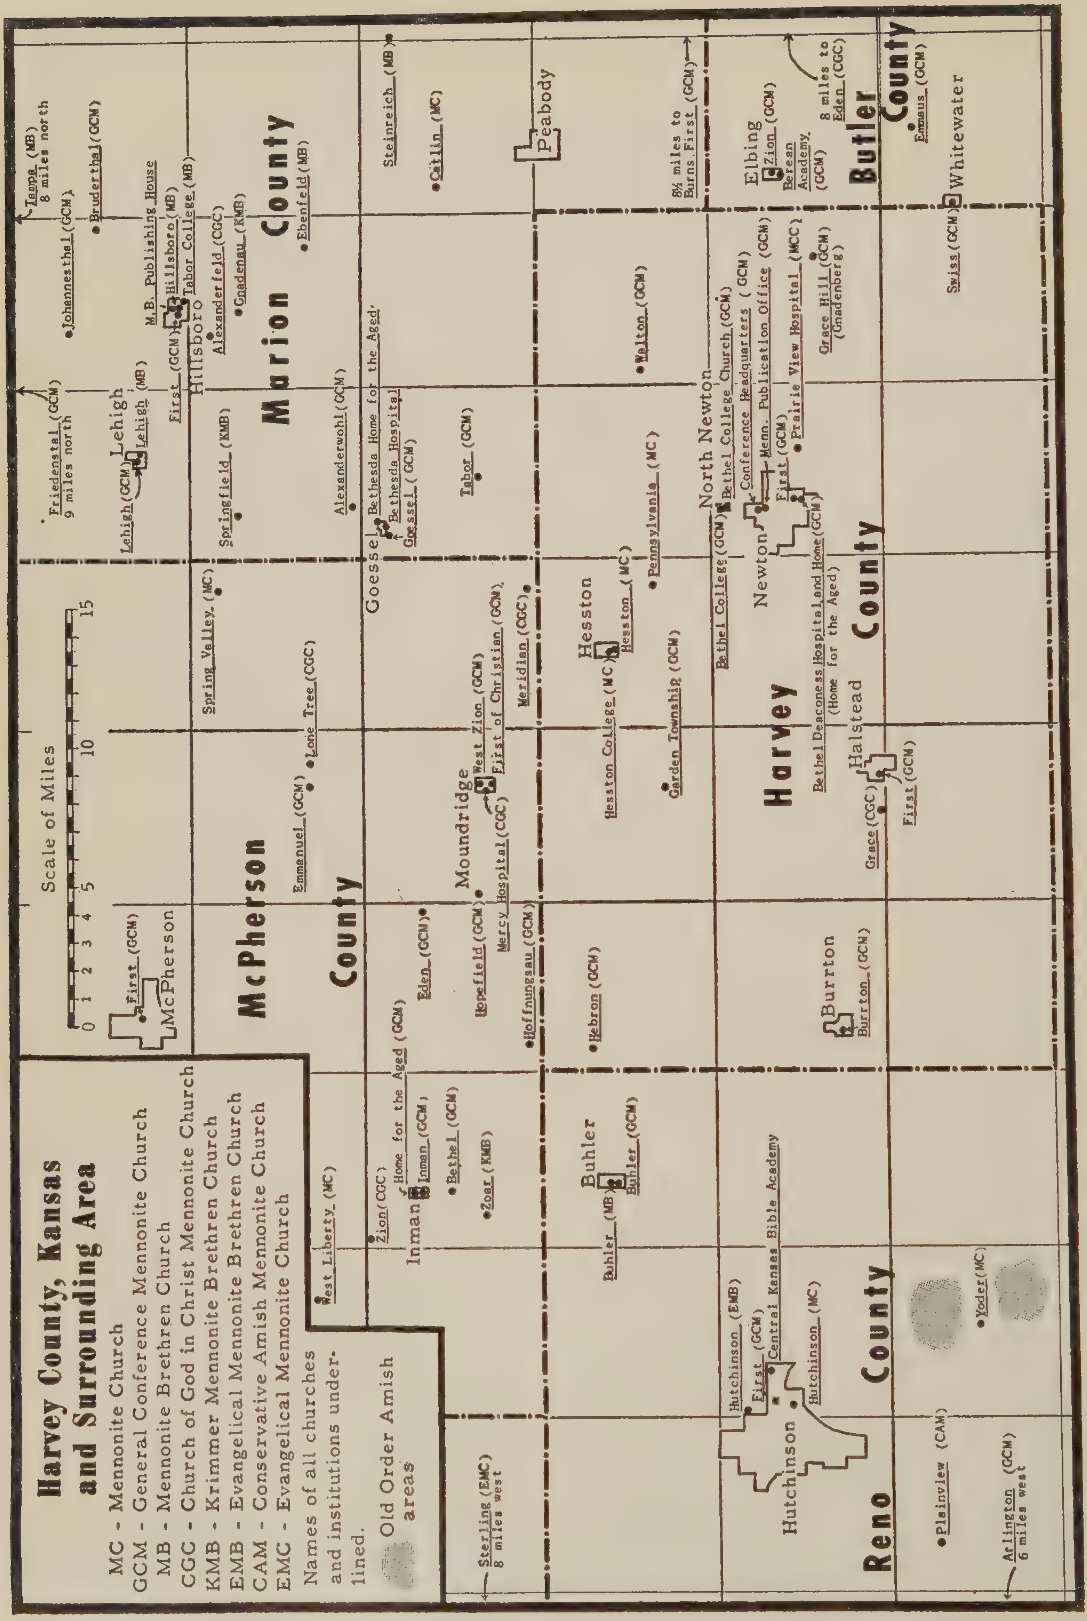
Harvest Festivals. The observance of harvest festivals among the Mennonites in the United States and Canada is of comparatively recent origin, in most cases apparently beginning during the first third of the 20th century. Today harvest festivals are widely observed in the United States and Canada, especially among the Mennonite Brethren and General Conference churches. In some churches the present observance seems to be an outgrowth of an earlier Thanksgiving Day worship service. In other instances Mennonites imitated the pattern established by other Protestant churches. In eastern Pennsylvania, for instance, the harvest festival is widely observed in Lutheran and Reformed churches by annually placing the best fruits of the harvest on the altar of the church in connection with a worship service.

The harvest festivals today in Mennonite churches seem generally to represent a combination of mission and relief interests. Most churches observing this occasion arrange services for a special Sunday, usually in October or November. In some places there are two or three services, usually with a noon or an evening fellowship meal. It is the common practice for one session to be devoted to inspirational messages centering around the theme of missions and another session around the theme of sharing. Outside speakers and visiting missionaries and ministers are often a feature of the harvest festival. In many churches the special day is marked by appropriate decoration of the church with colored leaves, fruits, cereals, and other items symbolic of the harvest of the various regions. In all of the churches special emphasis is placed on giving. Offerings that have been strongly encouraged for weeks are received at each service for worthy causes such as missions, relief, and peace activities of the church. Many churches seek to make this a high point in the church year in generous giving.

Some churches use this occasion to dramatize the special projects which individuals and groups in the church have carried on during the year, as for instance, the "God's acre" plan, by which members of the church, individually or collectively, contribute the crop from an acre of ground to the work of the church. In many churches the gifts-in-kind are brought for the festival to be sold later and the proceeds given to the church. In every instance the purpose of the harvest festival is to encourage the outreach of the church through missions, relief, and other service phases of the church's work in addition to being a corporate expression of gratitude. The observance of the occasion seems to be spreading to many churches, and the enthusiasm for the festivals seems to be growing. J.W.F.

Harvey County, Kansas, is the center of the largest concentration of Mennonites west of the Mississippi River. The General Conference Mennonites have their headquarters in Newton, the county seat, and there are eight G.C.M. churches in the county: First Mennonite Church of Newton, Bethel College Mennonite Church, First Mennonite Church of Halstead, Garden Township Mennonite Church, Burrton Mennonite Church, Walton Mennonite Church, Gnadenberg Mennonite Church, and Hebron Mennonite Church. Bethel College, also a General Conference institution, is located here. There are two other Mennonite groups in the county—the Church of God in Christ Mennonites have a church near Halstead, and the Mennonites (MC) have two churches, the Hesston Mennonite Church and the Pennsylvania Mennonite Church near Hesston, and also Hesston College and Bible School at Hesston.

The early history of the county is closely connected with the Santa Fe Railroad which by July 1871 had pushed its tracks as far west as Newton, which was named after Newton, Mass., a suburb of Boston, where many of the stockholders of the Santa Fe lived. For a number of years Newton marked the northern end of the Texas cattle trail, known as the Chisholm trail, and was the toughest cow town on the frontier. A number of other towns were laid out along the Santa Fe tracks—Walton in December 1871, Halstead in the spring of 1873, and Burrton in the summer of 1873. In addition to these, Harvey County presently includes the towns of Sedgwick, Hesston, and the villages



Harvey County, Kansas and Surrounding Area

MC - Mennonite Church
GCM - General Conference Mennonite Church
MB - Mennonite Brethren Church
CGC - Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church
KMB - Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church
EMB - Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church
CAM - Conservative Amish Mennonite Church
EMC - Evangelical Mennonite Church

Names of all churches and institutions underlined.

Old Order Amish areas

of Zimmerdale, Patterson, Annelly, McLain, and North Newton. The bill which formed 13 townships into Harvey County (there are 15 townships in the county today) was passed by the Kansas State Legislature and became law on Feb. 29, 1872. The county was named in honor of James M. Harvey, governor of Kansas at the time.

The Santa Fe Railroad and the towns of Peabody, Newton, and Halstead are closely associated with the coming of the Russian Mennonites in the great migration of 1873-75 and in later migrations. The region was then the frontier, with the Santa Fe owning alternate sections of land, most of which had not been touched by plow. The Mennonites came by rail to either Peabody, Newton, or Halstead and thence settled in the region north of Newton, between the Arkansas and Cottonwood rivers, in the counties of Marion, McPherson, and Harvey. The Santa Fe sold thousands of acres of land to the Mennonites, assisted them by erecting immigrant houses in numerous places, and brought carload after carload of implements and other supplies to Peabody, Newton, and Halstead, where they were purchased by the Mennonites. One hardware store in Newton, for example, established a national retail record for the number of plows sold in one year, and some years later sold over 200 binders in a single season.

Harvey County in 1953 had a population of about 23,000 (of whom over 12,500 were living in Newton) with a Mennonite population of probably 5-6,000. It is located somewhat to the southeast of the geographic center of the state in the heart of a rich farming area. The land is relatively flat, and climatic and soil conditions are specially suited for wheat and other small grains. The Mennonites, particularly Bernhard Warkentin, are credited with introducing Turkey Red hard winter wheat to Kansas. Warkentin, who visited the region in 1871 and selected a site at Halstead, where in 1873 he established the first mill in the county, encouraged wheat production by securing several thousand bushels of seed in South Russia and shipping it to Newton, where it was distributed among the early settlers. The Santa Fe Railroad gave the new grain a boost by making markets accessible, and wheat raising quickly spread from the central counties to all sections of Kansas, Oklahoma, and Nebraska. H.J.S.

Harvey Mennonite Brethren Church, located 11 miles southwest of Harvey, N.D., is a member of the Central District Conference. This church was organized in 1898 with 13 members. Christian Reimche, the first pastor, served the church for about 30 years. The first church was built in 1900. This was enlarged in 1918 and again in 1943. Recently a new church was constructed in Harvey and services are now conducted in both places with a joint service each month. Other ministers who have served this church are Peter Wiens, Dr. L. J. Seibel, H. H. Hiebert, G. Warkentin, and the present pastor Loyal Funk. The deacons J. C. Seibel and Jacob Zweigle served the church for 32 years and the present deacons, H. H. Delk and Dan Bich, since 1929. Robert Seibel, ordained to the ministry in this church, served as an MCC worker in Brazil in 1947-49. At present (1954) the membership is 210 and consists mostly of rural people. A.A.D.

Harwood United Missionary Church is located in the Harwood community, about seven miles west of Yakima, Wash. In 1954 it dedicated a new parsonage and church. It has a membership of approximately 40, but an average attendance of 160. Donald Mikel from the Indiana Conference is the pastor (1954). K.G.

Harz, a mountainous region in Middle Germany, partly in Thuringia and partly in Hesse. Anabaptism was transplanted into the Harz by missionaries from Upper Franconia (Jacobs, 430). In the South Harz Anabaptists appeared as early as 1527. They are representatives of the quiet, suffering group who insisted on pure conduct. Their leader was Alexander, a teacher, probably a native of Stolberg, where he often spent the night in the house of his brother-in-law. He was one "of the noblest figures in the Anabaptist movement" (Wappler, 100), who won adherents in Emseloh, Lengefeld, and Sangershausen. He was beheaded in 1533 at Frankenhausen. With him worked Jacob Schmiedeknecht. According to tradition two Anabaptists were drowned in the "Wiedertäuferteich" (Anabaptist Pond) near Liebenrode in 1530.

But cruel persecution did not succeed in wiping out the movement in the Harz. In summer and fall of 1534 they met in a mill near Zorge in the South Harz. Martin Herzog, a carpenter who had been baptized by Alexander, the preachers Klaus Berner (q.v.) and Balthasar (q.v.) der Futterschneider, Peter Reusse (q.v.), and especially Heinz Kraut (q.v.) who succeeded Alexander, found temporary residence here and from here made their way into the Harz and Thuringia. When their residence here was betrayed by captured brethren, especially Klaus Schaff, they had to abandon it. They now met at night on the Schraubenstein, a desolate place between Riestedt and Emseloh. In Riestedt on Sept. 2, 1535, the Anabaptists Georg Köhler (q.v.) and Georg Möller (Müller) were arrested, taken to Sangershausen and beheaded.

In the North Harz the Anabaptist movement also spread. Georg Möller and other brethren temporarily stayed in Quedlinburg. They felt secure for a time in concealment at Halberstadt. Here Georg Knobloch (q.v.) had rented a place in the so-called Pfaffenhäuslein in the willows behind the cathedral. Here the Anabaptists held their services, including baptism, communion, and a wedding. They had to leave this house when the owner noted that a child born there was not baptized. They now transferred to the "Grauen Hof" belonging to the monastery Michaelstein in Halberstadt. On Sept. 13, 1535, an investigation of the persons living here was made. They found the wives of Georg Knobloch and Hans Höhne (q.v.) and six small children. The questioning of the women led to suspicion, and the Hof was watched. When Hans Höhne and an Anabaptist woman, Petronella (q.v.), returned home and saw what had happened they fell on their knees and cried to God, and then sang Luther's hymn, "Ach Gott von Himmel, sieh darein und lass dich dess erbarmen." They were taken to prison at once. Cheerfully they followed the police and sang along the way. On Sept. 20 another man and woman came to the Grauen Hof; they were Adrian Richter (q.v.) and Anna Reichard, wife of Hermann Gereumes (Geruchers) of Kleinschalkalten. The former was also taken to prison, singing all the way. When Hans Höhne heard the song he cried, "There I hear the cheerful voice of my dear brother, praised be God!" When the officials inquired who the singer was he replied, "It is my dear brother Adrian. For as he who is of God knows God's voice, so I also know the voice of my dear brethren." In spite of torture Hans Höhne, Adrian Richter, and Petronella remained steadfast, and were drowned in the Bode, Oct. 8, 1535.

Concerning the further fate of the Anabaptists in the Harz little is known. On Dec. 4, 1537, Hans Linsenbusch was beheaded for his faith at Brücken on the Helme. His cousin, the schoolmaster Johann Zollener, recanted on Nov. 16, 1538 (Jacobs, 493), and was released. About ten years later the reformer Tileman Plathner was successful in the commission given him by Wolfgang Count of Stolberg and Wernigerode to turn Anabaptists from their faith. Those who returned to the church were pardoned, the others expelled (Jacobs, 493).

The numerous court records give rather exact information on the doctrine and life of the Anabaptists in the Harz. Penitence, complete separation from the world, and surrender to God, were required of all who wished to join them. By baptism they were received into the brotherhood. Georg Köhler (Jacobs, 469) reports, "When one wishes to be baptized, he comes to the baptizer, kneels, and says, 'Dear brother, I desire the bond of a good conscience with God and ask for baptism.' The baptizer replies, 'Do you believe that Christ is the only begotten Son of God and eternal, do you want to yield yourself to Him alone, obey Him as God and Lord, and, if necessary, die for His sake?' If the baptismal candidate answers in the affirmative . . . the brother performs the rite, reading . . . the baptism of John word for word. Then he wets a finger three times in water, makes three crosses on the brow and head of the candidate, and says, 'I baptize you in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.' He then earnestly admonishes him again to obey the covenant, be obedient to God, avoid sin, and yet always consider himself a sinner in the sight of God." Baptism was sometimes performed by pouring (Wappler, 122). With rebaptism they would have nothing to do, for there is only one baptism; infant baptism is not baptism. Children are clean, without hereditary sin until they reach understanding; the kingdom of heaven is for children dying without baptism.

Communion was not a sacrament to them, but a symbol of their membership in Christ and the church and the obligation of a life of obedience until death. It was conducted with solemnity. A communion service held in Knobloch's house in 1535 began with Peter Reusse washing the feet of the others and kissing each. Then he cut bread into wine and each took a piece, broke it and ate it upon the death of Christ, to testify that he, like Christ, was ready for life or death (Wappler, 128).

Marriage they considered a sacred ordinance of God; it is necessary because of fornication, but to be unmarried is better. Spiritual brotherhood stood above marriage. Where people could not become one in faith they should separate. It occurred that a man left his wife and children because they would not accept his faith, and vice versa.

Prayer they exercised diligently, obeying the admonition to pray without ceasing. Free prayer was usual; but fixed prayers, Biblical or traditional, were not rare. The Lord's Prayer was commonly used. The fourth petition was, "Our true bread, Thy eternal word, give us today."

In the Apostles' Creed they changed "under Pontius Pilate" to "under the covenant of Pilate." Köhler explains it thus: "Because the covenant of Christ, which He made with the Father, was completed through His suffering and death." Höhne declared, just as the Jews had made a covenant concerning Christ with Pilate, so the wicked now make their alliances against true Christians.

Besides preaching and prayer, hymn singing was important in their worship services. Alexander confessed that after the sermon they prayed the Lord's Prayer and sang psalms. They did not always have a sermon; they conversed with each other concerning God and divine things, concerning the wonderful leading of God both toward themselves and others (Jacobs, 478, note 3). They rejected the confessional before men and absolution by the priests. Toward the government they required implicit obedience except in matters of faith. The idea that they had a secret sign or watchword they denied emphatically; but they could be recognized by their simple conduct. Community of goods they did not have; but each should use of his earthly goods only what he needed for himself and his family; the rest he should distribute to needy brethren. They practiced the greatest hospitality and mutual aid support. They liked simple, dark clothing. Georg Möller cut up a good red coat because it had been made for pride, and had it dyed black, to give no occasion for pride. They made no distinction in food; for all is created by God and serves man, who accepts it with gratitude. The observance of Sunday they left to the individual conscience. They considered it a day of reconciliation. The sins committed during the week should be made right with God on Sunday; for this purpose God instituted it.

They lived a strict moral life, which made a deep general impression. Adulterers, gamblers, drunkards, etc., were not tolerated among them. They thus became shining examples of their time. Their suppression is therefore a matter of regret from the viewpoint of the welfare of the people, and has certainly bitterly avenged itself. NEFF.

E. Jacobs, "Die Wiedertäufer im Harz," in Ztscht des Harz-Vereins für Geschichte und Altertumskunde

XXXII (1899) 423-536; P. Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen von 1526-1584 (Jena, 1913); ML II, 259-61.

Hase, Karl August von (1800-90), a Lutheran church historian, professor of theology at the University of Jena, 1830-83. In his historical writings he also dealt with the Anabaptists, but without doing them justice. To his book, Neue Propheten (1851), he added a section called "Das Reich der Wiedertäufer," which was published in 1860 as the third part in a new edition, after a Dutch edition, Het Rijk der Wederdoopers, had appeared in 1854. The book deals principally with the excesses of the Münsterites, and is based on the incorrect premise that the Anabaptist movement was founded in 1521 by the "new prophets" in Zwickau. The quiet Anabaptists were briefly touched without differentiation. Even though he recognizes the demand of the Anabaptists for the "strict heroic morality of original Christianity," Hase nevertheless sees a danger in this "heresy," "because most of its adherents could depend on the sanctity of their conduct" (second edition, 12). His descriptions pursue a definite objective: in his mind the recollection of the "old Anabaptism" seemed instructive at a time "when a newly rising Protestant orthodoxy gives new justification to Anabaptism" (Foreword to the second edition of Neue Propheten, 1861, p. X).

In his Kirchengeschichte auf der Grundlage akademischer Vorlesungen only the Münsterites are given extensive discussion, while the quiet Anabaptists are passed by and the results of recent research are ignored. Even in the edition of 1891 he says, "Nowhere is a founder of the Anabaptists named" (Part III, section 1, p. 285), although Hase had in his book Das Reich der Wiedertäufer (p. 174) called attention to the forthcoming publication of the second book by C. A. Cornelius, Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs (Leipzig, 1860), which gives an authentic account, based on sources, of the origins of the Zürich Anabaptists in 1525. HEGE.

H. Hermsen, Die Täufer in der deutschen Dichtung, Stuttgart, 1913; ML II, 261.

Hasel, name of a Swabian family of Württemberg, of which a number became Anabaptists; one of them was an early martyr while others emigrated to Moravia where they became active in the Hutterite brotherhood.

The earliest representative of this family was Hans Hasel (of Neckarrems or Riembs) who was baptized in 1530 at Ossweil near Esslingen but suffered martyrdom for the sake of his new faith only one year later (1531) in Pfalz-Neuburg.

Around 1555-57 a relative of this man, Peter Hasel of Rudersberg near Schorndorf (Württemberg), together with his wife Barbara and four small children emigrated to Moravia, where they joined the Hutterites. The father died in the following year but his three sons in due time became outstanding members of the brotherhood. Their names were David, who in 1581 became Diener des Wortes (preacher), was sent to Württemberg as a missioner, and died in 1599; Peter, who became Diener der Notdurft (steward) and supervisor of many farm economies of the brethren around Schäkowitz, Moravia, and died 1597; and Michael, who also was sent out as a missioner (Sendbote) to his native Württemberg, where he was soon caught, made prisoner, and kept in the castle of Hohenwittlingen (where once Paul Glock, q.v., had been a prisoner) until his death in 1592. By profession he was a weaver, hence is often called Michael Weber.

Of the next generation we learn in the Hutterite Chronicle of two more Hasels, one Kaspar (d. in Moravia 1619) and one Thomas (d. also in Moravia in 1622 at the time of the complete expulsion of the Hutterites from that country). Both were Diener der Notdurft and obviously quite important members of the community.

The best known of these men is Michael Hasel, a true witness to his faith. At his death, the reeve of the castle (Burgvogt) of Hohenwittlingen remarked that "if such a man did not go into heaven, he himself would not dare to knock at its door. Yea, if he knew the end would be like Hasel's, he would rejoice even now" (Geschicht-Buch, 437; Mart. Mir., E 1951, 1088 f.).

There are three Hutterite manuscript books extant signed M.W. (Michael Weber) and we may rightly assume that he either merely owned these books or was also the copyist of them, as we know that such book-writing was a favorite activity among the brethren. All three codices contain the great Article Book (q.v.), either complete or in a shortened version. The one codex in the State Library of Wolfenbüttel (Bibl. Augustana), dated 1582, says expressly that it was written by this brother. It contains only three of the five articles, and in addition to them an outstanding epistle by Peter Walpot (q.v.) to the "Swiss Brethren" in the Rhineland (1577), his farewell address before his death, some prayers and 20 hymns by different authors, five of which have not yet been published (the codex has 235 pages and is written in careful penmanship with red letters for titles and initials). The other codices are in Olmütz (Olomuce, Moravia) 1582, and Bratislava (Slovakia), in the State Archives, dated 1583.

Michael is also the author of two hymns which he wrote in prison 1590 f., "Merkt auf ihr frommen Gotteskind" and "O edler Gott und höchster Hort" (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, Scottdale, 1914, 798 and 800). R.F.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; TA Württemberg; Wolkan, Lieder; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Mart. Mir. D 787, E 1088; ML II, 262 f.

Haslibacher, Hans, and Haslibacher Lied. Hans Haslibacher, an Anabaptist preacher of Sumiswald in the Emmental, Bern, Switzerland, active as early as 1532, a participant in the great Bern disputation of 1538. He suffered severely for his faith. He was exiled and his property of 500 gulden confiscated, and upon return to his home (his son, of the Reformed faith, was fined heavily on Sept. 2, 1571, for receiving him) was executed by beheading on Oct. 20, 1571, in Bern as the last Anabaptist martyr in that canton.

A vivid description of Haslibacher's imprisonment and death is given in a 32-stanza poem composed, as the last verse states, in prison by another Anabaptist prisoner (not necessarily a fellow prisoner of Haslibacher in 1571). The poem reports that after torture and strong attempts by the Reformed preachers to cause him to apostatize, which were steadfastly resisted, Haslibacher dreamed that he would be beheaded, and that three divine signs would accompany his execution, viz., his severed head would jump into his hat and laugh; the sun would turn crimson like blood; and the town well would give forth blood. The poet claims that all three happened.

The Haslibacher poem was first published in pamphlet form (6 pages and title page), with the title, Ein Schön Geistlich Lied von dem Hasslibacher, wie er von dem Leben zum Tod ist hingerichtet worden. In der Melody: Warum betrübst du dich mein Hertz, etc. As such it was bound with (but not printed in) a copy of the Ausbund (q.v.) which was published after 1614 (it contains a hymn on the martyr Hans Landis who was executed in this year) but certainly in the early 17th century, probably soon after the dated Ausbund edition of 1622. It next appears as hymn No. 140 in the first (1742) American edition of the Ausbund at Germantown, Pa., with exactly the same title and content as the above pamphlet. It appeared in all later American editions of the Ausbund, but in no European editions. The (1748) Ephrata German edition of the Martyrs' Mirror (938 f.) tells the story of Haslibacher from the hymn and prints stanzas 21-32. The Pirmasens (1780) Martyrs' Mirror and all later German language editions follow suit, but the Elkhart (1886) English Martyrs' Mirror (and all later English editions) published the entire hymn. Nothing of Haslibacher is found in the Dutch Martyrs' Mirror of 1660 and 1685. The Swiss devotional book, Kleines Hand-Büchlein (first edition n.p., 1786, second edition at Basel, 1801), prints the entire hymn with the slightly revised title, Ein schön Geistlich Lied, von dem Hanss Hasslibacher, aus der Herrschaft Sumiswald, in der Schweiz zu Hasslebach, welcher von dem Leben zum Tod ist hingerichtet worden. In der Melody: Warum betrübst du dich mein Hertz, etc. The title reflects information taken from the (1780) Pirmasens Martyrs' Mirror. In modern times it has been published as follows: Mennonite Yearbook and Almanac for 1911 (pp. 24 f.) in English translation by Governor (of Pennsylvania) Samuel W. Pennypacker (done March 8, 1904) from the Ausbund; reprinted in S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 185-87; Im Röseligarti, a Bernese folksong periodical, prints 12 verses with the music; C. Henry Smith states (The Story of the Mennonites, 3rd ed., Newton, Kan., 1950, p. 116) that the Haslibacher hymn, though in the Ausbund, "is no longer sung in [Amish] religious services but, strange to say, at weddings and other festive occasions." According to the article "Eine alte interessante Bibel," published in Der Zionspilger (Langnau i.E.) VIII (1889) No. 17, pp. 1 f., Haslibacher's Bible (Zürich, 1553), with many underlinings showing typical Anabaptist emphases, was still in 1889 in the possession of his descendants bearing the family name and living on the original homestead, though not Mennonites.

H.S.B.

S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 183-87; C. Henry Smith, The Mennonites of America (Goshen, 1909) 433-35; Berner Biographien I (Bern, 1887) 604 f.; A. Michiels, Les Anabaptists des Vosges (Paris, 1860) contains the Haslibacher story ("Le Martyre d'Hasslibacher") told in French but taken apparently from the Pirmasens (1780) Martyrs' Mirror owned by Elder Augsburger of the Salm (Alsace) congregation; ML II, 263 f.

Haslinger, Leonhard, an Anabaptist martyr, a furrier at Wels (Upper Austria), was one of the ten Anabaptists who were put to death at Wels according to the "list of the brethren and sisters who were executed in many places for the sake of their testimony to divine truth." The first were two shoemakers, both named Wastl; on the Friday after Pentecost 1528 the following were also beheaded and then burned: Hans Neumair; Leonhard Haslinger, a furrier; Hans Steinpeck, a mason; Jörg Zacherle, a furrier of Krems; M. Perger and Jörg Kreutzinger, servants; on the following Monday two women were drowned, Barbara, Haslinger's wife, and Barbara, Zacherle's wife. A report of the captain of June 8, 1528, says, "They would not give an affidavit nor swear an oath, also rejected infant baptism, the sacrament of the altar, and the confessional, but still were not mob-leaders or preachers, baptized nobody, and confessed no other covenant than that they said they wanted to desist from evil and help their neighbors as much as possible, and be obedient to the government with body and goods." Of Hans Steinpeck's wife the report says, "She is pregnant—shall be postponed until she has given birth to the child."

LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 280; J. Jäkel, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Oberösterreich," 47th Annual Report of the Museum of Linz; ML II, 264.

Hasselbach, a village (1925 pop., 239) in the Sinsheim district of Baden, Germany, three miles northeast of Steinsfurt, the seat of a Mennonite church, concerning whose origin little is known. The fact that in 1575 the Dutch Mennonites sent three preachers to the brethren in the Neckar Valley (see Grombach) proves that there were Anabaptists here in the 16th century. Another clue to the existence of this early congregation is the name Wiedertäuferkirche given to part of a forest an hour northeast of Hasselbach (Gem.-Kal., 1904, 142). During the period of persecution and before they were tolerated they seem to have met for services in remote places.

In the 17th century the Anabaptists in the Sinsheim district were still compelled to hold their meetings secretly in forests. Thus in 1653 the parson Johann Friedrich Schärer of Hilsbach reported to his inspector in Sinsheim that the Mennonites were planning a marriage ceremony in a forest. That they met in forests was also confirmed by the leaders of a Mennonite meeting attended by 53 persons in Steinsfurt at nine on the evening of March 2, 1661, in the home of a widow, which was disbanded by the authorities when they began to sing. Five of the participants had to be security for all the rest, whose names were taken, and to vow to present themselves for punishment. On March 29 they explained to the authorities at Hilsbach that they had come into the country with their brethren in 1655, all of whom came from Switzerland, and that they had frequently during the summer assembled quietly in the forests near Steinsfurt, without informing anyone. They would not cease to hold meetings; they would prefer to emigrate. The government fined them (July 6, 1661) 100 Reichstaler for meeting secretly. But they continued to meet every Sunday. In reply to an inquiry by Inspector Peter Grill in Sinsheim, Nov. 16, 1661, whether he should let the Mennonites continue, Elector Karl Ludwig ordered (Jan. 4, 1662) that the Mennonites should no longer be forbidden to meet, in spite of an opinion by the church council of Dec. 6, 1661, recommending the contrary. But every participant was to pay a fee each time he attended a meeting. An electoral concession of Aug. 4, 1664, ended the taxation of their services, but not more than 20 persons were permitted to attend (Mennonite court records in the Generallandesarchiv at Karlsruhe).

The Mennonites living in Hasselbach and vicinity today are all of Swiss descent. When their ancestors were expelled from Bern at the close of the 17th century they were received on the estates of the knighted nobles. Most of these estates were farmed for generations by Mennonites, as in Ehrstädt, Helmstadt, Grombach, Ober- and Unterbiegelhof, Rauhof, and Wagenbach. A congregation was formed in Hasselbach; the earliest reference to it is in 1731, when it numbered 18 families, whose heads are named by Ernst Müller (Berner Täufer, 209). Their preacher was Abraham Zeisset of the Rauhof, who frequently visited the Swiss churches (church records of the Sembach Mennonite Church, p. 260) and maintained connections with the churches of the Palatinate and in Danzig (Gem.-Kal., 1896, 89; see also 1930, 140-42; also Müller, 212 f.). The Büchelhof (q.v.) and Helmstadt (q.v.) congregations later merged with the Hasselbach congregation.

The Dutch Naamlijst, which calls this congregation "Hasselbach, Martishof, Helmstein, and Senfeld," lists the following preachers in the 18th century: Hans Kaufmann from 1754, Hans Grebeil (Krehbiel) from 1761, Abraham Schmutz and Christian Schmutz from 1764, Abraham Krehbiel and Johannes Bechtel from 1767, Georg Hotel from 1786, and Jacob Funck from 1792.

In the 19th century the congregation was the center of the Mennonites of Baden. Its elders Ulrich Hege of the Unterbiegelhof and Heinrich Landes of Ehrstädt, with Christian Schmutz of the neighboring church at Rappenau, were the most prominent leaders of the churches in Baden. In the 20th century the Hasselbach congregation suffered a decrease by emigration to other districts. Many Mennonites in Württemberg and southern Bavaria are descendants of former Hasselbach members. With Ober- and Unterbiegelhof the village of Hasselbach had 45 Mennonites in 1821. It was thus the fourth largest congregation in Baden: Mannheim had 93, Dühren 54, and Ittlingen 46 members. In 1925 there were only 19 Mennonites living in Hasselbach, 33 in Ehrstädt, 22 in Helmstadt, 21 in Neckarbischofsheim (the part of Helmhof in Baden), 12 in Grombach, 5 in Flinsbach, and one each in Babstadt and Obergimpern. The six Mennonites living in the Hessian enclave of Helmhof were also members of the Hasselbach congregation, which in 1935 numbered 135 souls. In 1953 the baptized membership was 86, the elder was Heinrich Funck (ordained 1943), deacon David Moser (ordained 1939). Since 1846 the congregation has had its own meetinghouse, until recently the only Mennonite meetinghouse in Baden-Württemberg. Services are held every Sunday and holiday. HEGE.

Die Religionszugehörigkeit in Baden in den letzten 100 Jahren (Karlsruhe, 1927) 74; Müller, Berner Täufer; ML II, 264 f.

Hasselt, a town in the Dutch province of Overijssel, on the Zwarte Water. It was at Bergklooster near Hasselt that the boats landed on March 24, 1534, which had transported 3,000 Anabaptists from North Holland en route to Münster (q.v.). They were all arrested here. (See Bergklooster.) vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst., I, Nos. 22, 23, 30, 32, 45; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 94, 102; Mellink, Wederdopers, 31-39, 106, 158.

Hast, Johan (1808-52), a German Catholic scholar, author of Geschichte der Wiedertäufer zu Münster von ihrem Entstehen zu Zwickau in Sachsen bis auf ihren Sturz zu Münster in Westfalen (Münster, 1836). The reader who judges from the title of the book that this is a traditional treatment of the subject is pleasantly surprised by the contents. Even if the author incorrectly derives the Anabaptists from the Zwickau "prophets" and logically has them end in the Münster revolt, he nevertheless shows an admirable understanding and evaluation of this religious movement, tries to interpret it in the light of its noble religious motives, and describes it (from a Catholic point of view) in a highly objective manner, on the basis of sources, which he, however, unfortunately sometimes fails to cite. NEFF.

Sonntagsblatt für katholische Christen (Münster, 1843) 638; E. Rassmann, Nachrichten von dem Leben und den Schriften Münsterländischer Schriftsteller des 18. u. 19. Jahrhunderts (Münster, 1866) 140; ML II, 265.

Hastenrath (Hastenraedt, Haustelraed), Theunis (Thönis, Teunis, Tonnis) van, an Anabaptist elder and martyr, burned at the stake at Linnich on the Roer, Germany, on June 30, 1551. Theunis van Hastenraedt, who is identical with Anthonis von Asselroye or Assenray, was a native of Hastenrath, Germany, near the Dutch town of Roermond. After his conversion he studied the Holy Scriptures for 15 years, during which time he seldom preached. He also read the books of Menno Simons. As an elder he preached and baptized after 1545 in many towns of the duchies of Jülich and Upper-Gelre. Among the places where he was baptizing, he himself mentions Illikhoven, Loevenich, Hastenrath, Weert, Maastricht, Cologne, Monschau, Cleve, and Goch. In 1547 he was present at a meeting of Mennonite elders at Goch, where Adam Pastor was excommunicated. His interesting confession at his trial appeared in DB 1909. NEFF, vdZ.

DB 1890, 58-59; 1894, 18; 1909, 120-26; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 306-09, 406-10 and Index; Mart. Mir. D 97, E 495; ML II, 265.

Hastings (Neb.) Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, was a small congregation existing from 1878 to 1920. Ministers who served it were Johannes Brehm and Adam Ross.

Hat. The history of costume (q.v.) in the Mennonite Church has not yet been exhaustively studied. From the very beginning of the Anabaptist movement in Switzerland and the Netherlands in the 16th century considerable emphasis fell on simplicity of life including attire. Within a century or thereabouts the tendency appeared in some areas for the church to freeze for greater or longer periods the more conservative forms of clothing.

A. Women's Hats. Among the more conservative groups in America the matter of women's headgear ultimately became a major concern. The Swiss Mennonite women of southeastern Pennsylvania undoubtedly wore plain and simple headgear from the first, likely a form of beaver hat, or the old flat hat which in some parts of Europe (in England, e.g.) were the predecessor of the bonnet. It appears that under the influence of the Society of Friends in the Philadelphia area, the Mennonite women of the Lancaster Conference and of much of the Franconia Conference adopted the "Quaker bonnet" perhaps early in the 19th century. Some of the more conservative areas of the Franconia Conference showed some resistance to the adoption of this plain bonnet. The mother of the late bishop George J. Lapp (1879-1951) and wife of Deacon Samuel W. Lapp (1833-1926) of the Lexington congregation in Bucks Co., Pa., never wore this Quaker bonnet until her family moved to Nebraska in 1878. She had felt that such bonnets were worn for "pride." It was not until 1912 that the Franconia Conference finally fell in line with the other district conferences of the Mennonites (MC) by making the wearing of a bonnet a test of membership. During much of the 19th century, and in some areas until the present, the wearing of the bonnet is made a test of church membership (MC). Since 1920 or earlier there has been discontinuance of the bonnet in many of the conferences west of eastern Pennsylvania, although the church has stressed the wearing of simple headgear, and although many ministers continue to protest against the wearing of "hats," viz., forms of headgear with brims or ornaments. The Mennonite women of Ontario did not adopt the "Quaker" bonnet but wore the "English" or "Queen Victoria" type of hat (or bonnet). Under the influence of the United States Mennonites this hat was gradually supplanted in the first quarter of the 20th century by the "American" or "Dutch" bonnet, which in turn is again disappearing and being gradually replaced by more conventional headgear. (See Bonnet.)

The Old Colony Mennonites of Mexico still wear flat broad-brimmed straw hats of a shape similar to the flat beaver hats of 18th-century Pennsylvania. (See Menn. Life for January 1952, which presents several photographs of these hats.) In the Dutch Country (Lancaster, 1953) carries (p. 11) a picture of the 18th-century Pennsylvania flat hat. The museum of the York Co., Pa., Historical Society contains several sketches by Lewis Miller (1796-1882) purporting to portray Mennonite costumes for both men and women of the time of his youth (ca. 1810), which show the broad flat hats on both men and women. S. F. Coffman's (1872-1954) article, "Mennonite Dress Customs" in the Mennonite Historical Bulletin for January 1955, tells of the earlier wearing of the broad-brimmed beaver hats in the Vineland, Ont., community as reported by the older people in 1895. A Pennsylvania Amish discipline of 1809 prohibits the wearing of hats. (Priscilla Delp, "History Makes Bonnets," Christian Living II, 1955, 14-22.) J.C.W.

B. Men's Hats. The history of the Mennonite men's hat is somewhat similar. The eastern Pennsylvania men, including the Amish, generally adopted the "Quaker" broad-brimmed, flat-crowned (uncreased) hat, although this was not commonly done farther west or in Ontario. In the 20th century the style was supplanted, except among the eastern Pennsylvania Amish, by the conventional American men's hat, though usually the crease was omitted by the preachers. In other sections no distinctive hat was worn by either laity or ministers. However, until recently it was common practice for the ministers to wear only black hats. For a time in some sections, at least in Ontario in the second half of the 19th century, the "high hat" or topper was worn by a number of Mennonite men to funerals, weddings, and even to church services. The Old Colony Mennonite men of Manitoba and elsewhere resisted the introduction of hats, wearing instead the peasant type of cap worn in Russia. In South Germany during the mid-19th century the more conservative men wore the French type 3-cornered hat long after the remaining population had abandoned this style. H.S.B.

Hatfield Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, located in Montgomery Co., Pa., was organized in 1879. In 1953 the congregation had 130 members with W. A. Heffner serving as pastor. H.K.K.

Hattavier (Hattawer), Izak, a Dutch merchant of Amsterdam, where he died 1657, was a member and likely a deacon or elder of the Reformed (Walloon) or Lutheran church of his home town. Through his business connections becoming acquainted with the troubles of the persecuted Anabaptists at Zürich, Switzerland, he informed the Mennonites of Amsterdam concerning the fate of their Swiss brethren about 1643. Thereupon the Amsterdam Mennonites through the intercession of Hattavier sent 200 Talers to Zürich for their coreligionists. A proposal was made to have them migrate to Holland, but this was fruitless. Hattavier corresponded with J. H. Ott (Ottius) in Zürich in 1645 and asked whether the rumors that the Anabaptists there were severely persecuted were true or not. Ott answered that the accounts were true but largely exaggerated. Hattavier was not a Mennonite as Anna Brons states. Van Braght, who mentions (Mart. Mir. D 805, E 1,104) that Hattavier was present when Hans Landis was decapitated in Zürich in 1614, also says (D 820, E 1,119) that in 1642 the city government of Amsterdam wrote a letter to the government of Zürich in behalf of the presecuted. vdZ.

J. H. Ottius, Annales Anabaptistici (Basel, 1672) 302 ff., 327 ff.; A. Brons, Ursprung, Entwicklung und Schicksale . . . der Mennoniten (3rd ed. Amsterdam, 1912) 189 f.; Müller, Berner Täufer, 178; ML III, 327.

Hauck, Albert (1845-1918), a Protestant theologian, professor of theology at the University of Leipzig. He edited the second and third editions of the Realenzyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche, in which the Anabaptists are given thorough historical treatment and a just evaluation. He also gives the Anabaptists proper consideration in his book, Ueber Trennung von Kirche und Staat (Leipzig, 1912). On the maternal side Hauck was a descendant of the Mennonite Greiner family of Württemberg (see Blasius Greiner). (ML II, 265.) NEFF.

Haug (Hauch, Haugk, Hawg), Jörg, of Juchsen (Thuringia), a friend of Hans Hut (q.v.) and the author of a devotional tract of 1524 which became very popular among the Anabaptists. About his life we know only what Hans Hut stated at the hearing before the city court of Augsburg in 1527. During the time of the great Peasants' War in Thuringia (1524-25) the peasants had burned down the castle of the lord of Bibra, and had made Jörg Haug (apparently he himself was also a peasant from near-by Juchsen) the preacher of the village of Bibra. Late in May 1525, soon after the final collapse of the peasants, Haug invited Hans Hut, the former sexton of that parish, to preach to his congregation about baptism, a theme everyone was most eager to learn about (Meyer, 250).

Haug's tract bears the title, Eine christliche Ordnung eines wahrhaften Christen zu verantworten die Ankunft seines Glaubens (or shortened: Anfang eines christlichen Lebens), 1524, a pamphlet of 12 leaves 4°. Its motto is I Peter 3:15, so popular among Anabaptists. The idea of the tract is that a Christian life has to run through different stages of growth in order to arrive finally at the point of perfection where the mind becomes completely conformed to Christ, and may now experience "the right Sabbath where the Spirit resteth" (Is. 11). The gradual ascent to this goal is described by seven types of mindedness or spirit; viz., the spirit of reverence, of wisdom, of understanding, of counsel, of strength, of patience, and of godliness. Haug concludes with the following summary (Müller, 10):

Gott fürchten von Herzen ist Weisheit,
Das Böse meiden ist Verstand,
Verstand göttlicher Liebe gebiert Glauben, und ist gut denen, die ihn tun,
Sich nicht verrücken lassen ist Rat,
Sich selbst überwinden ist Stärke,
Alles in Gott richten und tragen ist Kunst,
Christo Jesu ähnlich werden und gleichgesinnt sein, ist Gottseligkeit.
Da ruhet alles und ist der rechte Sabbath, den Gott von uns erfordert, dem die ganze Welt aber widerstrebt.

The tract is remarkable in many ways. Written in 1524 at the height of the peasants' success, it completely neglects their revolutionary ideas and turns radically to the teaching of spiritual growth in love and obedience. "The fear of God brings forth obedience. Love brings forth the right faith, and faith worketh through love. Love, however, is the fulfillment of the law" (Müller, 8). This speaks strongly for an understanding of the peasant movement of the 1520's not primarily as a socio-economic affair but as a deeply religious longing for the right Christian way. As Hut stated in the report (above), "They were running after him to learn about [right] baptism, and everybody wanted to be instructed on that point." Second, the book was written before genuine Anabaptism began; the influence of Thomas Müntzer is possible but not certain. Yet its spirit of obedience, love, and self-conquest (Geist der Stärke) is exactly the spirit of the later Anabaptism. And what Haug calls Geist der Kunst, namely, to bear everything in God, is rather close to the idea of Gelassenheit (q.v.) or self-surrender, again central in Anabaptist thinking.

Thus it is not surprising that the booklet saw four editions (Keller, Reformation, 433), and was also copied many times by the Hutterites. From such a Hutterite manuscript book (in Esztergom) Lydia Müller published excerpts in her Glaubenszeugnisse; unfortunately, no complete modern reprint is available. R.F.

L. Müller, Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter (Leipzig, 1938) 3-10; Ch. Meyer, "Die Anfänge des Wiedertäufertums in Augsburg," Ztscht des Hist. Ver. f. Schwaben XIX (1874) 250 (document XIX); Keller, Reformation, 433.

Haury (Hauri), a Mennonite family stemming from the Aargau, Switzerland. Since a very early date the Hauri family living in Hirschtal, Lenzburg district (as distinguished from the Hauri family living in Reinach), belonged to the Swiss Brethren. After the Thirty Years' War a number of Haurys, under the pressure of persecution to which they were subjected in Switzerland, emigrated to South Germany. On one of the four boats that left Switzerland for the Netherlands in 1711 there was a weaver by the name of Hans Haury from Hirschtal and his family.

There are still numerous bearers of the name in Switzerland, South Germany, and North America. The ancestor of the Mennonites among them is Jakob Haury, presumably a descendant of the above Hans Haury, who came as a farmer from Bruchhausen near Mannheim to the Bolanderhof near Kirchheimbolanden (Palatinate) in 1745 and married the widow of Christian Stauffer. Jakob Haury (d. 1789) was an elder of the Weierhof Mennonite congregation. Some of his progeny settled in Bavaria in 1820 (Eichstock congregation) and later emigrated to America; others went directly to America. Among his descendants were S. S. Haury (1847-1929) and Gustav A. Haury (1863-1926).

During the middle of the past century members of the Haury family from Germany settled in Mennonite communities in Illinois (Trenton and Summerfield). Daniel Haury, a member of the Mennonite church at Summerfield, Ill., joined Christian Krehbiel when he moved to Halstead, Kan. Richard S. Haury, a practicing physician in Newton, Kan., was his son. S. S. Haury (q.v.), a graduate of Wadsworth Seminary, also went west and became the first missionary of the General Conference Mennonite Church. Later he practiced medicine. Gustav A. Haury (q.v., 1863-1926) was a teacher at Bethel College, North Newton, Kan., as was also his son G. A. Haury, Jr. Another son of G. A. Haury, Emil W. Haury (b. 1904), is head of the Department of Anthropology and director of the Arizona State Museum. Most of the Haurys of Mennonite faith now live in Kansas and are descendants of the Haurys who settled in Illinois a century ago. He.H., C.K.

J. A. Heiz, Die Täufer im Aargau (Aarau, 1902); Müller, Berner Täufer.

Haury, Gustav A. (1863-1926), Mennonite (GCM) leader and teacher. He was born in Franklin, Lee Co., Iowa, on Jan. 15, 1863, died in Newton, Kan., on June 18, 1926. He moved to McPherson Co., Kan., in 1879, attended Halstead Seminary 1887-88 and the University of Kansas 1888-90, after which he was principal of the Hillsboro public schools 1890-92 and instructor in the Halstead Seminary 1892-93. On June 11, 1891, he married Clara Ruth. Of his four sons, Irvin and Gustav A., Jr., also taught at Bethel College. Emil is a noted archaeologist in Arizona.

G. A. Haury was one of the educators responsible for moving the Halstead Seminary (q.v.) to Newton to establish Bethel College in 1893, remaining on the faculty of the school until the end of his life. He taught Latin, German, English, and other subjects, served as secretary of the faculty (dean), and was editor of the School and College Journal, later the Bethel College Monthly, which carried many of his articles. From 1910 he was treasurer and business manager of the college. He was highly esteemed as a teacher, and was a man of keen intellect and a strong personality. Upon his death the college established a memorial chair, the G. A. Haury Professorship in Classical Languages and German. C.K.

Mennonite Yearbook and Almanac (Berne, Ind., 1927) 45 ff.; P. J. Wedel, The Story of Bethel College (North Newton, 1954) 40, 83, 109, 112, 139, 173, 198, 303, 313; Mennonite Weekly Review, June 30, 1926, p. 3; Bethel College Monthly (Newton, Kan.) June 15, 1926, p. 1 ff.; Oct. 15, 1926, p. 1 ff.

Haury, Samuel S. (1847-1929), Mennonite (GCM) missionary, was born Nov. 21, 1847, near Ingolstadt, Bavaria, Germany, emigrated with his parents to America in 1856, and settled on a farm near Summerfield, Ill. He was married to Susie L. Hirschler in November 1879. Seven children, four daughters and three sons, were born to this union.

Haury received his elementary education near Summerfield, Ill., and then entered Wadsworth Seminary when it opened its doors in 1868, and was graduated in 1871. Later that year he went to Barmen, Germany, to take a theological course and was graduated from there in 1875. He then entered Jefferson Medical College at Philadelphia, Pa., but his studies were interrupted when he became ill with spinal meningitis. After serving in the mission field he entered St. Louis Medical College (Washington Medical) and received his degree in 1889.

Haury was the first missionary sent out by the General Conference Mennonites. In 1879 he and J. B. Baer visited Alaska as a possible mission field for the Conference. He entered mission work among the Arapahoe Indians in Indian Territory (Oklahoma) in 1880. Here he served for seven years as the first missionary not only of the General Conference but of all Mennonites of America. He was the author of a number of pamphlets: Briefe über die Ausbreitung des Evangeliums in der Heidenwelt (Heilbronn, 1878); Bericht von dem Missionar Haury an die Mitglieder der Missions-Behörde (1882); Die Wehrlosigkeit in der Sonntagschule (Dayton, 1894).

After graduating from medical college he practiced medicine in Moundridge, Kan., until 1894, and in Newton until 1913, when he moved to Upland, Cal., remaining there with his family until his death on May 19, 1929. (Mennonite Yearbook, 1930; ML II, 265.) E.G.K.

Hauser, Josef, originally a clergyman in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, then a teacher in Zofingen. In 1588 he was deposed from this position and the next year went to Moravia, where he joined the Hutterites. His wife Anna Abdorf was permitted to live in Bern with their children. In 1590 Hauser returned to Zofingen, was seized and taken to Bern. Released, he went back to Moravia, where he was chosen preacher of the church at Neumühl, March 9, 1594, and confirmed Jan. 18, 1596.

In 1603 he was sent with five other brethren to Prussia to "look through these countries with the Gospel" (Geschichts-Bücher, 337). "There they found many Mennonites, who were, to be sure, also divided among themselves, known as Hard Frisians, House-Buyers (Huiskoper, q.v.), Klärische (q.v.), Mundauer, Bekumberte (see Bekommerden), Waterlanders, and Abgeteilte" (Geschicht-Buch, 470). Two of his companions were Michael Grossmann (q.v.) and Karl Schneider. They traveled from Danzig to Denmark. There they visited several persons, and because they did not know the language they returned to Danzig, and from there to Moravia in the fall. In the following year (1604) Hauser was again sent to Prussia with seven other brethren and their wives and children (a total of 37 persons). "They made contact with Klaus Philip, a Mennonite lacemaker of Elbing, to get permission to settle in Elbing and vicinity, since they had heard that in Prussia everybody had religious freedom. Upon presenting a petition to the city for admission, they were asked whether they had found anyone who wished to join them in Elbing. They replied that there were such persons in and about the city, as well as on the Marcushof and Wengeln, two villages in the Marienburg district, which belonged to Poland. On Oct. 11 the brethren were informed that they could not count on tolerance in the city. On Oct. 16 they presented a new appeal to the council, to which they received the reply on Oct. 28 after their return from Danzig that the council would adhere to its previous decision" (Geschicht-Buch, 470).

The Hutterite chronicles call Hauser a highly gifted man, well versed in Hebrew, Latin, French, and German. He is the author of a manuscript, Unterrichtung, dass die Gemeinschaft der zeitlichen Güter eine Lehre des Neuen Testaments sei und von allen Gläubigen erfordert werde (1605, in Budapest); and of two hymns, "Ein Lied der 1605 nach Preussen ziehenden Brüder" (16 stanzas) and "Jetzt ist die Zeit beikommen" (11 stanzas). He died Jan. 3, 1616, at Pribitz in Moravia. NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; J. A. Heiz, Die Täufer im Aargau (Aarau, 1902) 56; Wolkan, Lieder, 240; Loserth, Communismus, 106; L. Neubaur, "Mährische Brüder in Elbing," Ztscht f. Kirchengesch. XXXIII (1912) 447-55; ML II, 265 f.

Haushaben, a name often used for the Hutterite Bruderhofs: see Households and Bruderhof.

Hausknecht, David, a Mennonite teacher in Russia, born in Switzerland, who came to Russia during the great immigration near the turn of the century and conducted a private boys' school at Einlage on the Dniepr in the 1830's. Since there were few Russian schools in this region, many Russian nobles and merchants entrusted the education of their sons to Hausknecht. His principles of instruction and education were suggestive of Pestalozzi's ideas. He even used pictorial illustrations and other auxiliary material.

Hausknecht was a serious student of nature, and with his students wandered through the interesting vicinity of the school to make botanical, zoological, and mineralogical studies. Even astronomy was not foreign to him. He lived entirely for and with his pupils, and as an excellent teacher held their interest in education. He was the first teacher of a secondary school in the Chortitza region. After his death Heinrich Heese (q.v.) continued the school. His son, D. Hausknecht, was the first teacher of the Bruderschule at Gnadenfeld (q.v.). D.H.E.

Friesen, Brüderschaft; A. Neufeld, Die Choritzer Zentralschule (Berdyansk, 1893); ML II, 267.

Hausrath, Adolf (1837-1909), a Protestant theologian, professor of New Testament exegesis and church history at the University of Heidelberg. Under the pseudonym of Georg Taylor he wrote several historical novels and tales. One of them, Klytia (1883), treats Anabaptism in a sensitive and attractive spirit. The miller Werner, who plays a subordinate role in it, is a splendid Anabaptist figure. (Menn. Bl. 1910, 93 f.; Comeniusblätter, 1920, 121.) Of Hausrath's other books mention should be made of Weltverbesserer im Mittelalter (3 vv., 1891-95), and the novel, Die Albigenserin (1902). Klytia was reprinted after World War I by H. P. Krehbiel at Newton, Kan. (ML II, 268.) NEFF.

Haute-Marne, a departement in eastern France, formed from parts of the earlier provinces of Champagne and Bourgogne. Several rivers, the Aube, Marne, and Meuse, have their source here and form fertile valleys with rich pasture land, well adapted to cattle raising. But grain cultivation is also a prominent occupation.

The Mennonites of this region live for the most part on large farms, far apart, surrounded by Catholics. Here and there they have contacts with individual Protestant families, usually Swiss, who work in the numerous cheese factories. The first Mennonite families came in the middle of the 19th century from the departements of Meuse and Vosges, and soon formed a congregation. Their first elders were Goldschmidt and Rediger. Since that time there has been a persistent urge from eastern France to move westward, which brings in new families with a definite tendency to settle in the interior of France.

The church known as "Assemblée de la Haute-Marne" numbered (1925) about 40 families with 160 souls, who lived scattered throughout the departement and beyond. Meetings were held every two weeks in the homes of the members. Services were formerly followed by a common meal, since most had to come from a distance. Often members came on Saturday and returned home on Monday. The use of automobiles now facilitates attendance. Frequently the round trip covers 140 miles or more.

Originally the services were conducted in German, and the Ausbund (q.v.) was the hymnal used, but this congregation was the first to use French; religious instruction was given in French about 1850. Like all the congregations in France, this congregation was originally Amish. In 1953 the membership was about 100 souls, with four elders, all Kennels, and four preachers, all Kennels but one, viz., Pelsy. (ML II, 268.) P. So.

Hauteryve, van: see Outrijve, van.

Havelte, a town in the Dutch province of Drente (q.v.), where until 1650 were found a number of Mennonites. In 1608 the Reformed pastor of Havelte made a complaint at the synod that Mennonites of his town refused to have their children baptized. Nothing is known about a congregation in Havelte. vdZ.

Reitsma-van Veen, Acten der provinciale en particuliere Synoden VIII (Groningen, 1899) 90; ML I, 478.

Hawkesville, a village in Waterloo Co., Ont., situated five miles northwest of St. Jacobs. The St. Jacobs Mennonite (MC) congregation undertook an outpost Sunday school here about 1930. For three years the enrollment held between 30 and 44. The Ontario Mennonite Conference assigned ministers to fill preaching appointments until local interest was lost due to activity of a Brethren group. About 15 years later the Mennonite Conference through the St. Jacobs congregation purchased a church in the village and organized a congregation. The membership in 1953 was 120, the minister Paul Martin, and the deacon Oscar Snyder. J.C.F.

Hawkesville Old Order Mennonite Church, one of the three meetinghouses of the David Martin O.O.M. group, is located near Hawkesville (q.v.), Waterloo Co., Ont.

Hawthornden State Hospital, a modern mental hospital located about half way between Cleveland and Akron, Ohio, was the place of service of CPS Unit No. 72, approved by Selective Service in November 1942 and closed Oct. 1, 1946. The unit, under the direction of the MCC, performed a variety of tasks, but about half of the men were attendants on the wards. M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, 1949) 226.

Haxenberg, Willibald von, chamberlain of King Ladislas IV of Poland, in 1642 received from this king all the properties of the Mennonites in Prussia, both in the cities and in the country, because "this people has settled in our country without permission and are harming the trade of our citizens." Von Haxenberg took advantage of his privilege to extort 80,000 guilders annually from the Mennonites. By supplications and large gifts to the king, the Mennonites secured from him in December 1642 the cancellation of the privileges given to von Haxenberg. The good will of the king to the Mennonites lasted only until 1647, and after the death of Ladislas IV, von Haxenberg again contacted the Mennonites asking them for two guilders pro "Hufe" under the pretext that he would procure freedom of religion for them. The Mennonites, upon complaint to the new King John II Casimir, were on July 16, 1650, granted an edict which ordered that no one should extort from the Mennonites under the pretext of their faith. vdZ.

F. Szper, Nederlandsche Nederzettingen in West Pruisen gedurende den Poolschen tijd (Enkhuizen, 1913) 210-15.

Hay (Township) Amish Mennonite Church, Huron Co., Ont., was established by settlers from Waterloo County in 1848, when Bishop John Oesch (d. 1850) arrived. Early families were Baechler, Gingerich, Kuepfer, Erb, Gerber, Gascho, Schantz, Bender, Egli, Schwartzendruber, and Wuetherich. The meetinghouse was built in 1884. The first preacher ordained was Joseph Wutherich (ord. 1849), the second John Egli, who moved away in 1860. John Gascho served as preacher 1876-1908. The small congregation was served by bishops from Waterloo County except when Bishop Eli Frey of Wauseon, Ohio, served 1915-23. In 1908 some 50 members transferred to the Mennonite Church (MC), which constituted the beginning of the Zurich (q.v.) Mennonite congregation. In 1954 the Hay A.M. membership was 72, with Ephraim Gingerich serving as pastor. The congregation is a member of the Ontario Amish Mennonite Conference. H.S.B.

L. J. Burkholder, A Brief History of the Mennonites in Ontario (Markham, 1935) 238-42.

Hay (Township) Mennonite (MC) Church, near Zurich, Huron Co., Ont., became extinct about 1900, although one surviving member was incorporated into the new Zurich (q.v.) congregation established at about the same location in 1908. The community was settled in 1835-60 by Mennonite families from the Waterloo County and Markham communities: Wideman, Otterbein, Vincent, Detweiler, Lehman, Wambold, Martin, Clemens, Bechtel, Reesor, Baer, Newschwanger. A meetinghouse was built about 1864, three miles south of Zurich. The first minister was Daniel Brundage 1850-58, the first deacon Abraham Vincent, ordained in 1851. Henry Newschwanger served as minister about 1857-70, Henry B. Detwiler 1874-93. Without a resident minister from 1893 on, the membership, which was 35 in 1883, dwindled and finally disappeared. The congregation was a member of the Ontario Mennonite Conference. H.S.B.

L. J. Burkholder, A Brief History of the Mennonites in Ontario (Markham, 1935) 37, 101, 125.

Haycock Mennonite Church (MC), located near Applebachsville in Haycock Twp., Bucks Co., Pa., member of the Franconia Conference, originated in 1937. It was at first a mission outpost with services conducted in a schoolhouse; a church building was erected in 1941. The first minister, Stanley Beidler, was ordained in 1942 (bishop, 1943). By 1940 the membership was 10. In 1953 it was 77. J.C.W.

Haze Claesdochter of Poeldijk, Dutch province of South Holland, an unmarried woman, joined in the Anabaptist revolt at Poeldijk (q.v.) in February 1536 and was drowned (likely at The Hague) on March 18, 1536. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; E. van Bergen, "De Wederdoopers in het Westland," in Bijdr. v.d. Geschiedenis v.h. Bisdom Haarlem XXVIII (Leiden, 1903) 278 f.

Hazelton, Iowa, the address of two Old Order Amish Mennonite church districts in Buchanan Co. (q.v.), Iowa. M.G.

Hazenpoet, Gerrit, an Anabaptist martyr: see Gerrit Hazenpoot.

Hazerswoude (formerly usually called Hasersouw), a village in the Dutch province of South Holland, where strong Anabaptist activity of the revolutionary type was found in 1535, resulting in a revolt in the last day of that year, in which 60 persons, both men and women, participated. The revolt was rigorously suppressed by the government and most participants were killed or executed some time after. About 1650 and apparently much earlier there were two Mennonite congregations at Hazerswoude, of which there is only sparse information. Both were small; one belonged to the Flemish branch, the other to the Waterlanders. They seem to have merged at the end of the 17th century. This united congregation, which for more than a hundred years was considerably supported by the congregations of Rotterdam, Haarlem, and Amsterdam, belonged to the Zonist (q.v.) Conference. In 1726 it liberally contributed to the need of Mennonites in Prussia. In 1792 it numbered only eight members and in 1797 it died out. The last preacher was Aris Baas 1769-95; his predecessor, Adriaan Koenen (q.v.) 1725-ca. 67, was appointed in 1740 to go to Danzig, Prussia, to settle the quarrels which had arisen in that congregation. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 143, 145, 150, 152-55, 157, 159, 162, 167, 1164; II, Nos. 1808, 1811, 1905, 2141; II, 2, Nos. 82-97; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 186 f., 199; ML II, 268.

Head Covering: see Prayer Veiling.

Heatwole (Hütwohl, Hetwol, Hetwold, Heetweel, Hutwell, Hiedwohl, and Heatwol), a Mennonite (MC) family name. It appeared in the 17th-century records with Johann Georg Hutwohl at Steeg near Bacharach on the Rhine, the father and grandfather of Mathias Heatwole, the progenitor of nearly all the Heatwoles in America today, who came to Pennsylvania in 1748. His son David Heatwole, a shoemaker by trade, moved south to Franklin Co., Pa., and then to Virginia, and became the ancestor of the Heatwoles of Virginia. The Heatwole family has produced more than its quota of leaders and distinguished men—educators, physicians, and churchmen. Two bishops (L. J. Heatwole, 1852-1932, q.v., A. P. Heatwole) and at least eight ministers and two deacons with this family name have served or are serving the Mennonite churches in Virginia. Bishop J. A. Heatwole (1871-1940) served churches in and around La Junta, Col.; R. J. Heatwole (1847-1921) was a prominent pioneer in Kansas.

In the 17th and 18th centuries there were members of this family living in the Palatinate (see Huthwohl). H.A.B.

D. A. Heatwole, A History of the Heatwole Family (Dale Enterprise, Va., 1882); C. J. Heatwole, History of the Heatwole Family (n.p., n.d., 1907).

Heatwole, Jacob A. (1871-1940), a Mennonite (MC) bishop of Colorado, son of Joseph F. Heatwole, was born in Harrisonburg, Va., Sept. 28, 1871. On Dec. 30, 1888, he was received into the Mennonite Church (MC) by Bishop Samuel Coffman. In 1890 he attended school at the Peabody Teachers' Normal at Harrisonburg, Va., and 1892-94 the West Central Academy, Mt. Clinton, Va. He taught school for 12 years in Rockingham Co., Va. On Dec. 25, 1895, he was married to Bertha Showalter, who died May 24, 1934. This union was blest with four daughters and two sons. In March 1907 he and family moved from Harrisonburg to La Junta, which was his home until the time of his death. During this time, because of his friendly and sociable disposition, he became widely known in the community.

J. A. Heatwole was ordained to the ministry Jan. 2, 1902, by Bishop Anthony Heatwole and to the office of bishop at La Junta, on March 16, 1919, by Bishop D. H. Bender. While in Virginia he worked in the ministry with his father and A. D. Wenger in the West Virginia mountains and at the Clinton, Weaver, Bank, and Pike churches. In the La Junta Mennonite Church he served as minister and bishop, and as bishop of the East Holbrook, Limon, and Manitou churches.

In October 1912 Heatwole was elected by the Kansas-Nebraska Conference as a member of the Local Board of the Mennonite Sanitarium and on Nov. 6, 1912, in the organization of the board he was elected vice-president, and on Sept. 9, 1921, president of the board. He served in this capacity to the time of his death. A.H.E.

Heatwole, Lewis James (1852-1932), a Mennonite (MC) bishop and writer, the oldest of the eleven children of David A. and Cathrine Driver Heatwole, was born Dec. 4, 1852, at Dale Enterprise, Va. On Nov. 11, 1875, he married Mary Alice Coffman, the daughter of Bishop Samuel Coffman (q.v.) and sister of John S. Coffman, the pioneer Mennonite evangelist. To this family were born a son and six daughters. He received his education at the Normal School in Bridgewater, Va. He lived all but three years of his life at Dale Enterprise. He was ordained to the ministry at Weaver's Church near Harrisonburg in 1887, and as a bishop in Cass Co., Mo., in 1892, where the family lived in 1890-93. After the death of his father-in-law he became bishop of the congregations of the Middle District in the Shenandoah Valley, Va., which office he held until his death on Dec. 26, 1932.

Besides his ministerial duties L. J. Heatwole was also an astronomer, a calculator of almanacs, a teacher in the public schools, and an official observer for the U.S. Weather Bureau, keeping records of temperature and rainfall for 52 years. His influence was strong in the founding and the establishing of the Eastern Mennonite School. For a number of years he served on the faculty of the Bible term of this school. At conferences and at board meetings his voice was always gladly heard, for he was mild-mannered and conciliatory, and at the same time practical. The titles of his published works indicate the variety of his interests: Baptism Shown to Be a Ceremony of Consecration (Elkhart, 1902); Key to the Almanac and the Sidereal Heavens (Scottdale, 1908); Mennonite Handbook of Information (Scottdale, 1925); Moral Training in the Public Schools: A Treatise Designed for Teachers . . . (Scottdale, 1908); The Perpetual Calendar (Dale Enterprise, 1911).
E.H.G.

Heatwole, Lydia Magdalena (1887-1932), daughter of Reuben J. and Margaret (Kilmer) Heatwole, was a pioneer Mennonite (MC) nurse. She grew to womanhood in a devout Mennonite home in Harvey Co., Kan. Her service in the Old People's Home near Rittman, Ohio, and later in the Kansas City Mission deepened her conviction to enter nurses' training, but in order to help her parents she took up a homestead in eastern Colorado. In 1918 she graduated with the first class from the Mennonite Training School for Nurses at La Junta. After further training at Agnes Memorial Hospital in Denver she returned to La Junta as superintendent of nurses. She set a high Christian standard for the training school and saw it grow from one supervisor and a few students to ten supervisors and officers and 36 students. Her outstanding contribution to the nursing profession in the Mennonite Church was her emphasis on the spiritual and religious service of the nurse to her patient. J.S.U.

Heatwole, Reuben J. (Feb. 27, 1847-June 7, 1921), the son of John S. and Nancy Heatwole, was born at Rockingham Co., Va. On Feb. 27, 1873, he married Margaret Kilmer, and was the father of seven children—Henry, Anna, Sarah, Susanna, Mary, Martha, and Lydia. In early manhood he took up a homestead in Marion Co., Kan. In later years he with his family lived in Harvey County, and McPherson County near Windom, Kan. He was an outstanding active Mennonite (MC) layman on the Kansas and Colorado frontier. He taught singing schools, helped organize Sunday schools and churches, served on the Evangelizing Committee, and he assisted many ministers materially in preaching appointments and evangelistic services. His missionary zeal was a positive influence of permanent value to central Kansas and Colorado Mennonite (MC) congregations. M.M.T.

Hebberecht, a Mennonite family in Flanders which emigrated to Aardenburg, Dutch province of Zeeland. Christoffel Hebberecht, a cloth merchant of Gent, Belgium, obtained citizenship in Aardenburg in 1633, and became a deacon of the Aardenburg Mennonite congregation. His son Ghysel (or Gillis) Hebberecht, also called Gillis Aelbrechts, a well-to-do cloth merchant, married Susanna de Meyere, was a preacher of the Aardenburg congregation from 1651 until his death, shortly after Sept. 21, 1680. He played a prominent role in the difficult period when the government vigorously opposed the Mennonites, chiefly at the instigation of the Calvinist preacher Buce. With calm firmness and warm faith he led the church wisely. When the authorities called the Mennonites as civil guards (1657-58), and accused them of disloyalty to the country because they could not for reasons of conscience accept the service, Hebberecht after many discussions finally obtained an agreement in 1663 that the Mennonites should pay a "guard fee" in return for exemption from service. A charge of Socinianism (q.v.) made against Hebberecht in 1660 was dismissed by the magistrate. When the city was besieged by the French in 1762, Hebberecht again became the soul of the congregation. Ready to stand by the city in trouble, the Mennonites nevertheless adhered to their principle not to fight with arms. Contemporaries, among them Hunnius, the Reformed pastor of Oostburg, praised him for his faithfulness to principle and his leadership through the period of confusion. Under Hebberecht the Aardenburg church experienced a period of great development. vdZ.

DB 1876, 81, 105; 1879, 14 ff.; 1881, 1 f., 27-29; 1883, 11, 13-17, 18, 22; 1884, 32-34; Biogr. Wb. III, 601 f.; F. K. van Lennep, Verzameling van Oorkonden, betrekking hebbende op het geslacht von Eeghen (Amsterdam, 1918) see Index; ML II, 268.

Heberle, Urban (1812-66), a Lutheran church historian of Württemberg, Germany. As deacon in Blaubeuren 1843-49 and archdeacon 1847-57 in Tübingen, he published important articles relating to Anabaptist history of the 16th century, showing himself an expert in the field. His important works were (1) "Johann Denk und sein Büchlein vom Gesetz Gottes" (Theologische Studien und Kritiken, 1851, 121-94); (2) "Johann Denk und die Ausbreitung seiner Lehre" (op. cit., 1855, 817-90); (3) "Leonhard Kaiser, lutherischer, kein anabaptistischer Blutzeuge" (Ztscht für Protestantismus und Kirche, 1856); (4) "W. Capitos Verhältnis zum Anabaptismus" (Niedners Ztscht für die hist. Theol., 1857, 285 f.); (5) "Die Anfänge des Anabaptismus in der Schweiz" (Jahrbuch für deutsche Theologie, 1858). Especially the last article is of outstanding importance historically. No student of Anabaptist history can afford to overlook it. (ML II, 269.) NEFF.

Hebron Mennonite Church (MC) is a rural mission church located about four miles southeast of Fulks Run, Rockingham Co., Va., under the Virginia Conference. About 1850 Abraham Brenneman, and perhaps others, moved from Linville Creek Valley into Brocks Gap, situated behind the first range of the Appalachian Mountains, about seven miles west of Broadway, Va. Sometime later preaching services were held near there. In 1881 the Mennonites in partnership with the United Brethren built a meetinghouse about 1½ miles south of Fulks Run, where services were held for a number of years. The church building then passed into the hands of the U.B. Church. Later services were again held in two schoolhouses in the same neighborhood several miles east and northeast of Mt. Carmel, the first meetinghouse. A frame building called Hebron was built in 1915 on the Shoemaker River about four miles southeast of Fulks Run to serve the then growing congregation. Membership in 1954 was 66; the pastor was Lewis P. Showalter. T.S.

Hebron Mennonite Church (GCM), located five miles east of Buhler, Kan., a member of the Western District Conference, was founded in 1879 with Bernhard Buhler (q.v.) as elder. From the beginning the congregation made the mode of baptism optional, administering it by sprinkling or immersion. Buhler was baptized by sprinkling and ordained as minister by Leonhard Sudermann. The Hebron Mennonite Church is an exception in that it practices more than one mode of baptism. In 1882 a church building was constructed, which was replaced in 1900 by the present building. Bernhard Buhler served Hebron as elder 1879-1906, succeeded by A. M. Martens 1906-23. Other ministers were J. B. Dick 1900-17, Peter Lohrentz 1888-1924, David Penner 1879-95, Cornelius Froese 1879-1902, P. E. Frantz 1925-29 and 1931-36, P. S. Goertz 1930-31, T. A. van der Smissen 1937-46, J. W. Nickel 1947-48, Elbert Koontz 1948-53, and O'Ray Graber since 1954. The membership in 1955 was 207. C.K.

C. C. Epp, "Early Hebron Mennonite Church," Menn. Life VIII (April 1953) 86 ff.; Year Book of the Hebron Church, 1941, 4 ff.

Hechtlein (not Hechtler), Hans, a parson at Schalkhausen near Ansbach, Germany, was arrested in 1530 on the charge that he had accepted rebaptism. At his cross-examination he openly confessed that not only he, but also his wife and his mother, had been baptized on confession of their faith. Even on the rack he denied having spread seditious doctrines. He was therefore expelled. Nothing more is known of him. W.W.

K. Schornbaum, TA II: Brandenburg; E. Teufel, "Der Täuferprozess gegen Pfarrer Hechtlein in Schalkhausen 1539-40," in Ztscht für Kirchengesch. XVIII (1949); W. Löhe, Erinnerungen aus der Reformationsgeschichte von Franken (Nürnberg, 1847) 109; ML II, 269.

Heems, Abraham, a Dutch Mennonite of Haarlem, Holland, married to Johanna van Dalen, of a Flemish emigrant family, silk manufacturer, d. after 1747, was the author of a number of religious poems. Among his publications were Absolon of de gestrafte Heerschzucht (Haarlem, n.d.); and Bijbelpoezy in Alleenspraken, Tafereelen, Uitbreidingen en Zedelessen (Amsterdam, 1729).

Heems's daughter Femina (1724-81), married to the Mennonite merchant Gerard Hugaart of Haarlem, also published a number of poems. Heems died in 1756. The Heems family, a number of whom served as deacons or as regents of the Mennonite orphanages, was in the 17th and 18th centuries rather numerous in Haarlem. vdZ.

M. Schagen, Naamlijst van Doopsgezinde Schrijveren (1745) 45; Biogr. Wb. III, 603; IV, 787.

Heenvliet, a village on the island of Voorne-Putten, in the Dutch province of South Holland. In the 17th century there was a small Mennonite congregation at Heenvliet, which was closely connected with the Mennonites in the neighboring villages of Geervliet and Spijkenis. It belonged to the Flemish branch. In 1733-34 it contributed to the needs of the Prussian Mennonites, but soon after it must have died out. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 896, 1180.) vdZ.

Heere, de, a Dutch Mennonite family, originally living in Flanders, Belgium, whose members moved from there to Friesland to escape persecution. Whether Philips de Heere, formerly a sheriff at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders, who fled to Franeker (Friesland), was a Mennonite or not could not be ascertained. In any case the noted poet Lucas de Heere (1534-84), who was also a painter, the teacher of Karel van Mander (q.v.), was not a Mennonite. It is not clear whether Philippus de He(e)re, who in 1672 married Antie Jans Agricola (Mennonite) at Franeker, was a descendant of Philips de Heere of Kortrijk. This Philippus de Heere was the ancestor of the Dutch Mennonite de Heere family, a number of whom bear the name of Scheltema de Heere. (See also Scheltema.)

It has been proved that Jan Jacobsz (q.v.), who was a well-known Mennonite elder, did not belong to the de Heere family as was formerly generally believed. vdZ.

Ned. Patriciaat XXVII (1941) 218-20; Biogr. Wb. III, 604 ff.; DB 1867, 54.

Heeren, an old Mennonite family of Aalsmeer, Dutch province of North Holland, still found there; in the 17th century some of them were preachers of the Waterlander congregation. vdZ.

Heerenveen, a town in the Dutch province of Friesland, founded in the second half of the 16th century as a peat-digging center. Already in this period Mennonites were found here; in 1563-65 Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 14 persons at Oudeschoot, about three miles south of Heerenveen. Soon after 1600 there was at least one Mennonite congregation at Heerenveen; probably there were several. At any rate in the second half of the 17th century there were five or even more congregations: one Waterlander, one Frisian, one of the Jan Jacobsz (q.v.) group, one Flemish, and one Old Flemish. It is also possible that there was a congregation of the Twisck (q.v.) group, but further information about this congregation is lacking.

The Jan Jacobsz group had a large number of members in Heerenveen and its neighborhood; in the early part of the 17th century it had two meetinghouses, but the congregations died out before 1729. The Frisian congregation, called "Heerenveen en Lange Lilo" in the Naamlijst of 1731, died out about 1750 or merged with another group.

The Groningen Old Flemish congregation existed until about 1800. It was a conservative group. Age Jouckes, one of its preachers, was banned in 1687 and then joined the Waterlanders. Most of the Groningen Old Flemish members lived outside of Heerenveen. In the 18th century this congregation is usually called "Knijpe en Mildam" (q.v.).

The Flemish congregation merged with the Waterlanders in 1741; it then numbered 37 members. Its meetinghouse was located in the Kakelsteeg.

The most important was the Waterlander congregation. From about 1650 it had two meetinghouses, one in the town on the Agterom bij de Dragt, and one on the Boven-Knijpe. In 1706 the total membership numbered 167. From this year the history of the congregation is well known, for in 1706 a church record (Menniste Christen Karcken Boeck) was begun. In 1741, in the merger with the Flemish, the old Agterom meetinghouse was abandoned. The congregation then held services in the former Flemish Kakelsteeg meetinghouse. This being too small for the congregation, a new meetinghouse was erected in 1761 (still in use) on the Vermaningssteeg. Until 1765 it had only untrained ministers chosen out of the congregation. Among them were Jan Thomas (q.v.), Wiebe Pieters Zeeman, Pieke Tjommes, and Wytze Jeens Brouwer (q.v.). All of these men were suspended by the Frisian government on charges of Socinianism—Jan Thomas in 1719, and the other three in 1738.

Johannes Sytzes Hoekstra, called in from Burg on the island of Texel, served here from 1765 until his death in 1776. He was followed by Hendrik Jans Blauw 1776-82, who had previously served at Norden, Germany. During his ministry the congregation by brotherly agreement was divided into two congregations, one at Heerenveen and one at Bovenknijpe (q.v.). The Heerenveen congregation then numbered about 200 members, that of Bovenknijpe 92.

The ministers after Blauw were Gentius Wybrandi 1782-88, Jan van Calcar 1788-1821, R. J. Keestra 1821-66, A. Vis 1866-1901, Tj. van der Ploeg 1903-8, S. D. A. Wartena 1909-22, A. Vis 1922-25, J. Koster 1926-37, S. Gosses Gzn. 1938-42, S. I. van der Meulen 1943-54, and R. Hofman 1954- .

The membership was about 200 in 1780, 144 in 1837, 260 in 1860, 235 in 1900, 207 in 1954. Church activities include a Sunday school for children, ladies' circle (52 members), men's circle (18 members), choir, and Bible study group. vdZ.

P. H. Veen, De Doopsgezinden in Schoterland (Leeuwarden, 1869) passim; J. Loosjes, Jan Jacobsz en de Jan-Jacobsgezinden in Ned. Archief v. Kergesch. XI, 3 (The Hague, 1914) 231; DB 1870, 108-18; ML II, 269.

Heerjansdam, Dutch province of South Holland, south of Rotterdam, where in the 17th century there was a small Mennonite congregation of the Flemish branch, which must have died out soon after the middle of the 17th century and about the history of which nothing is known. vdZ.

Heerlen, a town in the Dutch province of Limburg, center of the important coal-mining district, seat of the Mennonite congregation of southern Limburg. Since 1926, through the activity of A. E. Dinger and J. L. Swart-Posthumus Meijes, monthly services have been held in a hall at Treebeek near Heerlen, and a congregation was founded on Nov. 19, 1934. In 1936 S. M. A. Daalder became the pastor of the young congregation, serving at the same time at Eindhoven (q.v.). In 1939 the congregation obtained a fine meetinghouse, dedicated on Nov. 19, 1939, adorned with a beautiful stained glass window by the artist C. Baljet.

The membership, numbering about 80 when the congregation was founded, had increased to 160 by 1954; the following pastors have served: S. M. A. Daalder 1936-42, Th. van Veen 1942-47, P. van der Meulen 1947-49, G. A. Maathuis 1949- . Besides in Heerlen services are held at Geleen. Activities: West-Hill Sunday school for children at Heerlen, Geleen, and Treebeek; ladies' circles at Heerlen and Treebeek. vdZ.

Heese, Heinrich (1787-1868), an outstanding Mennonite teacher of Russia, a Prussian and a Lutheran by birth. As a youth he fled from French recruiting to the Mennonites in South Russia and accepted their faith.

Heese came first to Chortitza, where he took a position as secretary in the local government. In 1829 he was called by Johann Cornies to teach in the Ohrloff Vereinsschule, a secondary school headed by the Cornies family. For 12 years he taught about 60 pupils of a wide variety of ages all that he and Cornies considered essential for a Christian farmer. In his spare time he was Cornies' secretary, looked after his Russian correspondence with the authorities and supported him in his various reforms. In 1840 he was requested to teach Russian in the school about to be opened in the Chortitza. He worked out the regulations and a schedule of classes and expenses, and began to teach in a house assigned to him. The initial work was very difficult. It was not easy to find the necessary number of students or to gain adequate support from the parents and the church.

In addition to the work in and for the school, in which he also attempted to fit the less capable for a useful life, Heese worked on a plan to increase the yield of crops, made suggestions to improve the relations with Russian servants, gave advice on the improvement of dairy stock and the planting of trees, etc. So many demands of this kind were made upon his time and strength that he could not devote as much time as he wished to the school.

Heese considered the school a seedbed for the development of a feeling of community among the young people. In agriculture he saw the basis of the entire structure of the state; where agriculture is neglected the people grow poor and their culture disintegrates. Mennonites should be model farmers, if only in gratitude to the government. He advocated better equipment, methodical cultivation of potatoes, deep plowing, rotation of crops, letting at least 10 acres lie fallow but under constant cultivation, and the use of fertilizers.

In spite of his great services to the Mennonite settlements Heese met much hostility. In 1846 he had to yield his position to the youthful Heinrich Franz (q.v.). In 1849 he moved to Einlage, took over the headship of a boarding school, and at the age of 62 passed the Russian teachers' examination at Ekaterinoslav. His students were for the most part the sons of Russian nobles. On April 12, 1868, he died, having previously written his own funeral sermon. D.H.E.

A. Neufeld, Die Chortitzer Zentralschule (Berdyansk, 1893); Friesen, Brüderschaft; D. H. Epp, "H. Heese und seine Zeit," Botschafter V (Ekaterinoslav, 1910) idem, Heinrich Heese (Steinbach, 1952); ML II, 269 f.

Heese, Heinrich, b. 1846 in Russia, d. March 3, 1903, at Ekaterinoslav, Russia, was a grandson of the educator Heinrich Heese (q.v.). Heese was the owner of a large milling establishment in Ekaterinoslav, a member of the Duma, a member of the board of directors of the city branch of the federal bank and of many private banks (see also Ekaterinoslav). C.K.

H. Dirks, Menn. Jahrbuch, 1903-4 (Gross Tokmak, 1905) 28.

Heese, Peter (1852-1911), an outstanding Mennonite in Russia, was born June 2, 1852, in Ekaterinoslav, Ukraine, and was educated in the Chortitza Zentralschule, the Gymnasium in Ekaterinoslav, and the University of Moscow. In the school year 1877-78 he taught in Gnadenfeld, Molotschna, and the next school year at the Ohrloff Vereinsschule (mathematics). In 1880 he was made co-president of the Ohrloff Vereinsschule with Joh. Klatt (q.v.), and was soon afterward chosen a member of the Molotschna Mennonite school board, and served as its president alternately with Klatt 1889-96.

Peter Heese was a man of extraordinary gifts and a commanding as well as winsome personality. In him the cause of education had an excellent promoter and counselor, on the character of the school as well as on the principles of education, but also an expert in the science and methods. Therefore the Heese-Klatt period is called the Golden Age of education among the Molotschna Mennonites. The most important achievement was the reform of the elementary village schools. New methods in the teaching of Russian, a German reader, outlines for Bible history, church history, and German grammar, and the use of Russian in arithmetic characterize this period.

Peter Heese's independence, his private financial means, and his generous liberality toward benevolent and educational institution causes gave him a name second (probably) only to that of Johann Cornies (q.v.). He took an important part in the establishment of the school for the deaf in Tiege, called the Marientaubstummenschule (q.v.).

Because he was unable to carry out all of his educational ideas, he left the school board in 1896 and in bitterness withdrew from Mennonite fellowship. In 1906 he published a Russian newspaper in Ekaterinoslav. Until his death he devoted his strength and fortune to sacrificial, unceasing service to his fellow men. (Menn. Jahrbuch, 1910, 102; ML II, 270.) A.B.

Hege, a widely ramified family in South Germany, which settled here after the Thirty Years' War. The earliest traces lead to the Swiss canton of Aargau, where the name occurred frequently among the Swiss Brethren. At the end of the 16th century there were still some members of the family among the Swiss Brethren; they emigrated when the government tried to compel them to join the state church. Among these was Ulrich Hege of Leerau.

The emigrants seem to have settled first in Alsace, but definite facts about the family are not known before the Peace of Westphalia. It appeared then in the Palatinate. The earliest information comes from Dühren in the Sinsheim district, where Rudolf Hege had gone from Switzerland about 1656. On March 2, 1661, he took part in an evening service of Mennonites in Steinsfurt, and was therefore questioned by the authorities (see Hasselbach). In the government records he is not otherwise mentioned. In the church book begun at Mutterstadt in the Palatinate in 1676, his name was entered for the first time in 1697; it is a notice of the birth of Christian Hegi, the son of the surgeon Jakob Hegi (d. about 1733) and his wife Katharina. The spelling Hegi indicates Swiss origin; it was not changed to Hege until 1753. But it is not clear that these Hegis are Mennonites; for the family is not mentioned in the government lists for Mutterstadt, which generally list all the Mennonites in the Palatinate, whereas in the family list of 1724 the Mennonite Hans Kaegy is named as the renter.

Information concerning the spread of the Mennonites in the Palatinate is always given in the inventories of the government, which watched that they did not exceed the set number of 200 families. The official lists are still preserved in the Generallandesarchiv of Baden at Karlsruhe. The first mention of the name Hege appears in it in 1716. At that time Daniel Hege was living in Branchweilerhof (q.v.) near Neustadt; he is also named in the registers of 1724, 1738, and 1743 as part renter of the farm. He died in 1748. Seven sons survived: Christian, Johannes, Daniel, Heinrich, Samuel, Jakob, and Ulrich, as well as a daughter who married Melchior Fellmann. Their descendants are in part still living in the Rheinpfalz, in Branchweilerhof and in the churches of Deutschhof (q.v.) and Kohlhof; but a large part have emigrated. In the government lists of the Kurpfalz, only the oldest, Christian, and the youngest, Ulrich, are named. Christian Hege was hereditary lessee of the Branchweilerhof and is named as such in the family lists of the government in 1752, 1759, and 1769. He represented the Mennonites of the left side of the Rhine at the conference of Oct. 14, 1782, at the Immelhäuserhof, called by Abraham Zeisset, the elder of the Hasselbach (q.v.) congregation, to settle a dispute (Müller, Berner Täufer, 213).

In the government list of 1769 the name Hege is entered for the first time in Mutterstadt. At that time Ulrich Hege, probably the youngest brother of the Christian Hege at the Branchweilerhof, lived at Mutterstadt. Ulrich was born about 1735 at Branchweilerhof, and about 1762 leased a farm in Mutterstadt. About 1770 he moved to Eppelheim near Heidelberg, where he died about 1783 at the age of 47 years. He is the ancestor of the line that settled in Baden, Württemberg, and Bavaria and from which a large number of preachers and elders of the Mennonite churches there were derived. His oldest son, Daniel Hege, b. 1765, leased an estate in Schwetzingen and in 1811 in Mauer near Meckesheim, and in 1822 took over the leased estate of Oberbiegelhof near Neckarbischofsheim, which was farmed by the family nearly 100 years (see Unterbüchelhof). He had been deacon of the Meckesheim congregation; he died in 1728 at the age of 73 years.

Of his sons, Ulrich Hege†, b. April 7, 1808, at Schwetzingen, was one of the leading elders of the Mennonites of Baden. He was ordained preacher in 1838, and elder in 1843. He was aware of the weaknesses of his congregation and worked successfully with the elders Christian Schmutz and Heinrich Landes for a spiritual revival. Although he had no theological education, he was an outstanding preacher. His sermons were simple, but powerful. From them spoke a thorough knowledge of Scripture, deep feeling, and a penetrating understanding. His great emphasis was the personal attitude of the individual to God and to Christ. He was therefore less concerned with increasing the membership than with harmonizing personal life with the Word of God. Hence it occurred that he did not baptize an applicant if he noticed in the baptismal instruction that a serious intention to live a new life was lacking. Two letters have been preserved which he wrote with his brother elders in July 1862 to David Sherrick and Elias Eby of Canada, and which Elder David Sherrick published in a booklet in Preston, 1863 (Bender, Two Centuries, 29). His position in the churches of Baden is indicated by the foreword of the elders in Leitfaden zum Gebrauch bei gottesdienstlichen Handlungen (Sinsheim, 1876), which states that they wished to avoid the legal rather than evangelistic spirit of the old Formularbuch: "We could undertake this task on the basis of the Holy Scriptures so much the more joyfully because we found ourselves in this connection in agreement with the elders Christian Schmutz of Rappenau and Ulrich Hege of Oberbiegelhof, who passed away a few years ago" (p. VI). Ulrich Hege died Nov. 8, 1872 (Gbl., 1872, 86). Seven sons and four daughters survived.

After his death most of his sons continued in the spirit of their father as elders of South German churches. Five of these were:

(1) Christian Hege, b. Aug. 15, 1840, d. April 18, 1907, was renter in Breitenau near Willsbach (Württemberg), after Oct. 19, 1890, preacher of the Lobenbach church (later merged with the church at Heilbronn), and after Jan. 28, 1894, elder, author of a book, Einst und Jetzt oder Vergangenheit und Gegenwart unserer Mennoniten-Gemeinden (Reihen, 1890). In 1904-7 he was the representative of the Weinsberg district in the Landtag of Württemberg (Gbl., 1907, 40; Gem.-Kal., 1909, 47-54, with picture).

(2) Jakob Hege, b. Sept. 18, 1844, d. May 9, 1926, was first renter of the large Lautenbach farm near Neckarsulm, then renter in Hettstadterhof near Würzburg, then emigrated to Wisner, Neb., in 1893, went to Aberdeen, Idaho, and died in Paso Robles, Cal. On Aug. 9, 1874, he became preacher, May 23, 1880, elder of the Lobenbach church, and 1880-92 he served the Giebelstadt church, and in America the congregations at Aberdeen (q.v.) and Paso Robles. In 1897 he published Christliche Gemeindezucht (Gbl., 1926, 78).

(3) Johannes Hege, b. April 5, 1847, d. Feb. 20, 1911, rented in turn the Oberbiegelhof, Buchenhof near Römhild (Thuringia), and Liebenstein near Lauffen a. N. On July 16, 1876, he was ordained as preacher of the Hasselbach church, and later as elder. From 1886 to 1898 he served the congregation of Bildhausen-Trappstadt, and after 1898 the Heilbronn congregation (Gbl., 1911, 26).

(4) Philipp Hege, b. April 15, 1848, d. May 1, 1908, rented the Oberbiegelhof, was ordained preacher June 22, 1873, and elder Oct. 23, 1887, for the Hasselbach congregation (Gbl., 1909, 44).

(5) Daniel Hege, b. Sept. 6, 1836, d. May 5, 1900, rented successively a farm in Neuhaus near Grombach (Baden), Bonfeld near Heilbronn, and Hettstadterhof near Würzburg. In 1880 he moved to Munich, and from there directed the emigration of Mennonites from Baden to southern Bavaria, and helped to bring about a union between them and the Mennonites who were already living here, having emigrated from the Palatinate early in the 19th century. This union resulted in the organization of the church in Munich in 1892 (Gbl., 1900, 27; Menn. Bl., 68, with picture).

Also three sons-in-law of Ulrich Hege served as elders in the churches: (1) Daniel Bähr (1834-1905) was chosen preacher June 11, 1871, and elder June 14, 1874, of the Rappenau (Baden) congregation, and after 1897 served the Munich and Eichstock congregations (Gbl., 1905, 62; Menn. Bl., 76, with photograph). (2) Abraham Schmutz (1849-1924) was made preacher April 15, 1883, and elder Jan. 28, 1894, of the Ittlingen congregation (now Sinsheim a. E.) (Gbl., 1925, 4). (3) Daniel Lichti (1849-1928) was made preacher of the Giebelstadt-Rottenbauer church (now Würzburg) Jan. 18, 1880, and later elder of the Donauwörth church (Gbl., 1928, 84).

The second son of Ulrich Hege of the branch in Baden, Christian Hege (1768-1838), settled in Bockschaft near Kirchardt. His son Ulrich Hege in Reihen (b. Jan. 13, 1812, d. June 13, 1896) was elder of the Ittlingen congregation, and founder and for many years the editor of the Gemeindeblatt der Mennoniten (q.v.). In the name of the Aeltestenrat he published the new edition of the Leitfaden in 1876 (Gbl., 1896, 74). Of his sons, Jakob Hege† (b. Dec., 1848, d. Aug. 26, 1911) was traveling evangelist of the Mennonites of Baden, Württemberg, and Bavaria from 1876 on. At the same time he renewed connections with the Mennonites of Switzerland, and beginning in 1883 he promoted the spiritual life of the churches there by arranging and usually conducting regular Bible conferences. In the churches of Baden he occupied a leading position after the death of the older elders. He officiated at most of the baptisms, marriages, and funerals in the Baden churches. After the death of his father in 1896 he was put in charge of the Gemeindeblatt (Gem.-Kal., 1913, 47-59, with picture, Gbl., 1911). His brother Philipp Hege, b. Nov. 7, 1857, d. March 7, 1923, was elder of the Heilbronn church and edited the Gemeindeblatt during the trying war years with skill and understanding. At the same time he was very active in the field of home missions (Jugendpflege), as well as caring for the Mennonite refugees from Russia.

At the time of the mass emigration of Mennonites from the Palatinate to America in the first third of the 18th century some members of the Hege family joined the party. The first emigrant was Hans Hege from the region of Zweibrücken, who sought a new home in Lancaster Co., Pa., with his brother-in-law, Hans Lehmann. They arrived in Philadelphia Sept. 27, 1727, on the "James Goodwill." The Genealogical Register of the Male and Female Descendants of Hans Hege (Chambersburg, 1859) states that the Hege family there is of Swiss origin; several descendants of Hans Hege were preachers in Mennonite (MC) churches, among them W. W. Hege of Marion, Pa.

On Aug. 28, 1750, Nicolas Hegi landed on the shores of America (Smith, 213). Today the anglicized form of the name occurs frequently as Hegy or Hagey. The Hagey Mennonite (MC) Church of Preston, Ont., was named after two Hagey brothers (Jacob, deacon 1832-93, and Joseph, bishop 1851-76) who came with their parents in 1822 from Montgomery Co., Pa., to the Preston neighborhood. The Hagey family is still prominent in the congregation.

One of the outstanding early leaders of the General Conference Mennonite Church in the United States was Daniel Hege (q.v.) of Klein-Karlbach near Grünstadt in the Palatinate, who emigrated to Summerfield, Ill., where he served as preacher from 1859, then as traveling evangelist for the conference until his untimely death in 1862.

HEGE.

J. Heiz, Die Täufer in Aargau (Aarau, 1902); C. Henry Smith, The Mennonite Immigration to Pennsyvania (Norristown, 1929); Chr. Hege, Chronik der Familie Hege, Heft 1 (Frankfurt a.M., 1937); K. A. Hagey and W. A. Hagey, The Hagey Families in America (Bristol, Tenn.-Va., 1951); ML II, 271-73.

Hege, Christian (1869-1943), outstanding German Mennonite historian, coeditor of the Mennonitisches Lexikon 1913-43, was born Dec. 20, 1869, at Bonfeld, Württemberg, the son of Daniel Hege and Magdalena Schmutz, moved with his parents to Munich in 1880. After completing the Realgymnasium in Munich, he studied at the University of Munich 1890-93 in the fields of history, economics, and trade, and at the age of 24 in 1893 was appointed financial editor of the outstanding Frankfurt newspaper, Frankfurter Nachrichten, a post which involved daily attendance at the stock exchange and which he filled for 40 years with distinction until his retirement in 1933. In the 1890's he also founded and edited for a time a successful monthly, Frankfurter Frauenzeitung. He was married to Christine Fellmann on Sept. 22, 1895.

But Hege's real lifework was the service of his church, which he loved with all his heart. This work he carried out chiefly in the field of historical research and writing on marginal time along with his profession. After his retirement he spent the last ten years (1933-43) of his life in full-time research and writing, with the aid of a stipendium from the Badischer Verband (q.v.). He lived all his adult and married life, after the completion of his studies, in Frankfurt a.M., except the last four months, which he spent in Eichstätt, Bavaria, after fleeing Frankfurt because of the incessant bombings. Of five children, only his daughter Adele survived him.

Hege's literary career began in 1891 with articles in the Gemeindeblatt and in 1893 in the Mennonitische Blätter. His first and largest book was Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt a.M., 1908). In 1935 appeared his booklet, Ein Rückblick auf 400 Jahre mennonitischer Geschichte (Karlsruhe). Chronik der Familie Hege, edited and largely written by Hege, was designed as a quarterly periodical, but only the first number appeared in 1937. He discovered in Zürich in 1925 the lost Vermahnung of Pilgram Marpeck, which he edited for publication in the Gedenkschrift zum 400-jährigen Jubiläum der Mennoniten (Ludwigshafen, 1925). He was also responsible for the publication of Pilgram Marpeck's Verantwortung by Johann Loserth in 1929 (Vienna and Leipzig, 1929). He was the chief promoter and founder (with Christian Neff) of the Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein (est. 1933) and served until his death as treasurer and editor of its publication, Mennonitische Geschichtsblätter (5 volumes 1936-40) and as the general editor of the Schriftenreihe (3 numbers appeared 1938, 1939, 1940).

But Christian Hege's greatest work, his real lifework, was the Mennonitisches Lexikon, of which he was coeditor and publisher with Christian Neff. Of this work he was the prime mover, and the managing editor from 1913 until his death. He also wrote a vast number of articles, chiefly though not exclusively in the field of Anabaptist and early Mennonite history. An exhaustive bibliography was prepared by Christian Neff and published posthumously in Mennonitische Geschichtsblätter VI (1949) 23-27, under the title "Bibliographie von Christian Hege." The same number contains two bibliographical sketches, one by Christian Neff, "Zum Gedenken an Christian Hege," and one by his daughter Adele Hege, "Gedenkworte für die Generalversammlung des Mennonitischen Geschichtsvereins 1947." Prof. Walther Köhler of Heidelberg published a warm tribute to him in the Theologische Literaturzeitung, 1944, Nos. 1 and 2. Ernst Correll wrote a biography and appreciation in the Mennonite Quarterly Review (1957).

Although Christian Hege produced no great historical works, he was a thorough and devoted scholar, whose many smaller contributions have lasting value, and whose editorial enterprise and financial sacrifice on behalf of Mennonite historical research and publication have produced great and lasting benefits in the cause of Anabaptist-Mennonite historiography. Personally he was a man of great depth of character and dignity, and of striking presence. He lives on in the life and work of many others whom he inspired and to whom he gave an unblemished example of selfless devotion and complete Christian integrity.† H.S.B.

Hege, Christine (1871-1942), wife of Christian Hege (q.v.), was born July 23, 1871, in Grombach, Baden, near Sinsheim, daughter of Heinrich Fellmann, married Christian Hege in 1895. Of unusual intellectual and spiritual gifts, she was an intimate colleague of her husband in his work as a Mennonite historian. Herself learned in Mennonite history, she won the prize offered in 1908 by the Vereinigung der Mennonitengemeinden im Deutschen Reich for a general book on Mennonite history with her Kurze Geschichte der Mennoniten (Altona, 1909). She died March 3, 1942, in Frankfurt a.M. at Rothschildallee 33, where she had spent most of her married life. H.S.B.

W. Fellmann, "Christine Hege," Menn. Geschbl. VI, 1949, 21-23.

Hege, Daniel (1826-62), one of the outstanding early leaders of the General Conference Mennonite Church in North America, was born Dec. 26, 1826, at Klein-Karlbach near Grünstadt in the Palatinate, the son of John and Margaret (Bergtholdt) Hege, and emigrated to the United States in 1851. After learning the trade of bookbinding he was educated at the Academy at Schiers (Canton of Graubünden), Switzerland (1848-50), also at the Evangelical Seminary at Marthasville, Mo. (1852-55). He taught in a private school near Bloomington, Ill. (1855-56), and at West Point and Oskaloosa, Iowa (1856-59). He also preached some for the Mennonite congregation at West Point, Iowa (1856-59). He married Barbara Lehman July 19, 1857. In 1859 he was called to be the pastor of the Mennonite Church at Summerfield, Ill. With a great vision of a united and progressive Mennonite Church in the United States, he devoted himself from the very outset of his ministry to the general work of the church. He was one of the delegates to ratify the charter constitution of the new General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America at Wadsworth, Ohio, in 1861, where he was also elected secretary of the conference. Later he was elected traveling evangelist or home missionary (Reiseprediger), the first to hold such an office among the American Mennonites. He was to serve the scattered congregations and members of the small new conference by preaching and pastoral visits in the homes, and to promote the cause of union and higher education. He was a vigorous advocate of higher education and was active in raising funds to establish such a school in his conference (the Wadsworth School, q.v.). He returned from Iowa, where he was soliciting funds, to Summerfield seriously ill with typhoid fever, and died prematurely on Nov. 30, 1862. D.L.G.

H. P. Krehbiel, The History of the General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America (n.p., 1898) 93-113, 414-16; Das Christliche Volksblatt VII, No. 11 (Dec. 24, 1862) 42-43; ML II, 273.

Hegge, Jakob (Jakobus), of Danzig, hence called Jacobus Dantiscanus, a follower of Melchior Hofmann, a participant in the Flensburg Disputation (April 8 and 9, 1529), was later induced to recant by Bugenhagen in Hamburg. HEGE.

B. N. Krohn, Geschichte der fanatischen und enthusiastischen Wiedertäufer (Leipzig, 1785) 152 f. and 197 ff.; F. O. zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann (Haarlem, 1885) 146; ML II, 273.

Hegler, Alfred (1863-1902), professor of church history at the University of Tübingen. His father was a lawyer, but both grandfathers were ministers in Württemberg and exerted a great influence on his future course. He was educated in the seminaries of Maulbronn, Blaubeuren, and at the Stift in Tübingen. After a brief period of ministry in the country and at the Hofkirche at Stuttgart, he studied theology and philosophy a half year in Berlin, having written an excellent doctoral thesis on Psychologie in Kants Ethik. In 1889-92 he lectured on philosophy. He planned to become an instructor of philosophy.

But in 1892 Weizsäcker won him over to church history. After he had taught a course on the "enthusiasts" (Schwärmer) in the Reformation period, he established himself with his book, Geist und Schrift bei Sebastian Franck, eine Studie zur Geschichte des Spiritualismus in der Reformationszeit (1892). The idea of the subjectivity of religion seemed to him to be the center of Franck's thoughts and the source of his criticism of theology and church institutions. Hegler agreed thoroughly with Franck's ideas of tolerance.

Now he arrived at a plan for a lifework, viz., to write a history of spiritualism in the era of the Reformation. He meant to begin with Eckhardt, Tauler, Ruysbroek, Nachfolge Christi, Deutsche Theologie, then treat Carlstadt and the Anabaptists, as well as Schwenckfeld, follow spiritualism up to the time of Pietism, in Germany, France, Italy, Holland, and England. His ambitious program, for which he did a vast amount of research in archives and libraries, would have occupied a long life, but he was able to publish articles only on Campanus, Davidis, Hans Denk, Sebastian Franck, Gichtel, Gonesius, Ludwig Haetzer, Melchior Hofmann, Hubmaier, Hans Hut, the Inspired, Joris, Kautz and Marsay in Protestantische Realenzyklopädie. But his program, published posthumously by Walther Köhler, in his edition of Hegler's Beiträge zur Geschichte der Mystik in der Reformationszeit (1906), pp. XXVI f., must sooner or later become realized. In 1894 Hegler was made associate professor, and after Weizsäcker's death (1900) full professor. On Dec. 4, 1902, he succumbed to kidney trouble. (A biography by W. Koehler in Hegler's Beiträge zur Mystik, 1906.) (ML II, 273.)

Hegler's idea of a history of "Spiritualism" in the age of Reformation has partly been carried out by the outstanding leader of the American Quakers, Rufus M. Jones, in his standard book, Spiritual Reformers of the Sixteenth Century (London, 1914). Since the term "spiritualism" might be misunderstood (over against its clear meaning in German), the term "spiritual reformers" as introduced by R. M. Jones has generally been accepted. G.Bo.

Heher, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, a cobbler, the treasurer of his congregation at Steyr (q.v.), captured in 1527 and released after recanting. When he returned to his faith he was sentenced to three months in prison. But King Ferdinand insisted on a death sentence. Heher was accordingly executed in May 1528. NEFF.

A. Nicoladoni, Hans Bünderlin von Linz . . . (Berlin, 1893) 84 f.; ML II, 273.

Heidanus, Abraham (1597-1678), professor of theology at the University of Leyden (Holland). By his tolerant attitude and courageous defense of his theological position in the various quarrels of his time he won great respect. Because of his frank book, Consideratien (1676), he was deprived of his professorship, but retained his position as parson until his death. He wrote several letters to the authorities in Bern in warm defense of the harassed Mennonites there, thus securing permission for them to leave the country. (Müller, Berner Täufer, 173 and 181; ML II, 274.) NEFF.

Heidanus, Caspar (Jasper van der Heyden) (1530-86), a native of Mechelen, Belgium, who had been rejected by his family for turning Protestant, prepared for the office of preaching by Johann a Lasco, came to Frankenthal, Palatinate, in 1564, where he settled as successor to Petrus Dathenus (q.v.) until 1574. After a brief sojourn in Antwerp, he took part in the Frankenthal disputation (1571), served as preacher in Middelburg and Antwerp, as inspector in Bacharach, and died there May 7, 1586. He was a sharp defender of Calvinistic doctrine against Catholics, Lutherans, and Mennonites. Against the Mennonites he wrote Cort ende claer bewys van den heyligen doop (Antwerp, 1582). (DB 1908, 19, 33, 35, 42; Biogr. Wb. III, 807-16; ML II, 274.)

Neff.

Heide, Klaas, was born in Manitoba(?) and died in Mexico, October 1926. Heide was a leader of the Old Colony Mennonites, and was repeatedly delegated to negotiate with the Canadian government and to investigate settlement possibilities. In 1919 Heide and Cornelius Rempel, both of Manitoba, Julius Wiebe and David Rempel of Swift Current, and Johann P. Wall and Johann Wall of Hague, Sask., went as delegates to South America to find a place of settlement for the Old Colony Mennonites of Canada. In 1920 Heide again took part in the investigation of settlement possibilities in Mexico, was instrumental in purchasing the land, and was one of the leaders during the settlement period. (See also Old Colony Mennonites and Mexico.)
C.K.

Heidelberg, Baden, Germany (pop. 115,750), formerly the capital of the Palatinate, seat of the oldest German university (founded in 1386), has been the seat of a small Mennonite congregation since 1921, which in 1953 had 38 baptized members and 4 children, with Richard Wagner as elder from the beginning. The congregation meets on the first Sunday of the month. The Anabaptist movement was widespread in the Heidelberg area in the late 16th century, "particularly in Rohrbach, Leinen, Kirchheim, Nussloch and Wiesloch. Most of the members emigrated to Moravia (1603)" (Hege, 173). It died out about this time. The Baden-Pfalz volume of Anabaptist documents contains references to Anabaptists in the general area from 1568 on. The new Mennonite settlement in the region was established by immigrants from Switzerland about 1660. Since they were exclusively farmers they did not settle in the city proper, although some rented farm estates belonging to the city such as the Gutleuthof. The congregation in the immediate neighborhood was called Bruchhausen-Rohrbach, or at times Bruchhausen (q.v.) or Rohrbach; it existed from about 1664 to about 1880, when it dissolved. Huntzinger's Religions-, Kirchen- und Schulwesen der Mennoniten (Speyer, 1830) listed a total of 14 families with 71 souls as living in the Heidelberg district in the locations Nussloch, Handschuhsheim, Grenzhof, Rohrbach, St. Ilgen, and Gutleuthof, with only one member living in the city proper. Many mandates and regulations were issued from the electoral chancellery in Heidelberg, which was the capital of the Palatinate until 1720.
H.S.B.

C. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt a.M., 1908); M. Krebs, TA IV: Baden und Pfalz.

Heide-Neufeld und Reinländer Waisenamt is the name of one of the two companies organized by the Old Colony Mennonites to purchase and distribute the land of the Manitoba Mennonite settlement (q.v.) at Cuauhtemoc, Chihuahua, Mexico.
C.K.

Heijnric Willemse Saelmaker, an Anabaptist martyr, executed on March 14, 1536, at The Hague, Holland. He was charged with participation in the revolt at Poeldijk (q.v.). Heijnric said that he had not been present at the meeting in the home of Jutte Eeuwouts (q.v.) because the leader of this meeting, Adriaen Adriaensz, did not admit him. He denied that he had anything to do with the affair, but admitted that he had been aware of it. For this reason, and because he had lodged an Anabaptist elder, he was beheaded. He apparently belonged to a revolutionary group of Anabaptists.
vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; E. van Bergen, "De wederdoopers in het Westland," in Biljdr. voor de Geschiedenis van het Bisdom Haarlem XXVIII (Leiden, 1903) 273-75; Mellink, Wederdopers, 220 f., 341.

Heilbronn, a city (pop. 45,000) of Württemberg, Germany, until 1802 a free city, charmingly situated on the Neckar, 27 miles north of Stuttgart, an important manufacturing and trade city.

The Reformation was introduced here by Johann Lachmann, a son of the famed bell-caster Bernhard Lachmann, with strong support from the people and the guilds. In March 1526 are found the first Anabaptists trying to gain adherents in Heilbronn; they had come from Esslingen. Their high moral standards made a deep impression. In 1530 Wertz, Besserer, and Mettel Endris met at Anabaptist meetings. Wertz, who had been won to the movement by his cousin Gertrud, the daughter of Marx Hecker of Eppingen, preached to the people in vineyards and huts, sang psalms with them, and took a very hostile attitude toward Johann Lachmann. Their meetings were attended by 30 or 40 persons, some worthy and some unworthy. A Claus N. of Esslingen preached them a sermon, but was then banished from the city. Near Heilbronn a Frau von Neipperg favored the Anabaptists and permitted them to hold meetings. Wertz and Besserer were arrested and cross-examined. Because they refused to swear that they would desist, both were expelled from the city, but were soon readmitted, upon the intervention of neighboring nobles and upon their recantation.

From the court records on the prisoners in Passau (see Hohenlohe) these facts are known: (1) A widow Margarete of Heilbronn was baptized in 1529 by a Hans N., who died after recanting; (2) Judith, the wife of Hans Kimmich of Morsbach near Künzelsau, was baptized in 1532 by Wolf of Gritzingen (Grötzingen), who was executed in Bretten; (3) Anna, the wife of Bernhard Schrot, had been baptized by Hans of Pibrach (Biberach, Heilbronn district); (4) Dietrich of Heilbronn, baptized by Andreas N., soon recanted. In 1533 all those suspected of Anabaptism were summoned before a committee consisting of Lachmann, Menrad Molter, and the councilor Heinrich Zünderer. They denied being Anabaptists; but the shoemaker Jobs Fritz offered to "overthrow" the new preacher with the Word of God. He was warned to avoid the Anabaptist sect, to desist from arguing and preaching, or interrupting the sermons of the preachers, and to stop sheltering other Anabaptists on penalty of severe punishment.

In 1536 it was said in Strasbourg that there were about 40 Anabaptists in the vicinity of Heilbronn, who assembled in a forest. Their leader was Adam Siegel. Schuckhans of Landshausen was baptized in Heilbronn by Blasius Kuhn (Hulshof, 168). In the frequent cases occurring until 1540 the following characterizing points may be observed:

(1) The impulse toward sectarianism almost always comes from persons coming from the outside, seeking a following.

(2) All that deviates from orthodox Protestantism is Anabaptist unless it is Catholic; hence the opposition to Protestant preachers in other points than baptism, such as neglecting church services, refusal to render an oath; indeed, according to the confession of an imprisoned Anabaptist they were accused not only of religious errors, but also of revolution and common criminal views.

(3) It is characteristic that members of the shoemakers' guild are found among the sectarians (1533, 1540).

An unusually favorable soil for Anabaptism was found in Neckargartach in 1534, where the imperial knights refused to tolerate any Protestant preacher; likewise in Flein because of the resistance of the Heiliggeist Spital in Wimpfen against the Reformation.

The council repeatedly issued sharp mandates against the sectarians and against the reception and shelter of outside Anabaptists, and had its countermands sometimes read from the pulpit. Suspects were summoned, examined, and if found guilty expelled. Those who submitted and recanted could easily receive pardon and readmittance. There were two formulas of recantation, which expressed the promises that: (1) They would adhere to "the first infant baptism," which was held by the apostles and the Christian church. (2) They would believe the Gospel as it was taught at Heilbronn. (3) They would receive the Lord's Supper properly according to the teaching and institution of Christ and Paul in the Christian church. (4) We are not pure and without sin; therefore we pray with the apostles, as Christ taught us, Forgive us our sins. The more wordy of the two formulas was drawn up by Menrad Molter.

In 1545-57 there was quiet. In 1557 the council again issued an edict against sheltering outside Anabaptists. In 1558 and 1564 Duke Christian of Württemberg reported to the council that Anabaptists were holding meetings in a small forest near Gruppenbach, in which inhabitants of Heilbronn and Böckingen participated. The council offered to investigate and take necessary steps. Soon all traces of the Anabaptist movement disappeared. In 1609 the Anabaptists met every three weeks in the Spitalwald of Heilbronn; there were subjects of Württemberg, from Grossgartach, among them.

For the modern Heilbronn Mennonite congregation see the next article. G. Bo.

Urkundenbuch der Stadt Heilbronn IV (1922); Württembergische Geschichtsquellen XX; Beschreibung des Oberamts Heilbronn, Part I (1901) 124 ff.; Jäger, Mitteilungen zur schwäbischen und fränkischen Ref. Gesch., I (1828) 248 ff.; court records of Passau in the Reichsarchiv in Munich; TA Württemberg, 814, note 29; A. Hulshof, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg (Amsterdam, 1905); ML II, 275 ff.

Heilbronn (Germany) Mennonite Church, organized in 1890, is a member of the Verband badisch-württembergisch-bayrischer Mennonitengemeinden. With a membership (1953) of 122 and 35 children it is the largest congregation in the Verband. Elders are (1954) J. Musselmann (1937), Walter Landes (1943), Friedrich Schneider (1948). The congregation long met (since 1914 exclusively) in a rented hall in Heilbronn, but since 1948 has had its own meetinghouse in the form of a Swedish Red Cross barracks-church which was imported by the Mennonite Central Committee and used as headquarters for the committee's relief program conducted here 1947-52. Heilbronn has been the spiritual center for the Verband for many years and has been the most common meeting place for the meeting of its quarterly elders' and ministers' conferences. In 1918-40 meetings of the South German Conference were held frequently here also. In December 1944 it was severely bombed, being 80 per cent destroyed. However, most of the members being farmers, only one member lost his life in the catastrophe.

The congregation now called Heilbronn has, however, a much older history than its founding date of 1890 would indicate. It is actually the modern center of the easternmost end of the extensive eastern Palatinate Swiss Mennonite settlement, which, beginning around Mannheim and Heidelberg as early as 1664, had spread across the 20-30 miles to Wimpfen and Mosbach by 1731, with centers at Zuzenhausen, Sinsheim, and Hasselbach. The eastward movement apparently did not cross the Neckar until about 1770. The Dutch Naamlijst of 1769 lists "the other side of the Neckar" with Eibingen as the name of the location (congregation) with Hans Kauffman and Abraham Krehbiel as preachers. By 1780 the Naamlijst calls the congregation "Roschingen," with David Musselmann as preacher. From 1786 on to 1810 the congregation is called "Willenbach, Prutzenhof, Durrhof, and Roschingen," with an Abraham Zeisset listed as elder in 1784 (elder since 1749) and a second Abraham Zeisset elder from 1790 on. A. Huntzinger's Religions-, Kirchen- und Schulwesen der Mennoniten (Speyer, 1830), with a statistical table of all Mennonite locations in Baden, omits all four of the above names in the Willenbach congregation, and reports Lobenbacherhof (near Willenbach) with 3 families and 21 souls; J. Mannhardt's Namens-Verzeichnis of 1857 reports a Lobenbach congregation with 40 baptized members, lacking an elder but with a Christian Funk of Kochendorf preacher (ordained 1848), and adds that the services were held alternately in the homes of two members (Deacon Daniel Neukem lived at Lobenbach). H. Mannhardt's Jahrbuch of 1888 calls the congregation Lautenbach-Lobenbach with 52 baptized members and 21 children, and lists Christian Funk of Kochendorf as still preacher, with also Heinrich Fellmann of Lobenbach (1885) and Heinrich Landes (d. 1918, elder in 1885) of Lautenbach, services being held on alternate Sundays at the two large estates of Lautenbach and Lobenbach. Christian Hege of Breitenau became elder in 1890. The congregation is called simply Lobenbach at the first (1898) listing of congregations in the Gemeinde-Kalender. By 1904 it is called Lobenbach-Heilbronn, by 1915 Heilbronn alone. The high point of membership before World War II was reached in 1914 with 166 souls. Philipp Hege was a prominent elder in the Heilbronn congregation 1904-23. The Stuttgart congregation was formed out of Heilbronn in 1933. A prominent lay member in the 1920-45 period was Gustav Lichdi, founder of the large Lichdi grocery chain store system, still carried on by his son Kurt, now a preacher in the congregation.

The change in name of the congregation over a period of a century is explained by the fact that most of the members were renters of large estates, which were somewhat scattered and occasionally changed leases, hence they met as circumstances dictated in conveniently located farm homes. The congregation was then named after the most commonly and frequently used homes such as Willenbach, Lobenbach, and Lautenbach, all large farms within a few miles of each other and 5-10 miles northeast of Heilbronn. After 1914 the meetings were held exclusively in Heilbronn, which was a convenient railroad center. The number of Mennonites living in the city itself, and mostly engaged in trade or professions, increased as follows: 1890-5, 1905-5, 1910-22, 1925-47. However the backbone of the congregation has remained on the rented farm estates such as Lautenbach (q.v.), Willenbach, Breitenau, and Liebenstein (ML II, 275-77). H.S.B.

Heiloo, a village in the Dutch province of North Holland, south of Alkmaar, where 144 Mennonites, members of the Alkmaar congregation, formed a Kring (circle) in 1947. Services are sometimes held by the pastor of Alkmaar in a hall of the Reformed Church. There is also a ladies' circle. vdZ.

Heilsamen, a Mennonite group belonging to the Flemish (q.v.) branch of the church, which was found at the close of the 16th century at Danzig, Prussia, and of which Paulus Bussemaker was leader. He was banned by Hans Busschaert (q.v.) and Jacob Pieters van der Meulen (q.v.). About the group of the Heilsamen no further information was available. It may soon have merged with another group of Mennonites. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 691; BRN VII, 70; ML I, 304.) vdZ.

Heilsbote. The first literature of the Defenseless Mennonite Conference (now Evangelical Mennonite, q.v.) was a report of its first session held at Berne, Ind., Oct. 14-17, 1883. The first real effort of publication was a songbook called Glaubens-Lieder. In 1898 a resolution was passed by the conference to start a German paper under the name of Heilsbote.

In 1898 C. R. Egle (q.v.) of the Salem Church near Flanagan, Ill., purchased a printing press. The conference appointed him as editor of the Heilsbote, with Peter Hochstettler and Joseph Rediger as assistants, the first issue appearing in 1898. The purpose of this publication was to help unify the church and help create an interest in mission work which had been started in Africa. Egle was the editor until the paper was discontinued in December 1917. It was a four-page monthly, and during the last years of publication was printed by the Berne Witness Company. The English paper, Zion's Call (q.v.), was also started in 1898 in the interests of the Salem Children's Home. In 1913 it was made the official organ of the conference. It has undergone several changes, the name being altered about 1921 to Zion's Tidings. Since July 1953 it has been called the Evangelical Mennonite (q.v.), published jointly by the Evangelical Mennonite Conference, and the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Conference. E.E.Z.

Heimath, Zur: see Zur Heimath.

Heimatklänge: see Hymnology of the Mennonites of Prussia and Russia.

Heimbronnerhof (Haimbrunn), an estate in the Bretten district of Baden, Germany, owned by the Counts Douglas. Since 1822 the estate has been leased to Mennonites, formerly to the Funck and Horsch families, since 1916 to the Fellmann family. From about 1858 to 1916 biweekly religious services were held at the Heimbronnerhof, since during this period the families were members of the Hahnische (q.v.) Mennoniten (see Baden). (ML II, 279.) W.F.

Heinrich, Jakob, an Anabaptist of whom nothing is known except that he is the author of the hymn, "Ick roepe tot v wt dieper noot," and probably also "Ick moet eens gaen vertellen." (Wolkan, Lieder, 80; ML II, 279.) NEFF.

Heinsius, Anthonie, b. 1641 at Delft, d. 1720 at The Hague, a Dutch statesman (1689), Grand Pensionary of the territory of Holland and co-operator with Stadholder William III of Holland who in 1689 also became King of England. Heinsius, who played an important part in European politics, especially against the supremacy of France, and who belonged to the Reformed Church, should be mentioned here because of his loyalty and help to the Mennonites. He protected the Mennonites of Holland against oppressive measures of the Reformed ministers, and in 1710, informed by the Mennonite ministers Cornelis Beets of Amsterdam, Matthijs Diepenbroek of Haarlem, and Adriaen van Alkmaer of Rotterdam of the troubles which the Bernese Mennonites had with their government, he instructed (March 14, 1710) the registrar François Fagel (q.v.) to draw up a strong protest, which was approved by the States-General of the Netherlands on March 15, and was sent to the city council of Bern, Switzerland. In this address a protest is made against the Bernese policy of punishing the Mennonites in this territory with imprisonment, exile, galley slavery (q.v.), and even death. This protest is found in Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1759 and published in DB 1909, 132-35. Again in 1711 Heinsius acted in behalf of the persecuted Bernese Anabaptists. (N.N.B.Wb. I, 1058-61; DB 1909, 130, 141, 149; 1912, 97.) vdZ.

Heiz, Jakob, Reformed pastor in Othmarsingen, Switzerland, author of Täufer im Aargau (Aarau, 1902), a booklet of 101 pages, published as a separate reprint from the Taschenbuch der Historischen Gesellschaft des Kantons Aargau pro 1902. It offers a welcome supplement to Ernst Müller's Geschichte der bernischen Täufer. (ML II, 279.) NEFF.

Held, Matthias, a statesman in the ecclesiastical service of Emperor Charles V. He was a native of Arlon (Belgian Luxemburg). In 1527 he was made assessor in the court of chancellery in Speyer. When Charles V made his preparations for the Diet of Augsburg he summoned Held and in 1538 gave him the important office of chancellor; he was qualified for the position both by his knowledge of law and his zeal for the Catholic cause, and under his leadership the politics detrimental to ecclesiastical innovations were strongly promoted. A determined opponent of ecclesiastical attempts to come to an agreement, Held counseled against concessions to the Protestants. This policy won him the favor of the Catholic imperial estates, such as George of Saxony, Joachim of Brandenburg, Heinrich of Brunswick, etc. As leader of the imperial chancellery he accompanied the emperor on his campaigns to Italy and Spain, and on April 17, 1536, received the rank of knight in Rome. On the question of calling a council, which the Protestants rejected, he took a very partisan position. It was his objective to unite the Catholic estates in a consolidated union in order to achieve a unified position in opposition to the Schmalkaldian League. Thus in 1538 the Nürnberger Bund was founded, which was on the one hand to repel the Protestant estates, and on the other to promote the Catholic plans of Charles V (the Catholic reformation), but which found opponents within the Bund itself. In the end Held succumbed to the influence of Granvella, lost his position, withdrew into private life, and took up residence in Cologne. He died in 1563. LOSERTH.

Max Maurenbrecher's article in ADB II, pp. 672-84, where other literature is cited; ML II, 279.

Helder (or Den Helder), a town (1954 pop. 41,199 with 337 Mennonites) in the Dutch province of North Holland, now the most important base of the Royal Netherlands Navy, consists of three parts—the old town of Huisduinen, Den Helder, and Nieuwediep. In Huisduinen (q.v.) there has been a Mennonite congregation from very early times, at first called Flemish, later also called Frisian. It had apparently come into being by the merging of the Flemish and a Frisian congregation. Of this Frisian congregation nothing is known. Of the Flemish church there is only scarce information: it was a small congregation, whose members were mostly poor fishermen. The congregation was represented at the Flemish conference at Haarlem in 1649 and Leiden in 1660. The Flemish-Frisian congregation was merged in 1731 with a Waterlander congregation at Den Helder; at the time of this union the membership of the Huisduinen congregation was 60 baptized members, that of Den Helder only 25. The united congregation was rather poor in the 18th century; it was regularly subsidized both by the Amsterdam Lamist congregation and the Frisian Conference (Vriesche Sociëteit) of North Holland. The Huisduinen congregation had a brick meetinghouse, that of Den Helder a frame one erected in 1702. After the union of 1731 both meetinghouses remained in use until 1788, when the Huisduinen church was torn down and that of Den Helder replaced by a new brick church. This church was sold in 1853 after a new church had been built at Nieuwediep which is still in use. In the 18th century this congregation is usually called Huisduinen and Helder, in the 19th century Helder and Huisduinen, and now only Den Helder. In 1811-13 the meetinghouse was occupied by French soldiers until June 30, 1814. The membership, numbering 85 in 1731, increased to 132 in 1847, 179 in 1861, 227 in 1954. In 1922-41 the church of Den Hoorn on the island of Texel (q.v.) merged their preaching services with Helder.

Pastors who served here in the last century were P. Douwes Dekker 1844-61, J. Dyserinck 1861-79, J. P. van der Vegte 1880-88, D. Kossen 1891-95, C. B. Hylkema 1896-99, J. Keulen 1900-9, J. Koster 1909-26, P. J. Smidts 1927-41, Miss T. Rothfusz 1946-48, J. J. J. van Sluys 1949-54; the pulpit has been vacant since September 1954.

Church activities include a Sunday school for children (since 1896), ladies' circle, men's circle, church choir, Bible group. J.J.J. v.S.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1906-23; II, 2, No. 98; Naamlijst 1815, 89 f.; ML II, 279.

Helferich, Franz Joseph (1806-81), once a Catholic priest, became a Protestant pastor at Beedenkirchen, Hesse, Germany. He wrote the booklet, Die Kindertaufe oder eine offenherzige Ansprache an die Mennoniten Deutschlands von einem Freunde des Hinankommens zu einerlei Glaube und Erkenntnis des Sohnes Gottes (Mainz, 1865), of 28 pages, in which he discusses baptism from the Protestant viewpoint and makes an unskilled attempt to refute the Mennonite position, and then urges the Mennonites to join the state church in order to strengthen it in its common struggle against Rationalism. NEFF.

Menn. Bl., 1865, 77; 1866, 13, where counter arguments are presented; also the booklet by Wilhelm Fischer, Pfarrer Helferich, ein rheinhessischer Glaubenszeuge (Darmstadt); ML II, 280.

Hell. The New Testament speaks clearly of the final judgment which will bring about the great separation: eternal life for believers in Christ and eternal destruction for unbelievers and ungodly. The question that has always occupied serious minds is essentially whether this destruction or punishment is really eternal; i.e., to be considered unending or as temporary, even though of long duration, to be followed by complete annihilation or eternal salvation. The most important Bible references are Matt. 25:46; Mark 9:43, 44; II Thess. 1:9; and Heb. 6:2. The opponents of eternal punishment in hell understand the word "everlasting" to mean "of immeasurable length"; but this would then also apply to eternal life, which is expressly opposed to eternal destruction. A more profound objection to the idea of eternal punishment in hell originates in the thought that God is love. He cannot eternally be angry; this contradicts His nature, which is love and mercy. He does not "have pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live."

This was Hans Denk's (q.v.) concept. He points out Bible references like Jer. 3:12; Ps. 77:8; Rom. 5:18; 11:32. All of God's punishments, hence also hell, have the purpose of bringing about the lasting salvation of men, and of all mankind (see Universalism). This idea of Denk's was, however, by no means common to the Anabaptists, as the Confession of Augsburg apparently assumes when it says (Art. 17): "Therefore the Anabaptists are rejected, who teach that the devils and damned persons do not have eternal pain and torment."

All Mennonite confessions of faith teach expressly in the words of the Bible, that the ungodly will suffer eternal punishment in hell. The Confession of Cornelis Ris says (XXXVI, Of Eternal Punishment): "This condition will consist in a total absence of God, of all good, all comfort and all salvation, as also in the feeling of the insufferable wrath of God and His avenging righteousness, both in soul and body, without any hope of release or alleviation into all eternity. . . . What makes this unblessed state most desperately terrifying is the fact that the Holy Scriptures give not the least ground for expecting release; on the contrary calling it everlasting pain, the punishment of everlasting fire, a worm that dieth not. . . ." The Dordrecht Confession of 1632 teaches: "that in contrast (to eternal life) the wicked or ungodly will be cast into outer darkness as cursed ones, yea into everlasting pain, where their worm will not perish nor their fire be extinguished, and where they (according to the Scriptures) can expect no hope, consolation, or salvation in eternity." (ML II, 340.)

NEFF.

Hellertown, a village (borough) in Lower Saucon Twp., Northampton Co., Pa., not far from Bethlehem. Near the village but now within the city limits of Bethlehem stands a building which was once a school and church building, shared by the Mennonites and the Baptists as a place of worship. Apparently services were conducted here beginning sometime before 1800, although interments were made in the adjoining cemetery as early as 1769 or before. A building was erected in 1802, burned and rebuilt in 1854, and rebuilt again in 1891. Nothing is known of an organized Mennonite congregation in the area, but the 1790 U.S. census lists such Mennonite names in Lower Saucon Township as Bachman, Baer, Boyer, Derr, Geissinger, Gross, Heebner, Landis, Snyder, and Weaver. The building, now known as the Limekiln Schoolhouse, has been converted into a private dwelling.

J.C.W.

Hellmannsberg, a large estate located about ten miles northeast of Ingolstadt, Bavaria, residence of Elder Michael Horsch 1913-49, longtime seat of the relief work known as "Christenpflicht" (q.v.), of which Horsch was chairman.

Hellrigl (Helrigling), Ursula, is mentioned first in the court records of June 3, 1539, when the Innsbruck authorities reported to Ferdinand I that a peasant girl of 18 years, a native of the Upper Inn Valley, had been in prison at St. Petersberg nearly 15 months. In pity for her youth and sex, attempts had been made by Dr. Gallus Müller (q.v.) to convert her. Though she was not versed in the Scriptures, she clung to her faith because her coreligionists lived less frivolously than the world. Her mother, an Anabaptist, had died in prison. One of her three brothers had recanted, and was now pleading for his sister's release. Ferdinand was inclined to grant the request, but feared that such a release would strengthen ignorant persons in their error. He ordered that she should be further instructed. In the following year her family appealed again. On Aug. 13, 1540, the king ordered her sent to Italy, where she would not know the language. Thus she came to Sigmundskron, and in 1543 she was finally pardoned "for the sake of her youth and the petitions of her friends," Peter Müller of Silz having promised to pay the costs of the case, and returned to her people. The Hutterian chronicles report that she was tied to the feet of Brother Liebich when he was racked. But neither of them recanted. "What the devil and his children wished to see happen is easy to imagine. But they were honorable and pious, and did not let any temptations cause them to sin." She is credited with the hymn, "Ewiger Gott vom Himmelreich" (13 stanzas).

Daniel Hellrigl, an Anabaptist, who died at Nikolsburg, April 3, 1615, "an aged preacher," was probably a relative of Ursula's. Zacharias Hellrigl (1580-1630) is the author of five hymns: "Die Danksagung des Morgens"; "Elend hat mich betroffen"; "Erheb meine Seel den Herrn"; "Vom Leben und Tod des Frommen"; "Es ist nun um die Vesperzeit."

LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 157-59; J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol (Vienna, 1892) 241; Wolkan, Lieder, 178; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 838-46; Mart. Mir. D 64, E 466 f.; ML II, 280.

Hellum, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen, where Leenaert Bouwens baptized 16 persons in 1557-65. A congregation at this place, however, was not found.

vdZ.

Helm, Matthias, the head of the Hutterian Brethren 1701-24. The Väterlied gives a few data of his life. He died in 1724 at the age of 87. He was chosen probational preacher May 6, 1688, and confirmed March 15, 1689, at Sobotiste; he served the brotherhood in this capacity for 36 years. He was by trade a scythe-smith.

The Väterlied gives him the tribute of having been an upright man, understanding and wise. When as an old man, oppressed by ill health, he felt his death imminent, he urged the Brethren to choose Jakob Wollmann as his successor. It is rather remarkable that in 1678 the Schadsche Chronik (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, p. XVII) was in Helm's possession.

Since the Wolkan edition of the Geschicht-Buch closes with 1665, Beck's edition of the Geschichts-Bücher must be used for this period. The most important source is the continuation of the Väterlied, pp. 563 and 565 in Beck. The Väterlied is also in the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 878. The Klein-Geschichtsbuch (Phila., 1947) does not mention him at all. (ML II, 280 f.)

Loserth.

Helmstadt, a village (1925 pop. 1,111) in the Sinsheim district of Baden, Germany, with 22 Mennonites. In the Mennonite lists of the Palatinate Helmstadt is mentioned for the first time in 1717 with eight Mennonite families. In Goldruthen zur Geschichte von Helmstadt (Karlsruhe, 1867, 21), Pastor Ludwig says that in 1727 a Mennonite, Hans Schmutz, settled in Helmstadt; his descendants farmed the estate "Wasserschloss," belonging to the counts of Berlichingen, until the beginning of the 20th century. About 1731 there was in Helmstadt a Mennonite congregation of 12 families; their preachers were Hans Schmutz (presumably the above-mentioned) and Christian Schmutz (Müller, Berner Täufer, 209). Later the church was merged with the Hasselbach congregation. In the last quarter of the 19th century the meetings of the Badischer Verband elders were held almost exclusively in the "Wasserschloss" at Helmstadt. (ML II, 281.)

Hege.

Helwys, Thomas, one of the founders of the Baptist Church, b. ca. 1570 near Broxtowe Hall, 40 miles west of Gainsborough, England, son of Edmund Helwys, of an old baronial family. Edmund Helwys had Puritan convictions. He died in 1590 and left Thomas as his sole heir. Thomas attended Gray's Inn in London as a law student. He was soon known as a Puritan and Nonconformist at Broxtowe Hall and received and advised members of various confessions (see England). About 1606 he came under the influence of John Smyth (q.v.), having already withdrawn from the Anglican Church, and became pastor of the Nonconformist Union at Gainsborough (q.v.).

About 1607 Helwys was in complete agreement with Smyth. To escape the oppression instigated by Bancroft under James I, he emigrated to the Netherlands with the members of the Gainsborough and Scrooby groups. In Amsterdam he apparently sided entirely with Smyth in the differences of opinion that had developed there between Johnson and Ainsworth. The schisms in Smyth's party had begun in 1609. Baptism, church capital, and ordination had been recognized by some, who also rejected adult baptism. Several months later, when Smyth himself had come to the conclusion that it was an error to re-introduce baptism and leaned toward union with the Mennonites, Helwys charged him with apostasy and sinning against the Holy Spirit (under whose guidance the group had previously claimed to act), and wrote an urgent appeal to the Mennonites not to accept Smyth and his followers as brethren.

Helwys presented a brief confession of faith and published a clear exposition of the points in which he agreed with the Mennonites. These points were the general doctrine of redemption in contrast to the Calvinistic unqualified predestination and eternal damnation, as well as a rejection of infant baptism. Like the Mennonites he denied the right of the political authorities to limit religious liberty; on the other hand, he did not agree with them in their view on capital punishment and participation in government. Also the true Adamic nature of Christ and the apostolic succession were points of conflict. On the oath and military service he differed from the Mennonites, and charged Smyth with placing too high a value on the apostolic succession, which charge Smyth, however, denied.

Helwys then wanted to be convinced that he and all those who had fled to the Netherlands had erred, or perhaps sinned, in avoiding persecution. The evangelicals in England were now without a leader who would oppose the fallen, corrupted church. Followed by John Murton (q.v.) and a small group of followers he returned to England late in 1611 or early 1612, and settled in London, where he had influential relatives. The small congregation was severely persecuted, but still succeeded in maintaining itself. About 1626 there were four associations, from whom the General Baptists originated (see Baptists): London, Tiverton Sarum, Coventry, and Lincoln. Dissensions on the deity of Christ and other points were still an issue. Both sides appealed to the Dutch Mennonites for counsel and moral support.

Shortly before his return to England, Helwys published two books in defense of his concept of salvation and adult baptism. In England he published A Short Declaration of the Mystery of Iniquity (1612). Little is known of his later life. He apparently died before 1616. John Murton was now recognized as leader of the party and with other Baptists he published several tracts on freedom of conscience. (See also Baptists, Brownists, Smyth.)

A.H.N.

W. T. Whitly, The Works of John Smith with Notes and Biography (2 vv., Cambridge, 1915); W. H. Burgess, John Smith, the Se Baptist, Thomas Helwys (1912); B. Evans, The Early English Baptists (2 vv., London, 1862-64); De Hoop Scheffer and Griffis, History of the Free Churchmen (Ithaca, N.Y., n.d., 1902) 148 ff., 169 ff.; A. C. Underwood, A History of the English Baptists (London, 1947); ML II, 281 f.

Hembling, a "preaching appointment" (MC) in Woolwich Twp., Waterloo Co., Ont. William Hembling from England homesteaded here about 1831. He was ordained deacon of the Mennonite Church in 1858. The North Woolwich appointment was first known as Hembling. It is presumed that services were conducted in his home before the building of the church in 1872. The meetings were listed at four-week intervals. About 1875 Hembling associated himself with the Mennonite Brethren in Christ movement. After the schism of 1889 the North Woolwich church was used exclusively by the Old Order Mennonites. The Mennonite Church (MC) built its meetinghouse a few miles south at Floradale in 1896. Early ministers were Abraham W. Detwiler (1828-1912) and Joseph Gingerich (1842-1912). Peter Bowman became deacon in 1876. J.C.F.

L. J. Burkholder, A Brief History of the Mennonites of Ontario (Toronto, 1935) 69, where a picture of Hembling is found.

Hemelum, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, where there was a Waterlander Mennonite congregation from the 16th century until it joined the near-by congregation of Warns about 1700. (Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 65; DB 1903, 82.) vdZ.

Hemert, Gerardus van (den), b. 1698 at Middelburg in the Netherlands, d. there 1759, a Reformed minister of Hellevoetsluis 1720-21, Voorschoten 1721-22, and Middelburg 1722-59. He refused a call as professor of theology at the Utrecht University in 1737. Van Hemert was a violent antagonist of the Mennonites. He attacked Gerardus de Wind (q.v.), the Mennonite preacher of Middelburg, in his booklet, G. de Wind . . . uit zyne Verhandeling van Godts Algemeene Genade ontmaskert, . . . (Middelburg, 1730). After G. Maatschoen (q.v.) had translated Schijn's history of the Mennonites from the Latin into the Dutch language, van Hemert published: Brief . . . aan den Here G. Maatschoen Betreffende voornamelijk den oorsprong en betrekking der Mennoniten of Doopsgezinden in opzigt tot de Munstersche en andere oproerige Doopsgezinden . . . (Middelburg, 1744). (Biogr. Wb. III, 658-60; DJ 1840, 128; DB 1891, 66.) vdZ.

Hemme Hauxkens (Haucx), a member of the Waterlander Mennonite congregation of Workum, Dutch province of Friesland, was in 1578, at the age of 75, chosen burgomaster of the town of Workum (DB 1899, 58, 60). Though it was unusual that Dutch Mennonites in this early period, and even in the following centuries, accepted government offices, some government officials were found among the Waterlanders, as this case proves. vdZ.

Henderson (Neb.), was established as a Mennonite community in 1874 by 35 families (207 persons) coming from the Molotschna settlement, South Russia, who purchased land in York and Hamilton counties from the Burlington and Missouri Railroad Company. The first group of settlers bought 6,008 acres at $3-$9 per acre, reserving 900 additional acres for relatives. By 1882 some 140 families had settled there. At present the population has increased to nearly 3,000. The first settlers lived in an immigrant house about a mile east of the present site of Henderson. Some sod houses were erected which were replaced after a few years. The first houses and villages were patterned after those which they left behind in Russia; but this practice was soon discontinued. In 1887 the Northwestern Railroad Company built a branch line running through the town of Henderson, which had been established in 1878 in the heart of the Mennonite settlement. All the business in the village is conducted by Mennonites. As a result of the severe drought and the depression following World War I many of the farmers began irrigation farming, which has proved to be successful. Regarding education, religious life, and other questions pertaining to the settlement, see Bethesda Mennonite Church, Henderson Mennonite Brethren Church, Ebenezer Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church, Henderson Bethesda Preparatory School. C.K.

Theodore Schmidt, "The Mennonites of Nebraska" (thesis, University of Nebraska, 1933) 13 ff.; J. J. Friesen, "Remaking a Community—Henderson, Nebraska," Menn. Life V (October 1950) 10 ff.

Henderson Bethesda Preparatory School (German, Fortbildungsschule), located at Henderson, Neb., began as a secondary school built in 1902. The two-year course of study was modeled after the Hillsboro (Kan.) Preparatory School (q.v.) conducted by H. D. Penner. Christian Hege and J. J. Friesen were early teachers. When the public school began to offer full high-school courses (1911), attendance at the church school gradually declined, and the curriculum was limited more to Bible and German. The school was closed in 1932 and reopened as the Bethesda Bible School (Schmidt). In addition to this school there has also been a Henderson Bible School since 1933 under the leadership of J. R. Barkman. The list of schools under Bible School (ME I, p. 332) also mentions a Henderson Bible School of the General Conference started in 1942. This school has also been discontinued. Religious training is taken care of in special classes during the regular Sunday-school hour. (See Preparatory Schools.) H.D.E.

Theodore Schmidt, "The Mennonites of Nebraska" (thesis, University of Nebraska, 1933) 43 ff.; Katalog, Bethesda Fortbildungsschule, 1902 ff.

Henderson (Neb.) Bible School began in 1902 as a secondary school, called the "Fortbildungsschule." The course of study was modeled after a school in Hillsboro, Kan., conducted by H. D. Penner. The Henderson school was built and supported by the Bethesda Mennonite (GCM) church of Henderson. The highest enrollment, 69, was in the beginning when two divisions were offered. When the public school began to offer a full high-school course, ca. 1911, the attendance at the church school declined. About 1924 a change was made in its curriculum, instruction being limited to Bible subjects, and the name was changed to "Bible School." This school was discontinued in 1952. The plan now is to have special classes during the regular Sunday-school hour to supply the instruction intended by the Bible School. (See preceding article.) H.D.E.

Henderson (Neb.) Mennonite Brethren Church began in 1876 when seven M.B. families settled in York and Hamilton counties, Nebraska. The church was organized the next year with 30 charter members. Peter Regier and Heinrich Nickel were their leaders and became ministers. John J. Regier (d. 1902) was the first elder. By 1880 the church membership was 120, and by 1888 it had increased to 226. In 1887 a church 40 x 80 ft. was built three miles northwest of Henderson, which was replaced in 1926 by a church in town. In the early years the church endured severe testings through strange teaching on divine healing, sanctification, and Seventh-Day Adventism, but weathered them through the wise counsel and guidance of Elder Regier.

In 1902 the church elected John J. Kliewer as presiding minister and leader and two years later as elder, serving until 1924. He was followed by the ministers Gerhard Wiens and John Abrahams. Other ministers who have served the church as pastors are David Hooge, B. B. Fadenrecht, H. B. Kliewer, H. E. Wiens, Art. Flaming, and H. R. Berg. The membership in 1954 was 275.

A number of missionaries and other Christian workers have come from this congregation. Among these should be mentioned the evangelist J. S. Regier, and the foreign missionaries, Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Wiens, Mr. and Mrs. B. F. Wiens, Mrs. J. S. Dick, Miss Tina Kornelsen, Mrs. P. V. Balzer, and Mrs. J. J. Kasper. H.E.W.

Hendrick: see also Hendrik, Henric, Heyn(d)rich.

Hendrick Alewijnsz (Heijndrick Walewyns), an Anabaptist martyr. He was a native of Aelburch, in the district of Heusden, Dutch province of North Brabant, by trade a maker of bags or knapsacks. Being thus a simple artisan, he is called by his Catholic opponents a "professoor ende leeraar van den secte van Menno." He lived in Vlissingen, Dutch province of Zeeland, and was active in preaching on the island of Walcheren, was banished in 1567 but remained and continued his activity until he was arrested at Souburg near Vlissingen in August 1568. He was put in prison at Middelburg, the capital of Zeeland, and tortured on Sept. 13, 1568. Remaining steadfast in his faith he was strangled and then burned at the stake on Feb. 9, 1569, with Gerrit Duynherder (q.v.) and Hans Marijnsz (q.v.). Alewijnsz was 36 years of age when he died. In prison he wrote some devotional letters. These were soon published: (1) Veele schoone grondige leeringen wt des Heeren woort, 1577, n.p.; (2) Een vaderlyck Adieu, Testament en sorchvuldighe onderwysinghe, . . . aan zijne Kinderen, published by Nicolaas Biestkens (q.v.) at Amsterdam in 1578 and included by van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror; (3) a reprint of (1), n.p. (apparently by Gillis Rooman at Haarlem 1581, followed by six letters "written in my prison at Middelburg," the first of which is dated Aug. 18, 1568, the last Jan. 20, 1569). This volume, which is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library, also contains two songs made by Alewijnsz. "Och wilt u doch eens schamen, ghy roemers al te samen" (Oh, be ashamed, ye boasters all together), and "Hoert mijn Adieu myn vrienden doch" (Hear my farewell, my friends), included in Wackernagel, Lieder, 203-5; from this book a letter, "Een gantsch Christelijcke groet," and his confession have been copied in the Dutch martyrbooks, including van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror; (4) Nos. 1 and 3 were reprinted together at Hoorn 1611 by Zacharias Cornelisz. A French translation of Alewijnsz' booklet Veele schoone grondige leeringen was published in 1626 n.p., under the title Ensuivent Plusieurs belles Instructions, as an appendix to the French edition of Dirk Philips' (q.v.) Enchiridion. The Martyrs' Mirror contains a letter of November 1569, his confession, and his farewell letter to his children. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 389-405; E 742-57; Bibliographie des Martyrologes Prot. Neerl. I, 1-10, 645 f.; Biogr. Wb. I, 83 f., III, 676 f.; K. R. Pekelharing, Gesch. der Hervorming in Zeeland 1524-72 (1866) 73-86; DJ 1840, 64-65; DB 1870, 51; 1899, 77 f., 90 f., 138; 1908, 16, 62; ML I, 20.

Hendrick Kistemaecker (Henrik van Zutphen), a Dutch Anabaptist leader, adherent of Jan van Leyden and the Münsterite (q.v.) principles, was active in Groningen and Deventer in 1534-35, where he baptized. By trade he was a tailor. At the conference of Anabaptist leaders at Bocholt in 1536 he still defended the Münsterite principles. (DB 1917, 114, No. 46; 1919, 13; Mellink, Wederdopers, see Index.) vdZ.

Hendrick Simons, coauthor with Willem Seghers (q.v.) of the song "Wij clagent o Heer, ons doch verhoort." (Wolkan, Lieder, 70.)

Hendrick Willems(z): see Heijnric Willemse Saelmaker.

Hendricx, Joost: see Hendriksz, Joost.

Hendrik, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr named by van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror (D 288, E 655) may be either Hendrik van Dale (q.v.) or Hendrick de Raymakere (q.v.). vdZ.

Hendrik Aerts, an Anabaptist martyr, a hatter of Halewijn (Halluin), Belgium, was taken prisoner at that place together with his wife Janneken Cabeljaus and eleven others by the notorious inquisitor Titelman (q.v.), and was brought to Rijssel. Among the group was the preacher Jan de Swarte (q.v.). Hendrik was burned at the stake on March 17, 1563, at Rijssel with five others of this group; the others were executed later. Hendrik was a native of Driel, Dutch province of Gelderland. (Mart. Mir. D 299-300, E 665; ML I, 86.) vdZ.

Hendrik Anthonisz, an Anabaptist martyr, was captured with five fellow believers in 1552 at Amsterdam. Before the council they declared that they intended to remain loyal to their faith. The government ordered him and Reyer Egbertsz to be tortured on June 28. Because they did not recant then, they were condemned to die at the stake on Aug. 6, 1552. Hendrik confessed that he had not been baptized, but was "ready for it." Their property was confiscated. On the same day all of the group met their death at the stake. (Mart. Mir. D 142 f., E 536; ML I, 75.) O.H.

Hendrik Arents, an Anabaptist martyr, a carpenter by trade, was seized in Brielle near Rotterdam while engaged in repairing a ship. He did not know that it belonged to pirates. Nevertheless he was taken to Rotterdam with the pirates, where they were sentenced to death by hanging. From a petition in which Hendrick stated his innocence, the governor noticed that he was dealing with an Anabaptist. Hendrik was again examined, openly confessed his faith, and was condemned to die at the stake; after a two weeks' imprisonment he bore his suffering with great courage. (Mart. Mir. D 383, E 736; ML I, 81.) O.H.

Hendrik van Arnhem (Henric van Aernem), "with the crippled foot," a tailor from the district of Cleve, Germany, was an elder in the Anabaptist congregation at Antwerp, Belgium. The martyr Bartel (q.v.) had a conversation with him there about Mary van Beckum. Little is known about this elder. He was apparently prominent. The Amsterdam authorities had put a price upon his head, which was raised in 1566 to 200 Caroli-guilders. Among those he baptized were the martyrs Jan Ghijselinck, Gheert Vermandele, Martijnken Meere, and Belijnken de Jaghere, in the presence of about 20 other Anabaptists. He also played the role of arbitrator in the dispute between the Frisians and the Flemish, having been called for that purpose as a buitenleraar (q.v.) to Friesland several times during the winter of 1566-67. He sided with the Flemish, but was accused by some fanatics of sympathy for the Frisians. In 1570 he was still an elder. vdZ.

K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 146; BRN VII, 64; DB 1893, 31-76, passim; A. L. E. Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," msc, p. 32; Mart. Mir. D 103, E 500.

Hendrik Bauwens, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Gent, Belgium, at eleven o'clock, July 28, 1573, on the Vrijdagsmarkt. He was a native of Mechelen, a lace-maker by trade. His name is not found in van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror; but the names of Jacob van der Weghe and Fransoys van Leuvene, who died as martyrs with him, are given there. For that matter van Braght is not quite complete in respect to the martyrs from Gent. (Verheyden, Gent, No. 226, 63.) vdZ.

Hendrik Beverts (Groote Hendrick, or Henric van Deventer), an Anabaptist martyr, by trade a goldsmith or silversmith, was burned at the stake at Antwerp on Sept. 1, 1551, together with Jeronimus Segersz, who wrote a letter to him in prison while he was also a prisoner. He experienced "much severe torment and examination on the rack," but could not be deflected from his faith. Unafraid he approached the stake to which he was then tied to be burned. vdZ.

Offer, 151, 152, 175; Mart. Mir. D 107, E 514; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 402, 414, 417; XIV, 18 f., No. 201.

Hendrik Biesman (Henrick Byesman), an Anabaptist martyr, was put to death at Amsterdam on March 6, 1535, with eight others, among them Jan Paeuw (q.v.). He was born in Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, where he associated with the Anabaptists in September 1534, and also held meetings in his house. He was arrested and tried at Maastricht on Oct. 28, 1534; here he apparently recanted and was released. Soon after he probably went to Amsterdam, perhaps by way of Antwerp, where he also saw Anabaptists. vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 85, 88 f.; Mart. Mir. D 412, E 763; Grosheide, Verhooren, 52 f.

Hendrik Busch Varcken, an Anabaptist martyr, a lawyer, b. in Brussels, betrayed by Reynier Willems, who was a follower of David Joris (q.v.), was beheaded at Alkmaar on Jan. 23, 1541, although he confessed that he was sorry that he had accepted baptism. vdZ.

Hendrik Cramer (official name, Henrick Evert Valckerzoon), a native of Zutphen, Dutch province of Gelderland, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed at Amsterdam on July 28, 1535, after he had been tortured three times. In the charge brought against him, the following items are catalogued: he had been rebaptized at Coesfeld by Henrick Slachtscaep (q.v.); he had associated with these Anabaptist heretics; he had as a peddler (cramer) visited Münster and left the city with Jan van Gheel (van Geelen, q.v.) and two men from Friesland, transporting to Deventer in his peddler's pack some Anabaptist books printed in Münster, he had been aware of the Anabaptist assault (May 10-11, 1535) on the town hall of Amsterdam, without informing the city government. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 141-44, 160; Mellink, Wederdopers, see Index.) vdZ.

Hendrik van Dale, an Anabaptist martyr: see Heyndrick van Dale.

Hendrik van Echtelo (Eckelo, Eeclo(o), also called Heyndrik de Schoenmaker), an Anabaptist martyr, was a young man, who according to van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, was beheaded in 1572 at Gent, Belgium, on the Vrijdag market place. Verheyden, studying the sources, found a heretic, not especially denounced as an Anabaptist, called Hendrick van Eecloo, who was a weaver and who was hanged on May 29, 1572, outside the Muyden Gate at Gent. Verheyden is doubtful whether these two accounts can refer to the same person and states that the problem of Hendrik van Eckelo (van Eecloo) cannot be clarified. Van Braght reports that Hendrik is the author of a song beginning "Aenghesien de nature mij dit te mercken doet" (Because nature makes me know this). This song is found in Sommighe Stichtelyke Liedekens bij diverse personen gemaeckt (Hoorn, 1632) 64. (Mart. Mir. D 566, E 896; Verheyden, Gent, 58 f., No. 204; ML I, 502.) vdZ.

Hendrik Eemkens (Henrick Emken), an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Loquard in East Friesland, Germany, a tailor, a simple man unable to read or write; but he defended his faith with amazing skill, clearness, and conviction against a monk sent to convert him. Eemkens was baptized by Joost Verbeek in 1561. He was executed on June 10, 1562, at Utrecht. His death is described by van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 294, E 660) with an etching by Luyken. His wife Anna was baptized with him and was likewise captured and tortured; but nothing is known concerning her death. (DB 1903, 12 ff., 51; ML I, 507.) NEFF.

Hendrik Eeuwesz, an Anabaptist martyr, the husband of the martyr Claesken (q.v.) and the brother-in-law of the martyr Jaques d'Auchy (q.v.), was secretly executed with them on March 14, 1559, by drowning in a tub in prison at Leeuwarden. (Mart. Mir. D 242, E 611; Offer, 268 note, 324, 330, 336 f., 341; DB 1899, 36, 38; ML I, 507.) NEFF.

Hendrik van Etten, born at Breda, Dutch province of North Brabant, Anabaptist martyr, seized with his friend Abraham Picolet (q.v.) by soldiers of Duke Alba, and although they had not yet been baptized, they were burned at the stake at Antwerp in 1569 together with Maeyken van der Goes (q.v.) after a frank confession of their faith. In prison van Etten wrote several letters which have been lost, in which as an ex-soldier he exhorted his friends to persevere in the battle assigned to them. (Mart. Mir. D 475, E 818; ML I, 614.) NEFF.

Hendrik Goedbeleid (Goedtbeleed), a Dutch Anabaptist, was killed during the assault on the town hall of Amsterdam on May 10-11, 1535. He was a native of Amsterdam, belonged to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism, and was an accomplice of the Münsterite leader Jan van Geelen (q.v.), with whom he traveled to Brussels (April 1535) to contact the imperial government concerning transferring the city of Münster into the domain of Emperor Charles V. His confession is important as to the activities of the Münsterite movement. vdZ.

Grosheide, Verhooren, 17, 21-22, 77, 80, 82, 117; Mellink, Wederdopers, see Index.

Hendrik Gutwol, an Anabaptist martyr: see Guthwohl, Heinrich.

Hendrik Gysbrecht (Hendrik van Kampen), an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Kampen, was seized at Hoorn, Dutch province of North Holland, with Sybrand Jansz, Steven Benedictus, Femmetje Egbertsdochter, and Welmoed Jansdochter, and sentenced to death on June 7, 1535, on the charge made by Anton Sonck that they had been rebaptized. The men were beheaded, their bodies broken on the wheel, and their heads set on poles; the women were drowned. K.V.

Mart. Mir. D 36 f., E 443; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 131; Mellink, Wederdopers, 168 f.; ML II, 213.

Hendrik Hendricksz (Henrick Henricxz), a native of Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, an otherwise unknown Dutch Anabaptist, was executed at Rotterdam, Holland, on March 13, 1535. He belonged to the Münsterites (q.v.) and was not a citizen of Rotterdam. (DB 1905, 171; Mellink, Wederdopers, 224 f.) vdZ.

Hendrik Hendriksz, a tailor at Amsterdam, a Dutch Anabaptist, was one of the Naaktlopers (q.v.) and was beheaded at Amsterdam on Feb. 2, 1535. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 57 f.) vdZ.

Hendrik van Hilversum, an Anabaptist leader: see Henric Rol.

Hendrik Koel van Gelder (Hendrik Pietersz), a Dutch Anabaptist, beheaded at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, on Jan. 10, 1539, was an ardent follower of David Joris (q.v.). He was a fanatical zealot who believed that the Holy Ghost rested on David Joris and that his writings emanated from the Holy Ghost. (DB 1917, 115, No. 22.) vdZ.

Hendrik Leer(ver)koper, a leather merchant at Antwerp, Belgium, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded at Antwerp on Oct. 8, 1558. The goods he left were confiscated. His official name was Hendrick Dache(?), a native of Fleru (Fleurus?). His wife was drowned because of "Anabaptist heresy" at Antwerp on March 19, 1559. The name of Hendrik is found in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), included in Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, No. 16. vdZ.

Offer, 565; Mart. Mir. D 202, E 583; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 450, 464; IX, 17; XIV, 24 f., No. 264; ML II, 626.

Hendrik van Maastricht (also called Henrick Caerdemaker), a Dutch Anabaptist belonging to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism. He had traveled widely, and places of his activity were Goch, Cleve, Antwerp, Edam, Monnikendam, Amsterdam, and the Gooi-district near Amsterdam. He was arrested in Amsterdam in February 1536. Several times from February 26 until April 29 he was tried and sometimes tortured. His confessions reveal many interesting particulars about the Anabaptist movement in the Netherlands. He had joined the Anabaptists in March 1534, not by being baptized, but by laying on of hands by Claes van Enchuysen. vdZ.

DB 1917, 111, No. 23; Grosheide, Verhooren, 19, 168-77; Mellink, Wederdopers, see Index.

Hendrik Maelschap (Maesschop, Maelschalk, Maerschalk), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on the Veerle square at Gent, Belgium. He had been arrested on his way to a meeting with Jan van Parijs, Peter van Cleve (Pieter Aelbrechts), and Laurens Pietersz; they had not yet been baptized, but they wished to be faithful and confessed their faith "without fear," and were therefore sentenced to death in 1568. As they were to be burned they sang together, "Ick roep v, o Hemelsch Vader, aen, wil myn geloove sterken," and were therefore beaten by the Spaniards. Steadfastly they endured their cruel martyrdom. In prison Maelschap wrote a letter on Jan. 26, 1568, to a friend Goelken, stating that they were all in good spirits and wanted to remain faithful to the Lord until death, and admonished her and all his friends in Biblical terms to live a Christian life to the end. In addition he sent her three songs as a friendly and sincere greeting; "Although they are simple, accept them with thanks, for they were sent in love, Farewell to eternity. Amen." In a postscript written on the next day he describes the cross-examination they had to endure. When he was asked whether he would desist from his faith, he answered that he had desisted from lies and was now following the truth; he hoped to stay by the truth through the grace of the Lord. These martyrs are commemorated in the song "Alsmen schreef duyst vijf hondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede," which is found in the appendix to the Lietboecxcken van den Offer des Heeren. NEFF.

Offer, 652; Mart. Mir. D 367 ff., E 723 ff.; Verheyden, Gent, 43, No. 138; ML II, 711.

Hendrik van Maren: see Maren (Maeren), Hendrik van.

Hendrik (de) Naeldeman (Naeldemaker), a Dutch Mennonite elder living at Franeker, Dutch province of Friesland; Karel Vos concluded that he was a tailor. He was one of the men involved in the dispute among the Dutch Mennonites in 1555 on the strict or lenient application of the ban (which was really a question of individual liberty versus obligation to the brotherhood). In opposition to Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.), he advocated a triple warning before the use of the ban; in other words, he regarded the ban as a means of discipline. In Waterland, North Holland, Gillis van Aken (q.v.) forced the issue, and brethren in other places also were divided; but Menno Simons (q.v.) managed to preserve unity in Waterland by a visit to Waterland (1555) and a letter to the brotherhood in Franeker (1557), where the moderate wing was led by Naeldeman and Joriaen Heynsz. But when Leenaert Bouwens enforced the strict ban in Emden, and Heynsz and Naeldeman were put in the ban, the conflict arose again, also in Franeker. In 1557 Menno again attempted to bring about a reconciliation, and was at first apparently successful. But at the conference held in Harlingen Leenaert Bouwens and Dirk Philips carried the day with their strict interpretation of the ban, and unity was ended. Naeldeman wrote a letter to Menno, which deprived Menno of his last hope of reconciliation. The moderate "Franekeraars," commonly known as the Waterlanders, whose position was shared by the South German Anabaptists, went their own way. In 1620 there was still a group of Mennonites in Middelburg (q.v.) known as the (Hendrick) Naeldemans-volk. VDZ.

BRN VII, 54 f.; DB 1894, 32, 36, 39, 41-44; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 132, 135, 137, 191, 257; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 316 f., 319-24; ML III, 197.

Hendrik Niclaes: see Niclaes, Heinrich.

Hendrik Pruyt (Spruyt), an Anabaptist martyr, was put to death in 1574 at Workum, Dutch province of Friesland. Hendrik, a bargeman of Harderwijk, Dutch province of Gelderland, was arrested by the Spanish soldiers, when he passed by Workum with his boat. As the soldiers approached he said to his wife Trijntje Jans: "Dear, there comes the wolf." Hendrik was imprisoned for some time in the military office of Workum and after it had been proved clearly that he was a Mennonite he was sentenced to death without a regular trial. His death was very cruel. He was stripped, tarred, and thrown into a little boat, hands and legs bound together. When ebb tide set in, the boat was set on fire and Hendrik floated away with the stream. Half burned, his ropes loosened by the fire, he sprang into the sea; but then soldiers following him in another boat killed him with their spears. His wife managed to escape. (Mart. Mir. D 691, E 1005; DB 1895, 55-58; ML III, 403 f.) VDZ.

Hendrik Rol: see Henric Rol.

Hendrik Slachtscaep (Heinrich, Henric von Tongeren), one of the "Wassenberg preachers" (q.v.), born ca. 1470 at Tongeren, bishopric of Liége, a former Catholic priest, came more and more to Protestant convictions, which he preached in popular style with great force and success. Of especial interest are his tracts, Der Trostbrief, and the epistle Aen myne liefte broeders en susters tot Sustern (Rembert, 357). He was a determined opponent of infant baptism. In 1531 he preached in Wassenberg, Coesfeld (q.v.), Aachen, and Maastricht (q.v.). Against him and Campanus (q.v.) was issued the edict of the government of Düsseldorf of Nov. 1, 1532 (Keller, 295). Invited by Bernhard Rothmann (q.v.) by letter, he betook himself to Münster (1534) and was baptized there. Then he was sent out with the other "Wassenberg preachers" as apostles; he was executed as a martyr at Soest on Oct. 23, 1534. NEFF.

L. Keller, Geschichte der Wiedertäufer und ihres Reiches zu Münster (Münster, 1880); Rembert, Wiedertäufer; DB 1917, 120, No. 109; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 50-52 and passim; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index.

Hendrik Spruyt: see Hendrik Pruyt.

Hendrik Terwoort, an Anabaptist martyr, about 26 years of age, was burned at the stake at London, July 22, 1575, together with Jan Pietersz. Hendrik, who was a goldsmith, was a refugee from Flanders, likely from Gent; he was charged with the crime of having held Anabaptist meetings in a private house in Aldersgate at London. He remained in Newgate prison for a long time with a number of other Mennonites, of whom one died in prison and all others finally were set free except Hendrik and Jan. These two martyrs wrote two letters to their friends, the last on July 21, the day before their death. These letters are found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, who gives detailed information about this martyrdom, including a letter written by Jacques de Somer, a Calvinist, to his mother in Gent, Belgium. A petition written by Hendrik Terwoort and Jan Pietersz and others and sent to Queen Elizabeth of England, in which they stated that they cannot believe otherwise than that "they feel in their conscience," was fruitless.

The Confessio of Thomas van Imbroek (Imbroich), martyred in 1558 at Cologne, printed at Gent 1579 (German edition about the same time or earlier), contains a song on these two martyrs, beginning "Aenhoort met neerstichden [i.e., neerstigheden], menschen verstaet wel mijn" (Hear attentively, ye people, understand me well). (Mart. Mir. D 694-712, E 1008-24.) vdZ.

Hendrik Verstralen, an Anabaptist martyr, executed in 1571 in Rypermonde (Rupelmonde) in Flanders, Belgium. There is not much information about this martyr; even the three letters found in Offer des Heeren and following martyrbooks do not give many particulars. He found it difficult to leave his wife Janneken and again and again asks her to kiss his children for him. He expected the congregation to take care of his family after his death. He was imprisoned in the castle in iron shackles; Maeyken Deynoots (q.v.) was in prison at the same time. In prison he wrote three letters—two to his wife, the first of which was undated, the second dated Palm Sunday (March 2), 1571; one letter, dated Jorisdach 1571, i.e., April 23, is written to the congregation. These letters, together with those of Maeyken Deynoots, entitled Twee schoone Brieven, were published in 1577 and in 1579, and perhaps as early as 1571 (see Bibliographie I, 465). The Amsterdam Mennonite Library has a copy of the 1577 edition. The letters were also included in a 1578 edition of the Offer des Heeren. Hendrik was the author of three songs, of which only the first is found in the Offer des Heeren. It begins, "O Heere Godt van grooter machte" (O God, Lord of great might). The two other songs begin: "Genade ende Vrede van Godts bermharticheyt" (Grace and peace of God's mercy) and "O Heere van Hemel en aarde mee" (O Lord of heaven and earth). They are found in Twee schoone Brieven, in the Hoorns Liedt-boeck (q.v.) of 1630, and reprinted in Wackernagel, Lieder. vdZ.

Offer, 628-45; Mart. Mir. D 542, E 877; Wackernagel, Lieder, 104 f., 205-7; Bibliographie I, 643 ff., 674 f.; Catalogus Amst., 100.

Hendrik (Hendrick, Henric) van Vre(e)den, a Mennonite elder, co-worker with Menno Simons, ordained by Menno and Dirk Philips in 1542. Of his work almost nothing is known. His field of activity seems to have been Westphalia, Germany. He was present at the conference of Mennonite elders in Emden in 1547 and likely at that of Goch in the same year. The superintendent of police who examined the martyr Jacques d' Auchy at Leeuwarden in 1558 reckoned Hendrik van Vreden among the most important Anabaptist leaders (Offer, 274).

In an old Dutch list of elders, Copia der Outsten (Vos, 256-57) is found, "1550 Hindrick van Vreede is afgevallen." This does not necessarily mean that he had recanted or left the church; it probably means that he was no longer in harmony with Menno. Nothing is, however, known of such discord. vdZ.

BRN VII, 50 f.; DB 1894, 18, 22; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) see Index.

Hendrik van Zutphen: see Hendrick Kistemaecker.

Hendriks: see also Hendriksz.

Hendriks (Hendricx, Henrixen, Hendrikse), Jacob (later called Jacob Hendrics Smit), until his death in 1724 a Mennonite preacher of the United Flemish and Waterlander Noorderkaai congregation at Blokzijl (q.v.), Dutch province of Overijssel, was charged by the Reformed classis of Vollenhove with Socinianism (q.v.) and suspended from his ministry by the States of Overijssel on Aug. 1, 1684. In 1686 he was allowed to preach again but in 1699, after publishing a catechetical book, Onderwijs na den weg ten hemel (1698), he was summoned before a Reformed Synod at Zwolle. Because Hendriks refused to sign a statement drawn up by this Synod he was imprisoned in January 1700. After half a year he was released; since he refused to pay the required fine, his furniture was publicly sold. He continued to preach and is likely the author of Praetje bij de weg, in which he gave a critical report about his troubles. These troubles also disturbed the congregation; because of his liberal ideas the more conservative part separated from the main body to found a new congregation about 1700. (Biogr. Wb. III, 674-76.) vdZ.

Hendriks (Hendricksz), Laurens, appointed deacon of the Amsterdam Mennonite congregation "bij 't Lam" in 1656, was a violent antagonist of Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), playing an important role in the Lammerenkrijgh (q.v.), the struggle between more progressive and more conservative views, Hendriks strictly holding to the conservative principles. When after a fruitless discussion between the two parties Galenus and his copreacher presented to their opponents a copy of their XIX Artikelen (January 1657), Hendriks unfairly published this document with his additional refutation, Antwoorde bij forme van aanmerkingen . . . (Amsterdam, 1659). Galenus then published Wederleggingen van Laurens Hendriksz (Amsterdam, 1659). In 1660 and again in 1663 Hendriks tried to have Galenus suspended from his office. In 1664 Hendriks published Vrede-presentatie aan Galenus Abrahamsz en zyne Medestemmers. When in 1664 this congregation of Amsterdam divided into a Lamist and a Zonist congregation, Hendriks joined the Zonist branch, serving as a deacon until his death in 1667. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 143, 174, 218, 1244; Biogr. Wb. III, 673 f.; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) see Index.

Hendriks, Laurens, a Mennonite preacher at Nijmegen, Dutch province of Gelderland, from 1690 until about 1714. A number of Swiss Mennonites who were being transported from Switzerland to England were liberated en route at Nijmegen on April 6, 1710, and were received by Hendriks and members of his congregation in their homes with much hospitality. In the Amsterdam Mennonite library is found a copy of a letter written by Hendriks, dated April 9, 1710, to Isaak Seckes (?), giving a circumstantial account of the liberation of the Mennonites at Nijmegen, most of whom returned to the Palatinate. His son Hendrik Laurens, ordained on March 18, 1714, by Elder Jan Kroes (Crous) of Crefeld, was the minister of the Nijmegen congregation 1714-59. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 866; DB 1869, 7-10; 1874, 31; 1875, 68-70, 78 f.; 1895, 71.

Hendriks, Pieter, was a preacher of the (Groningen) Old Flemish Mennonite congregation at Sappemeer, Dutch province of Groningen. Particulars about him were not available; even in the Naamlijst his name is not found. He died before 1754. He defended the doctrine of the Trinity against Johannes Stinstra and published De vier Uytersten des Menschen (Groningen, 1741); 't Geslagte Lam of de Lijdende en verzoenende Hogepriester (Groningen, 1741); Korte Schets van verscheiden waarheden des Christendoms (Groningen, 1743); Schriftuurlyke Katechismus, waarin de Grondlere der Doopsgezinden in 't Gemeen, dog der sogenoemde oude Vlamingen in 't bysonder met den Woorde Gods opengelegd is (Groningen, 1744, the 2nd ed. Groningen, 1747, also contained a sketch of the doctrines of Menno Simons); De redelyk bevindelyke Godsdienst der weerlooze Christenen (70 sermons) (Groningen, 1747). (Biogr. Wb. III, 677; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 133.) vdZ.

Hendriksz, Jan, a Dutch Mennonite elder, was present at a conference held at Harlingen on Dec. 19, 1566, to settle the Frisian-Flemish quarrels. Later on Hendriksz belonged to the Frisians, being a partisan of Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.) and the "Mild Frisians." In 1590 he was banned by the strict Old Frisians. He became elder at Schiedam, Dutch province of South Holland, having been the preacher of this congregation since 1579. (DB 1893, 39, 81; 1909, 156 f.) vdZ.

Hendriksz (Hendriks, Hendricksz, Hendricx), Joost, b. 1592, d. March 2, 1644, at Amsterdam, was a preacher of the Flemish Mennonite congregations of Harlingen 1626-31 and Amsterdam 1631-44. Joost Hendriksz was very active in making peace between several divided groups of the Dutch Mennonites. The serious attempts made to unite the High Germans and Frisians with the Flemish at Amsterdam and the invitation of 1626 of the Flemish preachers of Amsterdam to other Mennonites to unite with them (see Olijftacxken), were quite after his own heart. About these unions he published Vredehandelingh . . . Alsmede Noch Eenes Vreed-lievenden Ernstighe Aenmaninghe tot gemeynschap der Heyligen (Amsterdam, 1630), and an Aen-Spraeck op het Oliif-Tacxken (Haarlem, 1636). Against Denijs van der Schuere and Jacob Cornelisz he wrote Eenige Extracten . . . and Nader Bericht . . . (both Amsterdam, 1640). With P. Bontemps (q.v.), French Reformed pastor at Haarlem who had opposed and attacked the Mennonites, he became involved in a paper war, publishing Wederlegginge van de argumenten voorgestelt door P. B. (Amsterdam, 1643) and Spongie tot afwasschinge van de vuyle vlecken, die P. B. de Mennisten nu weder heeft aenghewreven . . . (Amsterdam, 1643). He also published XXXVIII corte stichtelijcke Predicatiën (Amsterdam, 1646) reprinted at Amsterdam 1647, 1650, 1652, 1666, and Franeker 1668. The title of the third edition was XXXIX corte Stichtelijke Predicatiën and of the fourth and following editions XXXX Korte en stichtelijke Predicatiën. The second and following editions also contain a treatise on how a member who was banned because of outside marriage should be received. Joost Hendriksz's devotional works have been eagerly read. They were used in the congregation of Balk, Friesland, until the 19th century and were even popular among the American Mennonites. On March 1, 1773, Andreas Ziegler, Isac Kolb, and Christian Funk, bishops at "Schippack, Indian Krik and Blen," in a letter to Crefeld and Utrecht asked to have Joost Hendriks' books sent. vdZ.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Uitvoeriger Geschiedenis II, 646-48; Biogr. Wb. III, 677-80; DB 1863, 133; 1892, 75; 1916, 147; R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Scottdale, 1949) 115, 142; MQR, October 1929, 231; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 558 V; ML II, 282.

Hendriksz, Pieter, a Mennonite, member of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation, who, influenced by the Quakers in his view on the church, attacked Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), the leader of the Lamist church, in a booklet Een Ernstige bestraffinge aen de Vlaemsche Doopsgesinde Gemeynte tot Amsterdam (Amsterdam, 1670), accusing him of laying too much stress upon form, especially in maintaining the old customs of baptism and communion. vdZ.

H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 112 f., 154.

Henegouwen (German, Hennegau): see Hainaut.

Hengelaer, Gerrit van, a deacon of the Mennonite congregation of Utrecht in the Netherlands, with conservative views and opposed to the Galenists (q.v.) and W. van Maurik (q.v.), author of Een Morgen-Wecker, an important pamphlet (128 pp., Utrecht, 1673) in which he tried to undo the quarrels and the separation which had struck the congregation. The booklet, an admonition to peace and unity, is followed by a short confession of five articles. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2315; DB 1916, 191; Biogr. Wb. III, 693; N.N.B. Wb. VII, 558.) vdZ.

Hengelo, an industrial, rapidly growing town (1953 pop. 52,474) in the Dutch province of Overijssel, noted for textiles and iron works, has 475 Mennonites, is the seat of a Mennonite congregation. In the 17th century Mennonites living in Hengelo and in Borne (q.v.) and Goor (q.v.) formed a congregation of the Groningen Old Flemish branch. In 1728 this congregation was divided into two congregations, one at Borne and one of Hengelo-Goor. During the 17th century the Hengelo Mennonites attended the meetings at Borne or Zenderen or Twekkelo, but since about 1709 meetings were also held at Hengelo in the private home of Berend ter Horst and his descendants. In 1792 Wolter ten Cate gave the congregation a meetinghouse at Hengelo. Though he lived at Hengelo, having been the promoter of its textile industry, he was a member and elder of the Borne congregation. The meetinghouse—so ten Cate ordered—should be plain and without luxury. It was remodeled in 1855, 1883, and 1953. An organ was put in in 1874.

In the 18th century the core of the Hengelo congregation was formed by the ter Horst, ten Cate, and Nijhoff families. During this century preachers were regularly chosen from the membership, the last being Engbert Nijhoff, 1757-1805. Its first trained minister was Govert Jans van Rijswijk, 1800-6. He was followed by Barend Rusburg 1807-23, Jan Visscher 1824-28, H. ten Cate Hzn 1829-64, A. Ballot 1864-71, I. H. Boeke 1872-78, H. Boetje 1879-1911, G. Heeringa 1912-40, P. J. Smidts 1941-47, and K. T. Gorter 1948- . The membership was 87 in 1733, 80 in 1767, 85 in 1840, 60 in 1861, 170 in 1898, 390 in 1925, 347 in 1954.

Church activities include a Sunday school for children, a ladies' circle, and a choir. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1924-25; II, 2, 99; DB 1879, 7; 1884, 152; Uit het Verleden der Doopsgezinden in Twenthe (Borne, n.d.) passim; ML II, 283.

Hennebo, a family of Mennonite refugees from Flanders, Belgium, to the Netherlands; its members were found especially in the Flemish congregations of Leiden, Haarlem, and Amsterdam, where many of them served as deacons. vdZ.

Hennegau (Henegouwen): see Hainaut.

Henric (Hendrick) Dirksz, an Anabaptist martyr, was apprehended in Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland, in 1552 together with Dirk Jans (q.v.) and Adriaen Cornelisz (q.v.) and executed on Nov. 24, 1552. When the sentence was pronounced he stepped forward and said, "Blessed are they that weep now; for they shall laugh, and be rewarded with shining robes; yea, with an eternal crown, if they strive steadfastly. This is the sabbath of the Lord, which I have long desired; not that I am worthy to suffer for His name, but He has made me worthy; and thus we suffer not for theft or murder, but for the pure Word of God." Their death is commemorated in the hymn, "Ick mach wel droeflich singen," found in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, No. 6. (Offer, 526, 578 ff.; Mart. Mir. D 133, E 526; ML I, 450.) Neff.

Henric(k) Rol, an Anabaptist leader and martyr, b. at Grave, Dutch province of North Brabant, who is found under different names: Henric (Hendrik) van Hilversum, Hendrik de Gooilander, Hendrik (van) Wassenberg, Henrich van den Grave, Henricus der Hollander, Henrich de Carmelyt, was burned at the stake at Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, in September 1534. He had been a Carmelite monk at Haarlem, but soon became interested in the Reformation. In 1530, while he was still the Catholic chaplain of Gijsbrecht van Baeck (q.v.) at IJsselstein, he is thought to have visited Augsburg, Germany, about the time that the Lutheran Confession was presented to the Emperor Charles V, and to have been in Strasbourg, becoming acquainted with Bucer, Capito, Bernt Rothmann, and Caspar Schwenckfeld; but any visits to Augsburg and Strasbourg are doubtful. In 1531 he lived in Wassenberg (q.v.), where he met Dionysius Vinne, Klopreis, and the other "Wassenberger Predicanten." In the summer of 1532 Rol came to Münster in Westphalia. He was not yet an Anabaptist, though he shared their views about baptism and communion. In 1533, as preacher of the St. Ilgen Church, he ardently opposed infant baptism. In October 1533 he signed the confession called Bekentnisse van beyden sacramenten Doepe unde Nachtmael with Rothmann and other Evangelical preachers. On Nov. 6, 1533, he was banished from Münster; he then visited Holland and Friesland, but on Jan. 1, 1534, he preached a sermon in Münster. He now joined the Anabaptists, being baptized on Jan. 5, 1534, by Bartel Boeckbinder or Willem Cuyper, who had been sent to Münster by Jan Matthysz. Rol baptized Gerhard Westerburg in January at the house of Knipperdolling. On Feb. 21, 1534, Rol left Münster to win recruits to join the "New Jerusalem" at Münster. Rol first went to Wesel (q.v.), where he baptized a number of persons; then he likely visited Holland. On Aug. 2, 1534, he arrived at Maastricht, where he found a group of Sacramentists (q.v.) who had left the Catholic Church, rejecting the Catholic views of the church and the sacraments, especially the Mass. Among this group, usually meeting in the house of the cobbler Jan van Genck, Rol taught the Anabaptist principles and baptized the believers. While holding a meeting he was arrested here on the evening of Sept. 2, 1534, and soon after executed.

The person of Rol has found a varied appreciation. Mellink considers Rol to have been a Münsterite leader, with the revolutionary views of Jan van Leyden; Sepp, Rembert, and Kühler thought him to be a peaceful Anabaptist. Kühler, who calls him the most noble representative of Anabaptism, suggests that Rol left Münster in February 1534 because he did not agree with the principles and policy of Jan Mattysz and Jan van Leyden.

Rol is the author of Die Slotel van dat Secreet des Nachtmaels (The Key of the Mystery of the Communion), written in 1531 or 1532 in East Frisian or Low German, a remarkable and profound treatise which totally rejects the Catholic and Lutheran views and describes the communion as a meal of rejoicing in which the redeemed of the Lord may partake. Rol also wrote Eyne ware Bedijnckijnge hoe dat hoochweirdich lichaam Christi, van unsen unweirdigen lichaam to underscheiden isz, doer Vrage ende Antwoorde (A True Consideration How the Blessed Body of Christ Is Different from Our Unworthy Body, In Questions and Answers). In both writings, but especially in the last named, Rol describes faith as the personal conviction of the believer; he does not want a church or an authority to lean upon, or to prove his faith. Baptism and communion are not necessary to obtain salvation and to enter upon the joys of heaven. Both writings were re-edited with introduction and commentaries by S. Cramer in Bibliotheca Reformatoria Neerlandica, Vol. V. An anonymous letter "Aen mijn liefste broeders und susters tot Süstern und omgelegen plaitzen, ouch tot Mastricht, und allen fromen christenen" is, according to Forsthoff and Rembert, to be ascribed to Rol, whereas Habets considers Slachtscaep (q.v.) as the author. vdZ.

BRN V, 1-123; J. Habets, De Wederdoopers te Maastricht (1877) 102 ff., 220 ff.; Chr. Sepp, Kerkhistorische Studien (Leiden, 1885) 1-90; Rembert, Wiedertäufer, see Index; H. Forsthoff, Rheinische Kirchengeschichte I (1929) 145, 147; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 74 f., 80 f., 88 f.; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik en vooral te Maastricht I (The Hague, 1937) 93-100 and passim; Mellink, Wederdopers, see Index.

Henric van Tongeren: see Hendrik Slachtscaep.

Henrick Henricxzn (Henric Verckendrijver, or Hendrik Kuiper), a Dutch Anabaptist, who was very active among the first Anabaptists of Holland. He was baptized at Amsterdam in 1531 by Jan Volkertsz (Trypmaker) (q.v.) and traveled widely in the country. He was a fervent follower of Melchior Hofmann, expecting that this leader by the power of God would be liberated from his prison at Strasbourg to "erect the banner" (to establish the kingdom of God) at Amsterdam. In May 1535 he was arrested in Amsterdam. Asked by his judges whether he did not repent his rebaptism, he answered that he repented all that was done against God, but that he could not consider his (re)baptism as against God. He denied that he had taken part in the revolt (May 10-11) at Amsterdam. It is not known how this suit ended and whether Henrick was sentenced. vdZ.

Grosheide, Verhooren, 93, 114-16; Mellink, Wederdopers, 104, 121.

Henrick Herckemaiker (Hendrik Herckmaker), a Dutch Anabaptist, originally from Giethoorn, Dutch province of Overijssel, was beheaded at Leeuwarden, Friesland, on Sept. 27, 1544. He had been baptized 10 years before by Henrick van Zutphen (see Hendrik Kistemaecker) as a follower of the revolutionary leader Jan van Batenburg (q.v.). After Batenburg's death (1538) he had adopted the views of David Joris (q.v.). (DB 1917, 86, 88, 119, 140 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, 253, 410.) vdZ.

Henrick de Raymakere, an Anabaptist who was in prison at Antwerp, Belgium, but about whose fate nothing is known. (Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 117, 120, 123; XIV, 30 f., No. 336.) vdZ.

Henrick Simons and Willem Seghers, about whom there is no further information, wrote the hymn "Wy clagent u Heer, ons doch verhoort" (We lament it to Thee, Lord, hear us), found in the Dutch hymnal Het Tweede Liedeboeck of 1583. (Wolkan, Lieder, 70.) vdZ.

Henrick van Wechel, an otherwise unknown Anabaptist martyr, a native of Betborch (?), was executed at Antwerp, Belgium, apparently in 1551. (DB 1864, 99.) vdZ.

Henrietta (Tex.) Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, was organized in 1910. The members came from the German Baptists. The ministerial leader of the congregation was Christian Kaefer. This church was dissolved in 1915.
H.H.Hie.

Henry County, Iowa, located in the southeastern part of the state, is bordered by Washington County (q.v.) on the north and Lee County (q.v.) on the south. Its county seat is Mt. Pleasant, the site of a state mental institution, where a Civilian Public Service unit served during World War II, and more recently a unit of I-W alternative service men.

Amish Mennonites first settled in Henry County in the late 1840's, in the northwestern part. By 1860 the following families had settled here: Conrad, Eicher, Roth, Bechler, Rich, Klopfenstein, Goldsmith, Gunden, Christner, Widmer, and Wenger. The first Amish minister in the county was Bishop Joseph Goldsmith (q.v.) who moved there from Lee Co., Ia., in 1855, and ministered not only to this settlement but also to the one ten miles north in Washington County. Goldsmith had organized a congregation in the Henry-Washington County area in 1852 or 1853. The growth of the two settlements made possible the organization of two congregations in the 1860's, one in Trenton Twp., Henry Co., and the other in Marion Twp., Washington Co. Under the leadership of Benjamin Eicher (q.v.) the Marion Township group withdrew from the Amish conference and eventually joined the General Conference Mennonites. Some members of the Washington County settlement, however, maintained their connections with the Henry County group and when the center of Amish population moved north, the Henry County congregation in 1871 built its first church, Sugar Creek (q.v.), 1½ miles southeast of the village that is now called Wayland (q.v.), and thus north of the original Trenton Township settlement. Prior to 1900 the Eicher (GCM) group began to conduct services in Wayland as well as in their Marion Township church. In 1900 the Wayland group dedicated its first church building and organized a separate congregation. The two Henry County churches now have a combined membership of 747, Sugar Creek (MC) with 462 and Wayland (GCM) with 285, although some members of both groups live in neighboring Washington County. (See Johnson-Washington County map.) M.G.

M. Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939).

Henry Hannon, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Feb. 28, 1573, together with Lynken Baillaerts. He was charged with attending forbidden meetings (of the Mennonites), and possessing and reading forbidden books. He was not yet baptized, but confessed that he desired (re)baptism. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 108, 110, 175; XIV, 90 f., No. 1016.) vdZ.

Henry the Pious (1473-1541), who succeeded his brother George (q.v.) as Duke of Saxony in April 1539, had been interested in Protestantism as early as 1529, and laid the foundation for the introduction of the Reformation in the duchy of Saxony. On July 10, 1539, he had his instructions for inspectors prepared, on the basis of Melanchthon's inspection booklet. It specified that "Anabaptists and the adherents of other sects abandon their false doctrine or leave the land." HEGE.

J. Issleib, "Herzog Heinrich als evangelischer Fürst," in Beiträge zur sächsischen Kirchengeschichte, No. 19, 1905, 168 ff.; ML II, 279.

Henslein of Stotzingen, an Anabaptist martyr, who was beheaded at Zabern in Alsace, France, in 1528. The Martyrs' Mirror gives an admonitory address that he made on the way to the site of execution. He is the author of the song, "Nun heben wir an in Nöten" (No. 42 in the Ausbund). (Mart. Mir. D 17, E 427; Wolkan, Lieder, 146.) NEFF.

Hentrock, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr of Ammern in Thuringia, joined the Anabaptists in 1534, but was induced by friends and relatives to leave them, was baptized July 30, 1537, was seized in October of that year; under torture he begged for mercy and declared himself willing to recant. He was, however, not released, and soon regained his conviction; he died a martyr's death with a joyful confession of his faith before the assembled crowd by drowning in the Unstrut between Mühlhausen and Ammern, Jan. 17, 1538. NEFF.

P. Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen von 1526-1584 (Jena, 1913) 158, 162-65; ML II, 284.

Hepburn, Sask., a village in the heart of a large Mennonite community, 26 miles north and 2 miles west of the city of Saskatoon. The railroad branch line running through the Mennonite towns of Dalmeny, Menno, Hepburn, Waldheim, and Laird was built in 1908 and it was during this year that Hepburn had its beginning. The population (1955) is about 300. Since most of the early settlers were of Mennonite Brethren background, the town has only one church, with a membership of about 275.

Hepburn has for many years been the head office of the North Saskatchewan M.B. Conference and the M.B. missions of Saskatchewan, formerly known as the Western Children's Mission. It is also the home of the Bethany Bible Institute. The Mennonite Mutual Hail Insurance Company with an extensive business beyond Mennonite circles has its office here. J.H.E.

Hepburn Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Hepburn, Sask., a member of the Canadian Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America, was organized by P. J. Friesen on July 15, 1910, with a membership of about 114. Most of the members came from Nebraska. P. J. Friesen became the first pastor. Other leaders and ministers were D. Schmor, H. H. Fast, J. P. Dyck, J. B. Toews, F. J. Baerg, and J. H. Epp. In 1954 the membership was 263. The frame structure which was built at the time of the organization has been rebuilt and remodeled and still serves. Services are conducted in both English and German. The congregation has a young people's fellowship, Christian Endeavor, Ladies' Aid, and Ladies' Auxiliary as well as a choir. P.R.T.

Heppe, Heinrich Ludwig Julius (1820-79), a German theologian and church historian, professor of theology at the University of Marburg. In his Kirchengeschichte beider Hessen (Marburg, 1876, vol. I, pp. 261-64, 469-71 and vol. II, p. 187) he touches on the Anabaptists. He presents in the main a brief résumé of the thorough research by Hochhuth (q.v.), to which he refers. In one instance he makes a valuable addition (vol. I, p. 471) in offering the letter of Oct. 5, 1569, by Landgrave Wilhelm, which definitely opposes forcible baptism of the children of Anabaptists. "Now we know," says the letter, "that the church has been commanded to compel them to come in, but such compelling is to be accomplished not by force of arms, but by the force of the Word. For it is never the duty of the church to pursue political force; the true church must suffer persecution." Also worthy of note is Heppe's statement (p. 471), "The difficulty which the church encountered in the Anabaptist movement gave the church authorities their first instigation to introduce church records. The first pertinent regulation was set up in the Kirchenordnung of 1566 (part III, c. 15 and 16). Here the setting up of baptismal registers, which were also to serve to record confirmations, was commanded. The Kirchenordnung of 1573 also prescribed the use of marriage registers. The keeping of death registers was not required until the Kirchenordnung of 1657 was passed." (ML II, 284.) NEFF.

Heppenheim im Loch, a village near Alzey, Rhenish Hesse, Germany, in which Swiss emigrants settled as early as 1664. The Mennonite lists of the Karlsruhe Generallandesarchiv name the Martin Weber family here in 1664, Matthias Dahlem in 1685, and four Weber families and Heinrich Landes in 1738. In 1742 the Johann Rupp family was added, and in 1768 Jakob Hahn. In 1929 two Biehn families were living here, members of the Monsheim (q.v.) congregation, whereas those living here earlier were members of the Oberflörsheim congregation. (ML II, 284 f.) NEFF.

Heppenheim auf der Wiese, a large village near Worms in Rheinhessen, Germany, known for its wealth of fruit and grain. From Worms (q.v.) the Anabaptist movement early came to Heppenheim. Dr. Johann Marbach, the reformer appointed by the Palatine Elector Otto Heinrich, on his church inspection tour in the Palatinate disputed with an Anabaptist of Heppenheim who had migrated to Moravia and had returned with commissions from the Moravian Anabaptists (Hege, 88). Thus it is known that by the middle of the 16th century contacts had been established between the Moravian and Palatine Anabaptists. A Hans Greiker of Heppenheim participated in the Frankenthal disputation (q.v.) in 1571. In July 1588 the Reformed church council complained to the government authorities in Heidelberg, that 17 Anabaptists in Heppenheim were a burden to the pastor; for 40 years, in spite of all the mandates, they had remained in the community. In reports of Oct. 25 and Nov. 9, 1601, Titus Wittich of Dirmstein, the inspector, complained bitterly about the obstinacy of the Heppenheim Anabaptists. Particularly their spokesmen, Michael Reb, Hans Dix, and Philipp Schneider, caused him much trouble.

In 1608 there were still some Anabaptists in the vicinity (Hege, 175). It is possible that remnants maintained themselves through the Thirty Years' War.

After the war new settlements were made by Swiss emigrants. According to the first Mennonite list of the Karlsruhe Generallandesarchiv in 1664, ten Swiss Mennonite families had settled here; among them are found the names Hirstein, Blum, and Schuhmacher. During the later war with France, which caused much suffering to the population here, nearly all of them emigrated, most of them to America. Apparently only one family remained; others came later. In 1737 Joh. Krämer, and in October 1738, Jakob Joder were accepted as renters of the ducal estate of Schönborn; also the families of Wilhelm Gerber, Joh. and Gerhard Becker, Fritz Braun, and Ulrich Stauffer are named in 1738. In 1749 were added Isaak Hiestand, Jakob Gram, Müller, and Christian Roth. The families of Gerhard Hüthwohl and Joh. Lehmann followed. In a petition of Feb. 14, 1769, the Mennonites of Heppenheim a.d.W., Obersülzen, and Flomersheim complained that in addition to their high "protection fee" they were also compelled to pay 3 fl. per household for the use of water and pasture; the request for exemption was granted. On Dec. 23, 1748, upon their request, they were given permission to purchase "a little place between the houses" in which to bury their dead, "without, however, calling it a churchyard or using the least ceremony, much less erecting grave stones."

For a long time Heppenheim was the center of the combined congregation of Heppenheim-Obersülzen-Gerolsheim (q.v.), as well as for the Mennonites living in Dirmstein and Offstein (q.v.). In the first three places services were held in rotation; in Obersülzen and Gerolsheim in suitable halls, in Heppenheim in a church building erected in 1783, services having previously been held in the home of the preacher Gerhard Hüthwohl. In the Ibersheim Resolutions of 1803 the combined congregation is listed as Heppenheim; Gerhard Hüthwohl signed the protocol as their preacher. Their elder was for a time Jakob Kaegy of the Bolanderhof (d. Nov. 9, 1852). In 1853 Daniel Hirschler was chosen preacher and Christian Krehbiel elder (Menn. Bl., 1855, 39). In 1929 there were only a few Mennonites living in Heppenheim a.d.W.; these belonged to the Obersülzen congregation. Four times a year the preacher of Monsheim held services in the church building at Heppenheim. NEFF.

Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908; Müller, Berner Täufer; ML II, 285.

Herald Book and Printing Co.: see Herald Publishing Co.

Herald Bookstore, 220 Main St., Souderton, Pa., a branch bookstore of the Mennonite Publishing House at Scottdale, Pa., was established in 1935; managers have been Silas Graybill 1935-50 and Claude Shisler 1950- . H.S.B.

Herald of Truth (1864-1908), the first religious periodical published in the Mennonite (MC) Church, first issue January 1864, 4 pp., 10½ x 15½ in., published by J. F. Funk in Chicago, Ill., until 1867, thereafter at Elkhart, Ind., until its sale and transfer to Scottdale, Pa., in 1908. At first a monthly, the journal finally became a weekly. In April 1864 it was enlarged to eight pages. With reduced size (9 x 11½ in.) it was increased to 16 pages in January 1867. In May 1867 the place of publication was changed to Elkhart, where Funk had set up a printing establishment of his own. The printing had been done before this time by Chas. Hess of 93 Randolph St., Chicago. In February 1869 Abram K. Funk entered into partnership with his brother and the publishing firm became John F. Funk & Bro. In 1875 a stock company was organized to take over the assets and work of the firm, the Mennonite Publishing Company. In 1878 the journal was enlarged to 20 pages, still a monthly. In January 1882 it became a semimonthly with 16 pages. In 1896 the page size was again enlarged to 10¾ x 14½, while in 1903 it became for the first time a weekly with eight pages. For one year, March 29, 1906, to March 21, 1907, it appeared as a 10-page weekly, returning to eight pages for the rest of its career. The last issue appeared on April 9, 1908, after which it was combined with the Gospel Witness to appear as the Gospel Herald, published by the Mennonite Publication Board at Scottdale, Pa. Editorial changes to be noted were as follows. J. F. Funk was sole editor to 1882, when the name of J. S. Coffman appears as assistant editor. In 1889 the name of A. B. Kolb was added as second assistant editor. The name of Coffman was dropped at the end of 1895, and that of Funk in January 1897, so that from Feb. 1, 1897, A. B. Kolb was sole editor. He was displaced from Feb. 15, 1904, to Aug. 17, 1905, by D. H. Bender. From this time on until the end J. F. Funk and A. B. Kolb were joint editors. Thus except for a brief period of less than nine years, Funk edited the journal. A German edition, Herald der Wahrheit (q.v.), was published by Funk 1864-1901.

The Herald of Truth had a very great influence upon the Mennonite Church and its development throughout the entire 44 years of its existence. Through it Funk promoted Sunday schools, evangelism, missions, Mennonite history, unity, and other good causes. The paper remained Funk's personal organ, but it became a common household paper throughout the Mennonite Church (MC) both east and west, both Mennonite and Amish, losing influence only in the last years of its existence when Funk got into trouble in his home district and lost general confidence. H.S.B.

Herald Publishing Company, Newton, Kan., a nonprofit organization, was incorporated April 7, 1920, under a Kansas charter for the purpose of supplying "such specialized literature as will meet the needs of the Mennonites (GCM) of the Central West." The first board of directors, elected at an organization meeting held April 19, 1920, were: H. P. Krehbiel, C. J. Goering, W. B. Unrau, G. Regier, C. C. Wedel, J. P. Andres, H. J. Dyck, P. H. Richert, and G. A. Haury. Officers chosen at a subsequent meeting on the same date were H. P. Krehbiel, chairman, C. C. Wedel, vice-chairman,

W. B. Unrau, secretary, and C. J. Goering, treasurer. Books, office, and printing equipment (and with it the German publication Der Herold) were bought for $8,473.88 from the Herald Book & Publishing Co., a private Stock company, which was then dissolved. Capital funds were obtained through sale of $25.00 "memberships" to over 300 interested persons, all of them General Conference Mennonites and residing mostly in central Kansas. Herold editors and general managers were: H. P. Krehbiel, April 1920 to December 1921; C. Frey, January 1922 to June 1922; J. B. Epp, July 1922 to September 1923; H. P. Krehbiel, October 1923 to September 1935, G. H. Willms becoming assistant Herold editor in 1923 and also serving as assistant manager 1926-35. In 1923 the English publication, Mennonite Weekly Review, was established and A. J. Krehbiel engaged as first editor. Upon his resignation in 1925, H. P. Krehbiel assumed also the Review editorship, continuing until 1935. Assistant Review editors were Abe Epp, 1925-26; Menno Schrag, 1927-28, 1931-35; and F. J. Wiens, 1929-30. In September 1935 G. H. Willms was appointed general manager and Herold editor and Menno Schrag assistant manager and Review editor. In June 1938 the company moved from its earlier locations at 107 East 7th Street and 722 Main Street, Newton, to its newly purchased building at 129-133 West 6th Street, Newton. Under difficulties brought about by World War II, Der Herold was discontinued December 1941. On April 20, 1946, book stock and a portion of printing equipment was sold to a newly organized private concern, the Herald Book & Printing Co. Menno Schrag, the Review editor, then assumed the Herald Publishing Company management, with J. Richard Blosser assistant manager and associate editor of the Review. Company activity now centers mainly on publishing of the Mennonite Weekly Review, circulated nationally among most branches of the Mennonite Church. M.S.

Herbert is a town (pop. 1,200) on the Canadian Pacific R.R., 125 miles west of Regina, the capital of Saskatchewan. The first Mennonites came to this place from Manitoba in 1904. They were mainly Mennonites of the Canadian Conference (which started in 1903) and from the Mennonite Brethren Conference. Some Mennonites joined the New Jerusalem (Swedenborg) Church. In 1954 this church was bought by Lutherans. In the depression of the 1930's many Mennonites moved away. In recent years the land has been irrigated. There is a Canadian Conference church, a Mennonite Brethren church, a United church, a Lutheran church, and a Catholic church in the town. There are also Sommerfelder Mennonites, but they have no church. The Mennonite Youth Society has an Old People's Home here. J.G.R.

Herbert Bible School, an institution of the Mennonite Brethren Church, is located in the town of Herbert (q.v.), Sask., about 125 miles west of Regina. The school was founded in 1913 by J. F. Harms. During the first year there were 18 students in the school. The highest enrollment was 72 students. In the school year of 1954-55 there were 16 students with two full-time and two part-time instructors. The principal is C. Braun. J.G.R.

Herbert Mennonite Brethren Church, located in the town of Herbert in southern Saskatchewan, was organized in 1908 with a membership of 68 under the leadership of Jacob J. Martens. The membership in 1953 was 180. The church building, still in use, was built the year the church was organized. The following ministers have served as leaders and pastors during the course of the years: H. A. Neufeld, J. P. Wiebe, Henry Regehr, Isaac Epp, Daniel Wiebe, Alfred Kroeker, and John M. Neufeld. J.H.E.

Herbert (Sask.) Mennonite Church (GCM) was organized by Mennonite settlers arriving in 1904; in 1908 they built the first Mennonite church. Two ministers came to this place from Manitoba in 1905: Frank Sawatzky (d. 1931), who later was elected as elder, and Jacob M. Wiens (d. 1933). At present (1954) there are two ministers: Isaac H. Wiens, son of the above Jacob M. Wiens, and Cornelius J. Wiebe, who is the leader. Jacob H. Klippenstein, also a member of the Herbert Mennonite Church, lives near Rush Lake. The present baptized membership is 127. Originally there were twice this number. J.G.R.

Herbéviller, located in France between the Alsatian border and the Moselle, the seat of a Mennonite congregation which died out in the 19th century. (See France; also Almanach Mennonite du Cinquantenaire, p. 35.)

Herding(h), a former Mennonite family, apparently immigrants from Flanders, living particularly at Leiden, Holland, where they supplied 10 deacons to the congregation (first to the Flemish, then to the United congregation). Some of them served for four or even five periods. They were mostly well-to-do cloth merchants. One member of this family, Vincent Herdingh, was a preacher of the Flemish congregation from 1686, and from 1700 of the United congregation at Leiden; he served until his death on Aug. 24, 1731. vdZ.

L. G. le Poole, Bijdr. tot . . . het kerkelijk leven onder de Doopsgezinden . . . te Leiden (Leiden, 1905) 11 and passim.

Hereford Mennonite Church (MC), located in the village of Bally, Washington Twp., Berks Co., Pa., a member of the Franconia Conference. The first meetinghouse is supposed to have been built here in 1732, replaced by a larger log structure in 1755, enlarged in 1790, and used continuously until 1899 when it was razed, and succeeded by a stone structure plastered both inside and out. As in many other congregations of the Franconia Conference, English was first introduced about 1900. The Hereford congregation was never large, seldom being much over 100 even including those who worshiped in the Boyertown (q.v.) meetinghouse. (The Bally and Boyertown worshipers constituted but one organized congregation historically, and were served by one set of Sunday-school officers.)

Members worshiping at Hereford in 1956 numbered 95, while 33 worshiped at Boyertown. Elias W. Kulp was the pastor in 1956, assisted by Paul Longacre; the deacon was Abram M. Ehst.

In the division of 1847 one of the Hereford ministers withdrew from the Franconia Conference and took a portion of the members with him into Oberholtzer's new conference. In 1851 this Hereford GCM congregation (q.v.) ceased to use the old meetinghouse on alternate Sundays as they had done since 1847, having built a new meetinghouse. It became much larger than the old group, reaching 202 members by 1895. J.C.W.

A. Gehman and M. Bower, History of the Hereford Congregation at Bally, Pennsylvania (n.p., 1936).

Hereford Mennonite Church (GCM), located at Bally, Berks Co., Pa., named for the township in which it is located, dates back before 1725. Originally the area was within the Manatawny, then Colebrookdale, then Hereford, now the borough of Bally in Washington Township. The first ministers of the "Manatant" congregation were Jacob Bechtel and David Longenecker. The first resident ministers (1728) were George Bechtel and Peter Noll. Since the division of 1847 there are two congregations, the smaller group adhering to the Franconia Conference (MC), the other incorporated since 1893 as Hereford Mennonite Church, a member of the Eastern District Conference. In 1955 the membership was 282, and the pastor was Henry G. Grimm. E.E.S.J.

Heresbachius, Conradus (Conrat Hertzbach) (1496-1576), a humanist and counselor in the service of the Duke of Cleve (q.v.), Germany. He was a friend of Erasmus (q.v.), to whom he owed all his public positions, the last being that of tutor at the court of Cleve. In this position he was able to accompany the expedition against the Münsterite Anabaptists (as a spectator). He wrote his account of it in two confidential letters to Erasmus (November 1534 and July 28, 1535. The book Conradi Heresbachii I. C. Historia Anabaptistica de factione Monasteriensi anno 1534 et seqq . . . epistola formae anno 1536 descripta nunc demum . . . edita . . . Amsterdami 1637 is the work of a compiler, and contains much historical source material based on these letters, which is not found elsewhere. A copy is in the Goshen College Library. NEFF.

K. W. Bouterwek, Conrad Heresbachii historia factionis exidiique Monasteriensis (Elberfeld, 1866); C. A. Cornelius, Berichte der Augenzeugen über das Münsterische Wiedertäuferreich (1853) p. LXXXVII; ML II, 286.

Herk (Aert, Orck) Dirksz (Herck van Texel), a Dutch Anabaptist, of Burg on the island of Texel, province of North Holland, who preached and baptized at Brielle, Dutch province of South Holland, in the house of the martyr Anneken Jans and who was executed at The Hague on Sept. 15, 1535. He belonged to the revolutionary branch of Anabaptism. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 243; DB 1917, 115, No. 48; Mellink, Wederdopers, 169.

Herman, an Anabaptist martyr: see Herman Buens.

Herman van den Berge, a farmer living at Roosteren, now Dutch province of Limburg, was executed (likely at the stake) at Montfort about 1540, because Smeken van Tricht (apparently Jan Smeitgen, q.v., of Maastricht) had preached on his farm. Though particulars are lacking, Herman was probably a member of the congregation. vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik en vooral te Maastricht I (The Hague, 1937) 399.

Herman Buens (Bienes), in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror called simply Herman, was an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Rijssel (Lille), France, on April 27, 1563. According to Bibliographie he was a native of Borchloon and a son of Hendrik Aerts (q.v.). By the zeal of the ardent inquisitor Titelman, after a Catholic priest, N. van Casteele, had denounced them, 12 Anabaptists at Halewijn (q.v.) in Flanders had been arrested and put in prison at Rijssel. Then some brethren and sisters had come to Rijssel and "called to the prisoners over the fortification, for their consolation." One of those visitors was Herman, whose father likely was among the prisoners. Having been seen by a policeman, Herman was arrested, and "holding immovably to the mercy of God" suffered martyrdom. (Mart. Mir. D 300, E 665; Bibliographie II, No. 299; ML II, 287.) vdZ.

Herman Dirksz, of Achtersloot near IJsselstein, Dutch province of Utrecht, a Dutch Anabaptist, was beheaded at Utrecht on June 27, 1545. He was an adherent of the Münsterite leader Jan van Batenburg (q.v.) and one of the last of his followers to be executed. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 329: Mellink, Wederdopers, 240, 411.) vdZ.

Herman and Gerrit (Gerryt) Jansz, brothers, Anabaptist martyrs, were sentenced to death at Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, on Oct. 24, 1536, because they had lodged Menno Simons. They lived in or near Witmarsum where Menno Simons had been a priest, leaving the Catholic Church on Jan. 31, 1536. In October of this year Menno paid a secret visit to his friends, which brought death to these two brethren. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 747; DB 1864, 135; 1906, 3; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 230.

Herman Hermansz (Hermanssone), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on June 27, 1570, because he had been rebaptized. Nelleken Jaspers (q.v.) suffered martyrdom with him. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 1, 61; XIV, 76 f., No. 852.) vdZ.

Herman Jansz (Harmen Huyckemaker, i.e., maker of long hooded cloaks), originally of Sollem (Zelhem in the Dutch province of Gelderland), and plying his trade at the corner of the Popelsteech at Amsterdam, was burned at the stake at Amsterdam on Jan. 16, 1553, together with four other Mennonites. In the sentence he is called an Anabaptist and a disciple of Gillis van Aken (q.v.). Van Braght in the Martyrs' Mirror relates that he was a candidate for baptism upon his faith. All attempts made to move him to apostasy failed and this simple martyr of his Lord died faithfully. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 370; Mart. Mir. D 147, E 538.) vdZ.

Herman van Kelder, a Dutch Anabaptist and follower of David Joris (q.v.), was beheaded at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, on Jan. 7, 1539. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 216 f.) vdZ.

Herman Sassen, a Dutch Anabaptist, active in Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel, in the spring of 1534. He may be identical with Herman Schroer (q.v.) of Deventer. (DB 1917, 117, No. 69.) vdZ.

Herman Schroer (Scroer), an Anabaptist martyr of Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel, a tailor, was beheaded there on Feb. 6, 1535. Herman was a member of a rather large Anabaptist congregation at Deventer, which was much influenced by Münsterite principles. (DB 1919, 7 f.) vdZ.

Herman van Tielt, a Mennonite elder, originally from Flanders, who lived in Wismar, Germany, about 1553. In January and February 1533 he was an intermediary between Johannes a Lasco (q.v.) and Menno Simons, who also lived in Wismar at this time. Herman was also among the seven elders meeting at Wismar in 1554 who drew up nine articles for the believers as a rule of life (see Wismar Resolution). In 1555, when the Mennonites were expelled from Wismar, Herman van Tielt must also have left the town. About May 1556 he was present in the home of Menno Simons at Wüstenfelde, where Zylis and Lemke, as representatives of the High Germans, had a discussion with Menno about avoidance in marriage. Nothing more is known about Herman van Tielt. vdZ.

DB 1894, 37; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 114, 117, 119, 127, 135, 147.

Herman (Harman) (de) Timmerman (Herman van der Greyn), an Anabaptist martyr, after threefold torture burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on May 25, 1569, together with three other martyrs. Herman, who was a native of Borchher in the bishopric of Liége, was arrested at Antwerp, where he lived as a carpenter, shortly after March 3, 1569. He was 35 years of age and had been baptized at Berchem near Antwerp by Lenaert "a countryman" (Leenaert Bouwens?), in 1556, when he was 23 years old. During his trials he denied the validity of infant baptism, since only believer's baptism is Scriptural; he had been chosen as deacon (dienaer der aermen) by the congregation, and for want of preachers he also delivered sermons (vermaningen), but he never baptized or laid hands upon a person. During his tortures he prayed, "O Lord, keep my mouth closed," and did not betray any of the brethren. So he died as a hero, loyal and faithful.

Some doubt has arisen whether this Herman Timmerman the martyr might be the same person as the Elder Herman de Timmerman. They are probably identical, though it is somewhat strange that an elder never baptized or administered communion, ordained new preachers or elders, as Herman said in his confession. S. Cramer (BRN II, 623) calls him elder of the Waterlanders at Antwerp; according to K. Vos (p. 191) he was not an elder but merely a preacher. Of his activity as elder or preacher not much is known. In 1568 he performed the marriage of Pieter Verlongen (q.v.) at Antwerp. He may have been ordained in 1566. During the schism in this year between Frisian and Flemish Mennonites in Friesland (see Flemish Mennonites) Herman took a moderate view as he had done before (in 1560) when Menno Simons and Dirk Philips decided for a strict practice of banning and shunning, enunciated in Menno's Een gans grontlycke onderwijs oft bericht van der excommunicatie (1558) and Dirk Philips' Een lieflijke Vermaninghe (1558). Then Herman countered with Een verklaringhe: hoe en in wat manieren de Heere Jesus zijnen Jongeren in der af-zonderinge macht gegeven haeft, om die onbekeerige Overtreders zijne goddelycken woorts . . . hare sonden hier op der aerden te binden . . . (published Jan. 28, 1560, n.p., and reprinted 1618 at Haarlem).

Besides this book Herman also wrote Een corte Bekentenisse ende grondighe aenwijsinghe wt der H. Schrift dat Godt (Vader) Soon ende Heylighe Gheest een onverscheyden Godt is . . . (1577, n.p., likely edited by Nicolaas Biestkens at Amsterdam), reprinted 1578 and inserted in van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror. Herman Timmerman is also thought to be the author of a song celebrating 41 martyrs who died in Gent 1562-69. This hymn was included in his Een corte Bekentenisse and is also found in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (1578 and following editions). Cramer, the editor of the Offer des Heeren and Liedtboecxken, supposes that Herman de Timmerman is not the author of this hymn. vdZ.

Offer, 623, 649 note; Mart. Mir. D 415-19, E 766-70; Bibliographie I, 161-69, 656, 709-13; Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 364, 371 ff., 382, 400, 405, 436; XIII, 23; XIV, 64 f., No. 724; Biogr. Wb. III, 742 f.; K. Vos, De Doopsgezinden te Antwerpen (1920) 332 f., 351-54; idem, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) see Index; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 327, 350; DB 1864, 126; 1881, 39; 1882, 53; 1894, 58; BRN X, 23, 34 f., 654.

Herman van Vlekwijk (Vleckwick), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Brugge, Belgium, on June 8, 1569. He was born at Kervendonck in the Duchy of Cleve, Germany, and was a tailor by trade. In Brugge he attended the Mennonite meetings in 1561, but upon being arrested he recanted. However, he soon repented of his apostasy. Then he left Brugge and traveled around. In 1562 he was baptized at Gent by Hans Busschaert. During the following years he was on the road, sometimes in Brugge or other towns in Flanders, but mostly staying in the territory of Cleve, where he participated in the Mennonite meetings. In 1565-68 he lived in Brugge. But in 1568 he had to flee because of persecution and again he turned to Germany; the next year he planned to make a short trip to Brugge to settle his affairs, having resolved to stay in Cleve for the future, leaving his wife and five children at Cologne. On his way to Flanders he met Jacob de Rore (q.v.) in Nijmegen; together they journeyed to Brugge, but arriving here they were immediately arrested and put in prison. Herman was tortured several times but remained steadfast and refused to betray his fellow members. On May 10, 1569, he had a long dispute with the Franciscan friar Cornelis Adriaensz (see Broer Cornelis), who tried to bring him back to the Catholic Church, which has been printed in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. Herman and Jacob de Rore died together at the stake.

In the disputation between Herman and Broer Cornelis, the friar accused Herman of anti-Trinitarianism. Hans Alenson (q.v.) related that Herman was a follower of Adam Pastor (q.v.) and a unitarian (BRN VII, 196). The matter is not quite clear.

Very likely Herman van Vlekwijk, like most Mennonites and nearly all the martyrs, objected to the word "Trinity," since this is not found in the Scriptures. He preferred Scriptural terms and avoided theological or philosophical terminology. At any rate he was not a Unitarian, for he positively confessed the deity of Christ. vdZ.

Bibliographie des Martyrologes Prot. Neerl. I, 703 cites a booklet, A Dialogue between a Dutch Protestant and a Franciscan Friar of Dort (London 1784, repr. Birmingham 1812), which is the disputation of Herman with Broer Cornelis; Mart. Mir. D 424, 437-52, E 774, 785-98; Verheyden, Brugge, 57 f., No. 62; G. Brandt, Historie der Reformatie I (2nd ed., Amsterdam, 1677, 501-7); Bibliographie I, 733; Kühler, Het Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1912) 32 f.; idem, Geschiedenis I, 289; DB 1899, 144-52; BRN VII, 147, 194-96.

Herminjard, Aimé Louis (1817-1900), Professor of Church History at the University of Lausanne, Switzerland. With his brother Henri he published Correspondance des reformateurs dans les pays de langue française (nine volumes, 1866-97), extending to 1544. Two final volumes are to cover the material to the death of Farel (1565). This historical work includes some source material on the Anabaptists. (ML II, 288.) Neff.

Herold Mennonite Church (GCM), located three miles east and five miles north of Cordell, Okla., a member of the Western District Conference, was organized in 1899 in the home of Jacob Jantzen with the help of three elders, Christian Krehbiel, Peter Balzer, and Jacob Toews. At this time the church building (built about 1897) on the Jantzen farm was purchased from the Sichar congregation, and the Sichar congregation moved to another site. It was replaced in 1915 by the present church building.

Michael Klaassen, ordained elder in 1901, served until 1918, when he moved to Canada with 28 members on account of military service. He was followed by Jacob Jantzen, who served 40 years as minister, including 18 years as elder. Since this resignation the church has had four ministers: J. R. Duerksen (1940), C. B. Friesen (1943), Paul Dahlenburg (1946), and Richard Tschetter (1951). The church membership in 1955 was 231. (ML II, 288.) R.T.

Herold, Der (1909-41), the name given Post und Volksblatt (est. 1903) (first called Das Kansas Volksblatt, q.v., 1900-2) in 1910 when the publishing company changed its name from Western Book and Publishing Co. (q.v.) to Herald Book and Publishing Co. (from 1920 on Herald Publishing Co., q.v.), but always published at Newton, Kan. At first a 5-column 8-page weekly, in 1904 it became a 6-column 8-page 18 x 22 in. paper. This publication, always published by General Conference Mennonites and largely for members of that group in the Newton area, was a pioneer in Mennonite journalism with its program of combining religious and secular interests into a weekly Mennonite family newspaper. H. P. Krehbiel was closely associated with the Herold from the beginning until a few years before his death. C. E. Krehbiel served as editor until July 1920, H. P. Krehbiel October 1920-January 1922, C. Frey January-June 1922, J. B. Epp July 1922-September 1923, H. P. Krehbiel October 1923-September 1935, G. H. Willms September 1935-December 1941. H.S.B.

Herold der Wahrheit (1864-1901), the German edition of Herald of Truth (q.v.), was published by John F. Funk at Elkhart, Ind. (first in Chicago, Ill., 1864-67) as an 8-page 10½ x 15½ in. monthly (first 3 issues January-March only 4 pages) 1864-66, then 16 pp. at 9 x 11½ in. until 1878, then 20 pp., then from January 1882 a semimonthly with 16 pp., in 1896 again a 16 pp. monthly, but on April 15, 1899, an 8 pp. semimonthly until its last issue Nov. 1, 1901, when it was merged with the Mennonitische Rundschau. Editors were as follows: J. F. Funk, 1864-98; G. G. Wiens, 1898-1901; A. B. Kolb, assistant editor 1888-1901; John Horsch, second assistant editor 1891-95. Much of the material published consisted of translations from the Herald of Truth, but there were also original German articles, especially when Horsch was serving on the staff. H.S.B.

Herold der Wahrheit (1912-), a 32-page 6¼ x 9½ in. semimonthly periodical "published in the interest of the Amish Mennonite Churches known as the Old Order Amish and the Conservative Amish Mennonites," by the Publication Board of the Amish Mennonite Publishing Association, printed at Scottdale, Pa., by the Mennonite Publishing House from Jan. 1, 1912, the first issue, until June 15, 1956, and at Kalona, Iowa, since July 1, 1956. The periodical has always carried an approximately equal division of German and English material. The English editors until 1955 were Jonas B. Miller 1912-48 and his son Evan J. Miller 1949-55. With the issue of Feb. 1, 1955, the Conservative Church dropped out and henceforth the periodical was solely Old Order Amish, with Ervin N. Hershberger as English editor. German editors have been S. D. Guengerich 1912-29, L. A. Miller March 15, 1929—Nov. 1, 1951, and Raymond Wagler Nov. 15, 1951- . On Sept. 1, 1954, the size was reduced to 16 pages. H.S.B.

Herr, a Mennonite family coming originally from St. Gall, Switzerland. They were in the group that immigrated from the Palatinate to Lampeter, Lancaster Co., Pa. Hans Herr, the patriarchal pioneer, who died in 1725 had a family of six boys and a daughter. The Herr Genealogy (1908) lists over 13,000 descendants of Hans Herr, naming as ministers not only Hans and his son Christian, but also as bishops—Christian, two Johns, and Benjamin; preachers—Amos (q.v.), Christian, and Jacob (of Cumberland County), Christian S., Frank M., and Emory H., as well as numerous deacons and outstanding farmers. John Herr (1782-1850, q.v.) founded the Reformed Mennonite Church. I.D.L.

T. W. Herr, Genealogical Record of Reverend Hans Herr and His Direct Lineal Descendants (Lancaster, 1908).

Herr, Amos (Feb. 13, 1816-June 19, 1897), a Mennonite preacher in Lancaster Co., Pa., wrote the beloved hymn, "I Owe the Lord a Morning Song," one Sunday morning when the snowdrifts would not permit even horseback riding to church. He was a son of Christian Herr of Pequea, a Mennonite bishop, who, as did Amos, always lived on part of the original Herr acres (of 1710), along the Beaver Valley Pike, Lancaster Co., Pa. Ordained a preacher in 1850, he was an ardent advocate of English preaching and of Sunday school. He was the first always to preach in English in the Lancaster Conference, and with his aid the conference in 1871 adopted the Sunday-school movement. Thereupon his school in the Brick congregation was the first to be started with Conference approval. In 1880-81 his home and his pen aided the committee very materially in the production of the first Mennonite (MC) Sunday-school materials, The Question and Answer Books. Married Nov. 17, 1840, to Betsey Rohrer, his family consisted of three daughters and a son. His work was a blessing to the church of his district and beyond. I.D.L.

Herr, Christian (b. Oct. 31, 1780, d. June 23, 1853), a bishop of the Lancaster Mennonite (MC) Conference. On April 8, 1800, he was married to Anna Forrer (1783-1831), by Peter Eby (q.v.), and became his successor as bishop. He was by vocation a farmer along the Beaver Valley Pike, living on the original Herr tract in Lancaster County. He served as a deacon, minister, and bishop for a combined period of 30 years, in the Brick, Strasburg-New Providence charge. He was unusually gifted and influential in both church and community, interested in the education of youth, perhaps not eloquent, but a contender for the faith both by tongue and pen. A collection of German hymns of his production was published. He contributed a brief sketch, "History of the Mennonites," to I. D. Rupp's History of the Religious Denominations (Philadelphia, 1844). His family of eight children included Benjamin Herr, a bishop, and Amos Herr (q.v.), a preacher. I.D.L.

J. F. Funk, A Biographical Sketch of Bishop Christian Herr, Also a Collection of Hymns Written by Him in the German Language (Elkhart, 1887).

Herr, Hans (Sept. 17, 1639-Jan. 21, 1725), with his wife Elizabeth Kendig, at the age of 72 brought his family across the Atlantic to free them from oppression in Europe, settling near Willow Street in Lancaster, Pa., in the fall of 1710. Seven children, Abraham and Samuel of Manor, Christian, John, Emanuel, Henry, and Maria, the wife of Bishop Benedict Brechbill, living between Lampeter and Strasburg, also settled within the second decade of the 18th century in Lancaster County. This family was a real asset in establishing this colony in the backwoods of Pennsylvania. Herr was their spiritual leader and for 14 years stamped his guiding principles deeply upon this new foreign colony. His son Christian signed the 1725 edition of the Dordrecht Confession (published at Philadelphia in 1727) and built the Christian Herr house in 1719 along the Conestoga Road, the oldest dwelling and church house west of Germantown, sometimes erroneously attributed to his father. I.D.L.

Herr, John (1782-1850), founder of the Reformed Mennonite Church, b. Sept. 18, 1782, son of Francis Herr (1748-1810) and Fanny Barr Herr, d. May 3, 1850, in Humberstone Twp., Welland Co., Ont. His father, having been expelled from the Mennonite Church in West Lampeter Twp., Lancaster Co., about 1800 for dishonesty in the sale of a horse (as reported by the Mennonite [MC] Church), or having withdrawn from the church after having received a refusal of his demand upon the conference for reforms (as reported by the Reformed Mennonite Church), began to conduct religious services in his home as a lay brother. He died in 1810, leaving a family of eight children, none of whom had been baptized as members in any church. Among those who associated with him in his lay services were Abraham Landis and David Buckwalter, both of whom had withdrawn from the Mennonite Church. After Francis Herr's death the meetings continued and his son John was asked to lead the services, although he was not yet baptized. In a meeting on May 30, 1812, at John Herr's home John was elected pastor and bishop, and Abraham Landis was elected to baptize him. Herr in turn baptized Landis and Abraham Groff, Groff being elected deacon. Soon thereafter Abraham Landis was chosen preacher, followed by John Groff as preacher. John Herr baptized 41 persons soon after May 22. On Nov. 7, 1812, the first meetinghouse was dedicated, called Longenecker's.

Herr, a man of considerable gifts, became a vigorous leader of the new group. His attacks upon the old church from which his family and most if not all the members of his group had descended were vigorous and even bitter. He accused it of being spiritually dead and corrupt, and having departed from the teachings of Menno Simons, of having no real discipline. He himself professed to base on teachings of the Bible and Menno Simons. He traveled much, especially to Western New York and Ontario, where congregations of his group were established. It is clear that he built up his group almost exclusively from ex-Mennonites or proselytes from the Mennonite Church.

Herr published in his lifetime six small books and pamphlets which were collected and published in one volume in 1890 as John Herr's Works. The separate writings were: The True and Blessed Way (Harrisburg, 1816, German edition at Lancaster, 1815); A Brief and Apostolic Answer to a Letter Written by a Minister of the Moravian Church (Lancaster, 1842?, German ed. 1819); The Illustrating Mirror (Lancaster, 1834, German ed. Lancaster, 1827); Letter from John Herr to a Number of Converts in Erie Co. N.Y. (1833); A Remarkable Vision (1835). Herr also published the first English edition of Menno Simons' Foundation at Lancaster in 1835. It is possible that he also had a hand in the publication of the first English edition of the Martyrs' Mirror, published at Lampeter Square in Lancaster County by David Miller in 1836.

The Life of John Herr, published as a reprint from John Herr's Works in 1890, contains a brief autobiography (23 pp.) by Herr himself, first published as an appendix to the 1827 Erläuterungsspiegel, plus A Few Facts Concerning John Herr (6 pp.) taken from Daniel Musser's The Reformed Mennonite Church, Its Rise and Progress (Lancaster, 1873), whose chapter VII contains (pp. 295-315) the only known account of the origin and organization of the Reformed Mennonite Church, giving certain information about Herr. John F. Funk's The Mennonite Church and Her Accusers (Elkhart, 1878) reports the attacks of John Herr, and especially Daniel Musser, upon the Mennonite Church, and contains certain information about Francis Herr. I. D. Rupp, An Original History of the Religious Denominations at Present Existing in the United States (Philadelphia, 1844) contains a section (pp. 502-10) entitled "Reformed Mennonite Society," "which has the sanction of the Rev. John Herr of Strassburg, a bishop of this society." It contains meager items about John Herr and the origin of the Reformed Mennonites and their doctrines. (ML II, 289.) H.S.B.

Herrison, Hendrick Jansz, publisher of Menno Simons' works, which he had printed at Amsterdam in 1681 by Joh. van Veen with the title, Opera Omnia Theologica of alle de Godtgeleerde Wercken van Menno Symons, t' Samen bijeen vervat, en nu op nieuws door eenige Beminnaers der Waerheydt, ter eeren Godes en hares Naesten welvaert in Druk uytgegeven, verrijckt met vier Registers, en eenige andere schriften van den Autheur, voor desen nooyt in Druck geweest; alsmede voor yder Tractaet sijn eygen Tytel en Voorreden gestelt, en getrouwelijk in onse Nederduytsche Spraecke overgeset. Herrison's edition is almost complete. It is chiefly a reprint of the Opera oft Groot-Summarie of 1646. After the introduction Herrison put in everything that he knew of Menno's productions. His edition is rather slovenly; there are many errors, a number of sentences are completely mutilated, the translation of Menno's tracts from Low German (Oosters) is sometimes unintelligible. It is clear that Herrison was a man of little education. Nothing is known of Herrison himself. Hylkema discovered that he was a citizen of Amsterdam and that he traveled or lived in Friesland in 1684-88. He was a friend of the well-known pietistic poet and etcher Jan Luyken. Herrison was a servant of Ch(arles) van Boneval, to whom he gave a letter in 1682 which was written by Menno's own hand, and which is now in the Hamburg Mennonite Library. vdZ.

DB 1865, 118, 121; 1885, 7 f.; 1904, 27; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 297, 301; ML II, 291.

Herrites, the name often given to the followers of John Herr (q.v.), who are officially called Reformed Mennonites (q.v.).

Herrmann, Jerome, of Mondsee. The chronicles of the Anabaptists name Jerome of Salzburg as a companion of Hans Hut (q.v.) in Austria, probably because Salzburg was the scene of his martyrdom. Hans Hut had won a number of converts in Styria, where he had come about June 15, 1527; among them was "Hieronymus Herrmann von Mansee," who had previously been a monk at Ranzhofen and pastor in Braunau. He was chosen by lot under Hut's direction as one of four apostles to be sent out, the others being Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.) of Vöklabruck, Leonhard Dorfbrunner (q.v.) of Nürnberg, and Jakob Portner (q.v.) of Meissen, chaplain and preacher in the castle of the Lord von Rogendorf in Styria. Portner went to Freystadt in the mill quarter, Herrmann to Mondsee and Salzburg, and Schiemer to Vöklabruck and Gmunden. They preached Hut's doctrine, spreading it from Upper Austria to Salzburg and Bavaria. Herrmann therefore no doubt rejected the use of force and advocated community of goods. The reports of Wolfgang Künigl, the public prosecutor, indicate that many listened to his sermons, without, however, adopting Anabaptism. He was seized in Salzburg, and like Carius Binder and Wolfgang Wimmer, was burned at the stake. LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichtsbücher, 57; J. Jäckel, Zur Frage über die Entstehung der Täufergemeinden in Oberösterreich (Freistadt, 1895); idem, Zur Geschichte der Täufer in Oberösterreich und speziell in Freistadt (47. Jahresbericht des Linzer Museums); A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bünderlin von Linz und die oberösterreich. Täufergemeinden in den Jahren 1525 und 1531 (Berlin, 1893); ML II, 287.

Her(r)mann, Thomas (Thoman), of Waidhofen, Bohemia, an Anabaptist martyr. In the late 1520's Kitzbühel became a refuge for Anabaptists fleeing from Salzburg and other towns of Tirol. Some of them were seized in March 1528, and tried according to regulations; their confessions roused the sympathy of a large number of the common people.

Among those seized was Thomas Herrmann, who was led into captivity and martyrdom by an odd incident. On May 9, 1528, Hans Schweighofer and Hans Platzer of Aschelberg ("der Aschelberger"), besides several others, were committed to the court as Anabaptists. The jury, composed of citizens of Innsbruck, Hall, Rattenberg, and Freundsberg, found them guilty, and the condemned men were executed Aug. 12. When Schweighofer and Platzer were taken to the site of the execution, someone derisively cried out that the Anabaptist leaders spared themselves, while sacrificing their flocks. Herrmann then pushing through the crowd exclaimed, "What I have taught you is divine truth, and with God's help I will testify to it with my blood." He was consequently seized on Aug. 19.

The court record says, "He was a true insurrectionist and an Anabaptist, who had led many in this country into this error."

On Aug. 28 he appeared before the jury, who had received orders, even if he should recant, to condemn him to death. They complied under protest. Herrmann was burned at the stake on the same day, "as the song records, which he is said to have composed on his last trip" (i.e., to his execution): "O Gott, ich tu dich bitten wohl hier zu dieser Stund." It was soon related in Anabaptist circles that his heart refused to burn and was cast into the near-by lake. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 55 f.; Mart. Mir. D 11, E 422; ML II, 287.)

LOSERTH.

Herrnhuter (Dutch, Hernhutters), a name much used in Germany and Netherlands for the Moravian Brethren (q.v.) (Unitas Fratrum).

Hersfeld, a village in Hesse, Germany, near which an Anabaptist group had formed at the beginning of the Reformation. Their leader was Melchior Rinck (q.v.), who had previously been a schoolteacher and chaplain. Active in the congregation were also Niklas Schreiber, Georg von Staffelstein, Hans Roth, and Katharina Valebs, who was executed in Frankenhausen in 1530. Hersfeld was the home of Margarete Koch (q.v.), called "die alte Garköchin," who was for many years in prison in Eisenach with Fritz Erbe (q.v.), and whose execution was the occasion for an extensive correspondence between the Hessian and Saxon governments. In 1525 Adam Kraft, who later became a professor at the University of Marburg, court chaplain, and church inspector, was pastor at Hersfeld. Pastor Balthasar Raidt, also of Hersfeld, was often engaged by the authorities to convert the Anabaptists; he reported that by 1544 he had dealt with over 300 Anabaptists, trying to win them into the state church. HEGE.

P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); ML II, 291.

Hershberger (Hersberg, Hersberger, Herschberger, Hirschberger, Harshberger, Harshbarger), a Swiss family name today rather widely spread in the United States among Mennonite and especially Old Order Amish congregations. The earliest mention of the name in Anabaptist history occurs in Basel in 1529, when many Anabaptists in the canton found themselves in prison. Among the staunchest adherents of the faith, says Paul Burkhardt in Die Basler Täufer, were the Hersbergers of Thürnen und Läufelfingen. One of them was Elsbeth Hersberger, a midwife, who influenced numerous parents not to have their children baptized.

On Dec. 29, 1529, Hans Hersberger, a miller of Läufelfingen, appeared with 10 other Swiss Brethren preachers in a disputation with Oecolampadius and the Basel reformers. On one occasion Hans had taken part in a forbidden communion service at Aargau. On Jan. 12, 1530, he was sentenced to death. Following a supposed recantation the sentence was commuted to a fine of 20 gulden and court costs, after which he and his wife Barbara were banished from the territory. They were soon back in Läufelfingen with their children, however, and in July 1531 were imprisoned in Basel. Hans remained in prison until Dec. 3, 1533. Barbara was released at the end of seven months, but from September 1532 to December 1533 she was with her husband in prison again.

The records also mention a Heini Hersberger at Dornach in 1530. In the summer of 1531 Jackli Hersberger of Thürnen was apprehended for refusing to participate in the military campaign of his community. On July 14, 1535, Jacob Hersberger (who most likely is the same person) had his tongue and two fingers cut off by the authorities for his failure to remain out of the territory after having been banished. Apparently he now left the territory, but in April 1537 he was back again and was once more apprehended by the authorities.

In 1581 another of the Läufelfingen Hersbergers, also named Hans, was brought before the authorities for his faith. Four years later he spent eight weeks in prison and was then banished, leaving his wife and five children unable to keep themselves on their little place. In 1588 Heini Hersberger, apparently a son of Hans, was brought before the court. In 1616 Fridli, another son of Hans, and his wife were arrested, taken to the border, and banished. They were soon back again, however, and the authorities seem to have left them alone. In 1678 another Fridli Hersberger, perhaps a son or nephew of the former one, was arrested and brought to Basel for a hearing. The authorities found him well-instructed and steadfast in the Anabaptist faith. He was banished, with instructions never to return again; then he went to Alsace where he made his home among the Anabaptist communities, which continued to have close connection with their brethren in Basel. It may have been a sister of the Fridli Hersberger of 1678 who won her husband Jacob Oberer to the faith in 1680, who joined the brotherhood in Alsace.

For four or five generations the Basel Hersbergers are known to have persisted in the Anabaptist faith. Members of this and perhaps other Hershberger families evidently spread through Alsace and the Palatinate. In 1716 Martin Hirschberger is listed in the census records as residing at Böhl near Neustadt, Palatinate. In the middle of the 18th century the Hershbergers shared the great Mennonite migration to Pennsylvania. On Sept. 9, 1749, the ship St. Andrew landed at Philadelphia with a large contingent of Amish and Mennonites, including Casper and Jacob Herschberger. The ship Brothers, Sept. 30, 1754, had a Johannes Herschberger on the passenger list. The Palatine state archives at Speyer record that in 1768 the Mennonite Henrich Hirschberger of Eppstein was permitted by the authorities, upon payment of a tax, to migrate to Pennsylvania, taking with him the fortune of his three brothers who had preceded him.

In 1754 the oldest Amish congregation in Pennsylvania along the Northkill in Berks County had a Christian Hershberger in its number, and by the close of the 18th century the name Harshbarger was found among the Mennonites of Virginia. Hershbergers were among the pioneer Amish settlements in practically all of the states west of Pennsylvania.

Obituaries in Mennonite periodicals from 1867 to 1918 include 104 Hershbergers in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Virginia, Michigan, Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, Oklahoma, and Oregon.

Paul P. Hershberger (1840-1908) was a minister and promoter of Sunday schools among the Iowa Amish Mennonites in the 1870's and later moved to Seward County, Neb. Christian Hershberger (1844-1919) was ordained a minister in Iowa in 1874. Jonathan Hershberger (1829-1902) and W. C. Hershberger (1867-1951) were ministers in the Johnstown, Pa., district. A. W. Hershberger (1875-1943) was a well-known minister in Ohio and Virginia. Edwin J. Hershberger (1893-1952) was an Old Order Amish bishop in Iowa. A Missouri family of Hershbergers gave three sons to the ministry: W. Raymond (1902-54), bishop at Garden City, Mo.; Elmer D. (1900-), bishop at Detroit Lakes, Minn.; and Owen O. (1897-), minister at Hesston, Kan. In 1954 a total of 29 ordained Hershbergers were serving the congregations of America, 10 of them in Mennonite congregations, and 19 in Amish congregations. Emmett L. Harshbarger (1901-42) was a professor of history at Bethel College and active in peace education. Guy F. Hershberger (1896-) is a professor of history at Goshen College and the author of several books on nonresistance. Ezra S. Hershberger (b. 1904) is an artist on the Goshen College faculty. G.F.H.

Eli P. Hershberger, Descendants of Peter Hershberger and Elizabeth Yoder 1810-1950 (n.p., n.d.).

Hershey, a Mennonite family which emigrated from the Emmental, Switzerland, to Friedelsheim, Palatinate, Germany, in the early 1670's. Three brothers who were all preachers joined their father Christian (d. 1720) in 1717 and 1739, in settling in Lancaster Co., Pa. Bishop Benjamin Hershey (q.v.) with his four sons, Christian with his nine, and Andrew his twelve, made quite a contribution to Mennonite and United Brethren history. Among the Mennonite ministers were bishops Benjamin I and II, Jacob, and Joseph, and preachers Benjamin of Manheim, Isaac, Jr., Jacob (2), Jacob R., and Jacob H. in Lancaster County; Isaac, Jr., Jacob, and Joseph I and II in York County and today Martin R., Noah L., and Sanford. The congregation east of Intercourse and one in central York County are still called Hershey. In the Welland Co., Ont., community the members of the Hershey family who were Mennonite ministers were Christian, Benjamin, and John B. T. K. Hershey was a pioneer Argentine missionary. Milton S. Hershey, known for his chocolate factory, founded the philanthropic-industrial town of Hershey, Pa., was a son of members of the Reformed Mennonite Church. Gen. Lewis B. Hershey of the U.S. Army, long-time (1940-) director of the U.S. Selective Service system, was a grandson of Mennonites (MC). I.D.L.

H. Hershey, Hershey Family History (Scottdale, 1929).

Hershey, Benjamin (1697-July 29, 1789), came to Pennsylvania with his father Christian, his mother Oade, and his brother Andrew, emigrating from Friedelsheim, Palatinate, Germany, whither he had fled from Switzerland about 1671. They arrived in America about 1717 and Benjamin settled "one mile west of Lancaster Town" on the Marietta Pike in the same community as the Hans Brubakers and Peter Swarr. He was early a minister, signing the 1725 edition of the Dordrecht confession (published 1727 at Philadelphia) for the Lancaster area, became bishop and established the Abbeyville congregation and the churches to the northwest. He was moderator of the Lancaster Conference during the Revolution and the stormy days following. The name occurs on some extant documents. He steered the church through the divisions of Francis Herr, the United Brethren, and the Brethren in Christ schisms. His children were Christian, Bishop Benjamin II (d. 1812), who became his successor, and two daughters. He was the author of the petition of 1775 to the Pennsylvania Assembly for release from military service, A Short and Sincere Declaration (in GCL). I.D.L.

Hershey, Eusebius, was born near Manheim, Lancaster Co., Pa., on Aug. 14, 1823. Converted at the age of 18, he joined the United Brethren Church and began to preach for them in 1842. After a few years he joined the Evangelical Mennonites, which later became a part of the M.B.C. Church. He spent 43 years in evangelistic work mostly among non-Mennonites in the eastern part of the United States and Canada, making 13 trips to Canada.

Hershey felt the call to Africa, and on Nov. 1, 1890, sailed from New York, arriving at Sierre Leone after 38 days. He preached through an interpreter for six months, then took sick, and after an illness of seven days died on May 24, 1891. He was the pioneer of all foreign missionary work of his own church, and the first foreign missionary of all American Mennonites. J.A.Hu.

Hershey Mennonite Church (MC), originally known as the Hess Church, located in Salisbury Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., is a member of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference. Christian Hess, Jr., and Abraham Hershey were the trustees who purchased the land for the first meetinghouse in 1814, which was used both as a school and as a church. The second church was built by 1837, and a new brick on the present site in 1862, which was replaced by the fourth church in 1879, remodeled during the winter of 1947-48. It was a part of the Pequea ministerial circuit almost to the present. It is now a part of the Old Road-Meadville circuit, but gradually it is becoming a separate congregation. Peter Eby was the first bishop when the congregation still worshiped in homes. In 1953 G. Parke Book was the bishop; Martin R. and Sanford E. Hershey the ministers; and Willis L. Hershey with his father Landis Hershey, deacons; the membership was 196. Meadville (q.v.) and the Intercourse Mission Sunday School, begun 50 years ago, were outgrowths of this congregation. I.D.L.

Hershey Mennonite Church (MC), located three miles north of Thomasville, York Co., Pa., was founded in the 1740's by the Hershey, Roth, Brubaker, and other families from Lancaster County, who organized as a congregation in 1753. The membership in 1886 was 45. The first meetinghouse was built in 1825 on grounds donated by John Brubaker. This building was destroyed by a storm in 1896, and the present sandstone church was built. This was closed for a few years and then reopened in 1948. Daniel Bare, Josiah and Benjamin Hershey, Isaac Kauffman, Jacob Hershey, and S. L. Roth have served as ministers here. It is a part of Richard Danner's bishop district. In 1955 there were 22 members; the minister was B. Harnish Noll. I.D.L.

Hershey Reformed Mennonite Church, Derry Twp., Dauphin Co., Pa., was established about 1833. John Hershey (1801-51) of this community was quite active in building up the congregation. It has never been strong. M. Hershey donated grounds for a meetinghouse in 1871. The 1948 membership was 11, with no local minister. I.D.L.

Herstein's Mennonite Church (MC), originally an outpost of the Skippack (MC) congregation of the Franconia Conference. The Herstein's school and meetinghouse with cemetery is located in Limerick Twp., Montgomery Co., Pa. The first building seems to have been erected in 1803, and was enlarged in 1917. The high point in number of members was 30, sometime in the 19th century. Services were always suspended during the winter months. For some time, beginning in 1934, a nonsectarian minister conducted services in the "Herstein Chapel." In 1954 the Franconia Mennonite Mission Board (MC) opened work in the ancient building to re-establish a Mennonite congregation at Herstein's. J.C.W.

's Hertogenbosch, capital of the Dutch province of North Brabant (1953 pop. 61,143; largely Roman Catholic; only a few Mennonites), was in the 16th century a center of Anabaptism. Bartel Boeckbinder (q.v.) and Leentgen Hendricksz (q.v.), who were executed because of Anabaptism, were natives of 's Hertogenbosch. About 1538 there was a congregation, of which Paulus van Drunen (q.v.) was an elder. Eight members of this congregation, including van Drunen, were put to death in September 1538 or 1539 at Vught near 's Hertogenbosch, but in later times also there was a congregation. About 1544 there was here some activity of the adherents of Jan van Batenburg (q.v.) and of David Joris (q.v.). Magdalena from Waterland (near Amsterdam), a follower of David Joris, was executed at Vught on Aug. 14, 1544. Elder Gillis van Aken (q.v.) performed baptism here in the home of a shoemaker in June 1545. According to the confession of Jan van Sol in 1550 Hughe Matthyszoon had preached in 's Hertogenbosch; Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 35 persons here in 1557-61 and 32 in 1563-65. In December 1569 or January 1570 on his journey from Flanders to Cologne the Elder Hans Busschaert visited 's Hertogenbosch. The congregation still existed but was in a rather sad condition as he states in his letter of Jan. 29, 1570, to Antwerp. Soon after it must have disappeared. Since 1944 there has been a Mennonite fellowship (Kring) of 30 members at 's Hertogenbosch-Vught, served by the preacher of Eindhoven (q.v.). Services are held usually monthly in the Lutheran church. There is also a ladies' circle. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 76, 215, 287; DB 1917, 137, 186 ff.; 1918, 138; Mellink, Wederdopers, 62, 311-15, 414.

Hertzler (Hartzler), a family name found among the Amish Mennonites in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, in the Palatinate, in France, and perhaps in other communities in Europe, before 1750. In 1749 Jacob Hertzler, the first Amish Mennonite minister and bishop in the United States, landed in Philadelphia, Pa. In 1750 he, with his wife, three sons, and one daughter, settled on a farm two miles west of Hamburg, in Berks Co., Pa. At least three other Hertzlers arrived in Philadelphia between 1749 and 1761, and still others came later. Some of them were not Mennonites.

According to the Hertzler-Hartzler Family History (1952) there are now 8,757 families of descendants of Jacob Hertzler. The family in America covers eleven generations, with a total of 36,548 individuals. They live in all of the 48 states, in 5 provinces of Canada, in 7 nations of Latin America, in 4 countries of Europe, and in 8 other nations of the Near and Far East.

Family heads followed 533 occupations. They belonged to 79 denominational and nondenominational religious bodies. There were 359 Christian ministers in 29 different Protestant churches. Of this number, 254 were members of various Mennonite bodies. There were 97 bishops in eight different Christian churches. Of this number all but eleven were representatives of some branch of the Mennonite faith. There were 47 foreign missionaries located in Bulgaria, Sweden, Ethiopia, Tanganyika, Syria, Lebanon, India, China, Japan, and Argentina. There were 74 nurses reported. There were 60 physicians and dentists. There were 80 members of the family who had earned Master's degrees. Twenty-four had earned Ph.D. degrees, two had earned S.T.D. degrees, with three more having honorary D.D. degrees. Five had biographies given in Who's Who. Sixty-four were instructors in colleges, in addition to three college deans, and seven presidents, of seven different colleges. Four of these schools were Mennonite colleges. Five of the presidents were Mennonite men.

Among the Mennonite (nearly all MC) leaders and workers with the name Hertzler or Hartzler have been: Jacob Hertzler (q.v., 1703-86), first Amish bishop in the United States; Christian Hertzler (1800-78), Amish Mennonite preacher at Morgantown, Pa.; Isaac D. Hertzler (1852-1926), preacher at Denbigh, Va.; John Hertzler (1815-88), A.M. bishop at Belleville, Pa.; John J. Hartzler (1845-1936), A.M. bishop at Garden City, Mo., for 42 years; J. S. Hartzler (q.v.) (1857-1953), Elkhart, Ind., Mennonite preacher for over 60 years, prominent official and Bible teacher at Elkhart Institute and Goshen College (1895-1918), secretary of the Mennonite General Conference for many years; C. A. Hartzler (q.v.) (1876-1947), Mennonite bishop at Tiskilwa, Ill.; J. D. Hartzler (1884-), Mennonite bishop at Flanagan, Ill.; E. F. Hartzler (1886-), Mennonite bishop at Marshallville, Ohio; J. G. Hartzler (1880-), Mennonite bishop at Windom, Kan.; J. E. Hartzler (1879-), Goshen, Ind., former president of Goshen College (1913-18), of Bethel College (1920-21), of Witmarsum Theological Seminary (1921-31), professor at Hartford Theological Seminary (1936-53); R. L. Hartzler (1893-), Bloomington, Ill., preacher in the Central Conference; Silas Hertzler (1888-) and H. Harold Hartzler (1908-), professors at Goshen College. SI.H.

John Hartzler, Sr., A Brief Biographic Memorial of Jacob Hertzler and a Complete Genealogical Family Register of His Lineal Descendants (Elkhart, 1885); Silas Hertzler, The Hertzler-Hartzler Family History (Goshen, 1952).

Hertzler, Jacob (1703-86), an Amish Mennonite bishop. He was presumably born in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, where his son John was born. It seems likely that here his first wife died, and that he married Catharine Reugy before religious persecution forced him and his family to emigrate. He first moved near Kaiserslautern in the Palatinate, where also there was a large settlement of Amish Mennonites. Two sons, Jacob and Christian, and a daughter Fannie were the children of the second marriage.

On Sept. 9, 1749, Jacob Hertzler and his family landed in Philadelphia. On Jan. 9, 1750, he received a warrant for 100 acres of forest land in Pennsylvania near the Blue Mountain, which he converted into a farm called "Contentment." This farm is located two miles west of Hamburg in what is now Berks Co., Pa. A few Amish Mennonite families had reached America before Jacob Hertzler arrived.

No accurate record is available concerning the ordination of Jacob Hertzler, but on arrival he at once became the minister and bishop of what came to be known as the Schuylkill Amish Mennonite congregation. In 1766 Richard and Thomas Penn donated 20 acres of land adjoining the Hertzler farm for church purposes. On this property was erected a log school building for the education of the children of the congregation. Part of this property was used for a burying ground. Here Jacob Hertzler, his wife, and his son Jacob are buried.

Tradition shows Jacob Hertzler as a frugal, hard-working, energetic farmer and manual laborer. In church work his reputation was that of a conscientious, untiring Christian leader, teacher, preacher, and disciplinarian. He traveled long hours by horseback and on foot to meet his preaching appointments. For many years he was also bishop of a prosperous Amish Mennonite congregation at Malvern, Pa., where probably was built the first Amish meetinghouse in the United States. SI.H.

John Hertzler, Sr., A Brief Biographic Memorial of Jacob Hertzler (Port Royal, Pa., 1885); Silas Hertzler, The Hertzler-Hartzler Family History (Goshen, 1952); "Jacob Hertzler, 1703-1786, First Amish Bishop in America," Gospel Herald, Jan. 24, 1929; C. Z. Mast and Robert E. Simpson, Annals of Conestoga Valley (Scottdale, 1942) 92-98, 213-18; ML II, 291.

Herzenberg (later Alexandrovka), a Mennonite village established in 1880 in the district of Pavlograd, province of Ekaterinoslav, Ukraine, Russia, by Mennonites from the Molotschna settlement. They purchased 8,000 acres of land at the price of about 31 rubles per acre from a nobleman after whom the village was named. Crops during the first years were poor. Later the village prospered particularly in sheep raising. The first school building erected in 1885 was replaced in 1912 by a massive structure. In 1889, 95 children died of diphtheria and in 1919-20, 18 adults died of typhoid fever. During the political unrest of 1905 buildings on several farms were destroyed by fire. In connection with the Revolution of 1917 the village was robbed and eight persons killed. Little is known about the final fate of this village under the Soviets.

About one third of the settlers of the village belonged to the Mennonite Church, which was a subsidiary of the Ohrloff Mennonite Church. The first minister was Kornelius Siemens ordained in 1881. In 1905 Johann Wölk, ordained in 1882, was the minister. The group was organized in 1881 and had a membership of 31 in 1905 with a total population of 80. The Mennonite Brethren group was a branch of the Rückenau Mennonite Brethren Church. Its first leader was Jakob Dirksen, who was succeeded as leader by Dietrich Friesen, ordained as minister in 1895. This congregation, organized in 1880, had a membership of 79 and a total population of 180 in 1905. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 417, 444, 704; H. Dirks, Statistik, 1905, 15, 50, 62, 67; ML II, 292.

Herzenberg and Alexandrovka Mennonite Brethren Church, located near Pavlograd, province of Ekaterinoslav, Russia, was founded in 1880 by Jakob Dirksen and Johann Kliewer. Wilhelm Bärg served the congregation for a number of years. In 1913 H. T. Kliewer was the leading minister. In 1905 the congregation consisted of 79 members with a total population of 180. Little is known about the later developments and the fate of this congregation (see also Herzenberg). C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 417, 444; Dirks, Statistik, 67; D. H. Epp, Adressbüchlein (1913) 4.

Herzhorn, a parish in southwest Holstein, Germany. The local pastor reported after the Thirty Years' War, "that members of foreign religions like Anabaptists have settled here . . . but these have all died out; their children and descendants have, however, come into our church." In near-by Glückstadt (q.v.) the Anabaptists had lived three decades; during the disturbances of the war they had also settled in the surrounding country, without benefit of a special charter. R.Do.

Detlefsen, "Geschichte des Kirchspiels Herzhorn," in Ztscht der Gesellschaft für Schleswig-Holsteinische Geschichte XXXIII; ML II, 292.

Herzog, Hans, of Stadel, Switzerland, an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned March 23, 1532, at Zürich, Switzerland. He was a native of the Grüningen (q.v.) district, had under government pressure left the Anabaptists, but joined them again later. (TA Zürich, Nos. 342, 348; ML II, 292.)

Herzog, Johann Jakob (1805-85), a Protestant theologian, became professor of church history at the University of Lausanne, Switzerland, in 1853, which position he had to resign when he sided with the Free Church in Waadtland in its struggle for independence from the state. In 1854 he became professor of Reformed theology at the University of Erlangen, Germany. He was the founder of the Realenzyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche, which is of value even today, having been published in three editions. In it Mennonite history is given authentic treatment by Mennonite and Protestant authorities (e.g., Prof. Cramer, q.v.). Other works by Herzog deserving consideration are Das Leben Oekolampads und die Reformation der Kirche zu Basel (Basel, 1843) and Die romanischen Waldenser (Halle, 1853). (ML II, 292.) NEFF.

Hespeler, a town (pop. 4,000) in Waterloo Co., Ont., nine miles southeast of Kitchener. Textile mills have been a leading industry. In the early 19th century the Mennonites (MC) met in the home of Samuel Bechtel near this place, until the Wanner Mennonite Church was built two miles from town. Joseph Bechtel was one of the first Mennonite ministers in Ontario and served widely among the churches. For fuller records see Wanner Mennonite Church. The town is named after Jacob Hespeler, a brother of William Hespeler (q.v.). J.C.F.

Hespeler Mennonite Brethren Church (since 1953 merged with the Kitchener M.B. Church), located in Hespeler, Waterloo Co., Ont., a member of the Canadian Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church and also of the General Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America, was organized on Nov. 20, 1932, under the leadership of J. Bartels. The membership in 1948 was 19. The congregation met in a rented hall with the members of the United Mennonite Church. The ministers who served the church were Jacob Wiens, Dietrich Klassen, Isaak Ewert, and Jacob Sudermann. H.H.J.

Hespeler (Ont.) United Missionary Church was organized in 1898 with D. Fretz as the first pastor. In 1922 a meetinghouse was purchased. In 1950 the congregation was a member of the Ontario Conference of the United Missionary Church and had 75 members, with Ernest Lucas serving as pastor. ER.L.

Hespeler, William (1830-1921), was a Lutheran, born in Baden-Baden, Germany, and trained in the Polytechnic Institute in Karlsruhe. In 1850 he emigrated to Preston, Waterloo Co., Ont., where he joined his brother in business. He became Commissioner of Immigration and Agriculture at Winnipeg (1873-83) and later acted as Consul of the German Empire for Manitoba and the northwest territories (1883-1909). While visiting in Germany in 1872 he learned that large numbers of Mennonites living in southern Russia were considering migration to North America. Soon after he had reported this to the Canadian officials, they authorized him as a Special Emigration Agent to proceed to Russia, there to assure the Mennonites of a welcome in Canada. After visiting some of the Mennonite settlements his purposes were suspected by the Russian government and he was forced to leave that country. At this point, according to C. Henry Smith, at a meeting in November 1872 at Odessa "with the Bergthal and Molotschna representatives he suggested that they appoint a delegation of competent men to investigate the lands in Canada . . . . The advice was followed the next year. From this time on Hespeler was the representative of the Canadian government in everything that was connected with the immigration of the Russian Mennonites to Canada and their settlement upon their chosen lands." That this was the important position Hespeler filled is attested by the large number of reports, letters, and telegrams by him in the Public Archives of Canada concerning the Mennonite immigration. M.G.

C. Henry Smith, The Coming of the Russian Mennonites (Berne, 1927) 49-50; E. H. Correll, "Mennonite Immigration into Manitoba, Sources and Documents," MQR XI (1937) 196-227, 267-83, XXII (1948) 43-57.

Hess, a Mennonite family descended from Hans Hess (d. 1733), a Swiss Mennonite immigrant, who is buried near Baumgardner, Lancaster County, Pa., and had a numerous progeny, including many preachers in the Lancaster (MC) district and elsewhere. The Kraybill district of the Lancaster (MC) Conference had Bishop Samuel Hess (d. 1819); Cumberland County had a preacher Samuel Hess, and Hammer Creek a preacher John Hess. Today Lancaster Conference has preachers Amos L. Hess, Jacob G. Hess, James H. Hess, John S. Hess, John W. Hess, Maris W. Hess, and Richard B. Hess, with two deacons. John H. Hess, minister of the First Mennonite (MC) Church of Kitchener, is a descendant. A. L. Hess (q.v.), a layman, who left Lancaster County and settled in Harvey Co., Kan., in 1884, after whom the village of Hesston is named, was one of the founders of Hesston College. I.D.L.

John H. Hess, A Family Record of the Hess Family (Lititz, 1880, 2nd enlarged ed., Lititz, 1896).

Hess, Abraham Lincoln, b. April 10, 1861, at Lincoln, Lancaster Co., Pa., d. Dec. 30, 1920, at Hesston, Kan., the son of John R. and Annie E. Stauffer Hess. On Aug. 17, 1883, he was married to Anna B. Pfautz. From 1884 until his death A. L. Hess lived on a farm near what is now Hesston, at first called Eliven. He was a member of the Pennsylvania Mennonite Church near Hesston until the congregation in Hesston was organized, when he transferred his membership to the Hesston Mennonite Church. He assisted in the founding of the Hesston State Bank, of which he was president for some time. His practical faith in young people was expressed by his contribution of 80 acres of land for the beginning of Hesston College and Bible School (q.v.). He was buried in the Pennsylvania Cemetery. W.E.O.

Dora and Frank Roupp, Hess Record (Fall River, Kan., 1949).

Hess, Hans Jakob, a Swiss Mennonite preacher in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, was imprisoned three times for his faith in 1637-39, but escaped twice. Finally he was put in chains for 16 weeks; he endured this martyrdom until his death. His property was sold, but none of the 4,000 fl. of proceeds was given his heirs. His wife was also imprisoned in the same year (1639) and died after 63 weeks in prison. (Mart. Mir. D 816, E 1115; ML II, 292.) NEFF.

Hesse stands near the top among the German territories in which Anabaptism became widespread in the very first years of its rise. The history of the movement in this territory, which at that time contained not only the later Grand Duchy of Hesse but also the greater part of the modern Prussian Province of Hesse-Nassau, furnishes a typical example of how theologians, princes, statesmen, and jurists united to combat a brotherhood which thought it could not find the true primitive Christian life in the state church. Nevertheless Hesse has a special place in the history of the Anabaptist movement since in this territory, in contrast to the other Protestant territories, death sentences on account of faith were not passed on the Anabaptists. The clergy in Hesse were not able to put across their viewpoint on the suppression of those who held to the baptism of faith on account of the position of Landgrave Philip of Hesse (q.v.). He preferred as more Biblical the method of free exchange of opinion. The results of the discussions with the Anabaptists were of real importance not only for the Hessian state church, but also for Protestantism at large.

Landgrave Philip appreciated the religious sensibilities of his subjects. To a certain extent he sympathized with the views of the Anabaptists. For this reason on Feb. 20, 1530, he wrote to his sister: "I see more real Christianity among those who are called fanatics than among those who are Lutheran." The Lutheran theologians, as well as the authorities of Saxony, were aware of Philip's attitude and this may have been one reason why Justus Menius dedicated to him his book on the Anabaptists, entitled Der Widdertauffer lere und geheimnis aus heiliger Schrift Widderlegt (Wittenberg, 1530), to which Martin Luther wrote the foreword.

Philip, realizing that it was impossible to secure agreement on every question of doctrine, was ready, at first at least, to grant tolerance to all the various faiths, with the exception of the Catholic Church. It was only upon pressure from the Saxon authorities that he allowed himself to be moved from his progressive attitude. But in the matter of the punishment of the Anabaptists, he never forsook his original point of view. He looked upon Anabaptism as only a "degenerated child of the Reformation" (entartetes Kind der Reformation) and hoped to be able to bring them into the state church.

Since the neighboring territories issued very strict mandates against the Anabaptists, they fled into Hesse. From the middle of 1528 on, the center of this movement was the region of Hersfeld (q.v.), especially the village of Sorga. The spiritual leader here was Melchior Rinck (q.v.), who was a priest at Hersfeld in 1523 and who became a very active leader in the Anabaptist movement after joining it in 1528. Philip spared no pains to bring about Rinck's return to the state church; but neither Balthasar Raidt, the pastor at Hersfeld, nor the professors of theology in the University of Marburg were able to make him change his position. He was imprisoned until May 1531, and finally expelled from the country, with the command never to return to Hesse or Electoral Saxony. Nevertheless Rinck returned to Hesse that very year. On Nov. 11, 1531, as he was preaching on the command of Jesus to baptize, he was arrested together with eleven hearers as the result of a search instituted by the council of Vacha. Since the arrest took place in the township of Hausbreitenbach, which was in the joint jurisdiction of Landgrave Philip and the Elector of Saxony, a lively dispute arose between the two states as to the punishment of the prisoners. John of Saxony demanded the death penalty on the basis of an opinion which was submitted to him by his counselors and the scholars at Wittenberg, moved also by the regulations laid down in the decree of the Diet of Speyer of April 23, 1529. Philip preferred a milder treatment.

In order to free himself from the charge that he had done nothing to stop the spread of Anabaptism in his territory, Philip issued a regulation about the middle of 1531, which placed the major emphasis on the reconversion of the Anabaptists. If there was suspicion that an inhabitant of the country was inclined to accept the views of the Anabaptists it was first of all the duty of the pastor to diligently question him. If the questioning revealed an inclination to leave the faith and an unwillingness to modify his attitude, a report was to be submitted to the superintendent of the district. The latter was then to instruct the person in question in the presence of several learned pastors. If he then accepted the teachings of the state church, he was to be released. If he were caught a second time, he was to confess his error in the church and promise to become a full participant in the church organization and not to admit Anabaptists into his house or to associate with them. If he should backslide again, he was nevertheless to be accepted if he should recant the third time, as in the preceding case, but he was required to sell half of his goods and give the receipts to the treasury for the poor.

But if anyone should refuse to yield to this instruction, the regulations prescribed further that in case he were a preacher of the Anabaptists or had baptized others, he should be expelled from the country under threat of death until he should repent and make public confession. This regulation was based upon the assumption that such a preacher had illegally assumed the office of preacher and had illegally undertaken ceremonial procedure. If the preacher would accept these requirements he should be restored to the church. Those who had merely been baptized and had not preached were required to sell their lands and buildings and all property and to submit to the same regulations as the Jews, who were not permitted to possess land in the country. If the wives and children of the accused parties would return to the state church, they should be permitted to recover the lost property. Whoever was expelled from the country but nevertheless would return and not keep his oath, the same should be handed over to the civil authorities "to receive what was due him."

Melchior Rinck, who had violated his oath and refused to be moved in his convictions, was sentenced to life imprisonment. This Philip reported to John of Saxony on Jan. 3, 1532. In 1540 Rinck's punishment was lightened as a result of the intervention of Martin Bucer. Since John, on the basis of the imperial decrees, insisted upon the punishment of the rest of those who had been arrested at Hausbreitenbach, he and Philip agreed to divide the prisoners and permit each prince to apply whatever punishment he saw fit to those that he took. The prisoners who were assigned to Hesse recanted and were released. On the contrary, the Saxon authorities immediately executed three Anabaptists, Hans Eisfart, his wife, and Berlet Schmidt. In Anabaptist circles these executions aroused great indignation and merely stirred them to still greater zeal for their faith. Even those who had recanted now spoke out boldly in the presence of the commissioners of the Saxon and Hessian governments in favor of baptism on confession of faith. John Frederick, who became Elector of Saxony in 1532, insisted like his father upon the execution of the Anabaptists who had been arrested at Hausbreitenbach, basing his position upon a legal opinion of the high court at Leipzig.

The spread of the Anabaptist movement in Hesse led to further pressure upon the Landgrave by the neighboring states. In 1536 a group of 30 Anabaptists were surprised at a service in an abandoned church near Gemünden on the Wohra (district of Kassel). Ten of these Anabaptists were imprisoned at Wolkersdorf (now Oberförsterei in the Frankenberg circuit, district of Kassel), with four of the leaders: Georg Schnabel (q.v.), previously an official of the church in Allendorf, Peter Lose of Gemünden, Hermann Bastian, printer (supposedly from Marburg), and Leonhard Fälber (q.v.) (Rembert, 450) of Jülich. They had previously been repeatedly expelled, but always returned and therefore were now subject to the penalty which the last mandate prescribed, but which Philip hesitated to carry out, requesting an opinion from the evangelical lawyers and theologians of other countries on the basis of a law issued by the previous Landtag. On May 24, 1536, the request for the opinion was sent out to Duke Ulrich of Württemberg, Duke Ernst of Lüneburg, the lawyers of Strasbourg, Ulm, and Augsburg, and the theological faculty of the University of Wittenberg.

The response received merely strengthened Philip in his previous attitude, for several reports opposed the death penalty in matters of faith, as for instance the opinion of the mayor and council of the city of Ulm and that of the theologians at Strasbourg. The other theologians demanded the death penalty, as for instance the theological faculty of Tübingen, Martin Luther, Johann Bugenhagen, Caspar Cruciger, and Philip Melanchthon for the theological faculty at Wittenberg, and Urban Rhegius for the Duke of Lüneburg. In verbose statements Rhegius declared that the worldly temporal authorities could execute with a good conscience the "accursed heretics" who seemed to him to be worse and more deserving of punishment than the most notorious criminals, since the state had the power to do this (Hochhuth, 1858, 556-78). The Wittenberg reformers declared that it was the duty of the secular authorities to kill obstinate dissenters. Philip summoned his counselors and theologians, together with the representatives of the nobility and the cities, to a conference at Kassel on Aug. 7, 1536, to discuss the future policy in the punishment of the Anabaptists. His first act at this conference was to read the opinions which he had just received; then each of the delegates was asked to state his opinion. This procedure naturally developed opposing opinions, but the outstanding influence of the attitude of the ruler of the land was quite evident. There were some, to be sure, who demanded the death penalty for the Anabaptists and pointed to the example of the Emperor Honorius of the Western Roman Empire. However, the more extreme views were not accepted by the conference. One delegate wanted to have the death penalty for those Anabaptists who should return after they were expelled; these would not be executed for their faith, but for disobedience to the authorities. Others demanded life sentence at hard labor. The extreme opinions of the reformers, however, found no support. Among the theologians only Pastor Justus Winther of Rothenburg favored the death penalty on the basis of the laws of the empire.

The theologians who were of a milder opinion recognized the weaknesses of the state church, especially from the point of view of the religious life among the people, and were quite aware of the strength of the oppressed Anabaptists who baptized upon confession of faith. For this reason it was proposed to institute a general prayer throughout the country for the conversion of the Anabaptists, and to endeavor to have the people renounce their sins in order that the Anabaptists should no longer have reason to stay away from the church. Adam Kraft, the noted preacher who had been professor of theology at the University of Marburg since 1528, and who was also inspector of the churches and therefore had good opportunity to learn to know the reasons why the Anabaptists stayed away from the church, expressed his opinion that the Anabaptists would return to the state church as soon as the more offensive sins and vices of the members of the state church should be done away with. Pastor Johann Lening of Melsungen said, "We should pray God that the people change their manner of life, and admonish the Anabaptists kindly and lovingly, and even if everything which the Anabaptists teach is wicked, yet we must use caution and use every means to convert them before we reach for the sword." And the chaplain Melander said, "The Anabaptist sect represents an affliction from God; for this reason general prayer should be ordained, the preachers ought diligently to preach against sectarians, the people should be admonished to improve their lives and should be told that sins will not remain unpunished, in order that the Anabaptists will find no cause in us to establish a new church. It is the duty of the authorities to punish all the evils and to punish each according to the degree of his sin" (Hochhuth, 1858, 594).

Several delegates insisted upon improvement of the existing regulations, and attacked certain persons in the church whose conduct was offensive to the Anabaptists. What the Anabaptists sought to attain out of inner conviction, namely, a pure life, this the state church should try to accomplish in its members by pressure from the authorities.

The next step was to select a committee composed of several delegates to prepare a new regulation against Anabaptists. The regulations which were adopted the following year in the Visitationsordnung of 1537, marked an intensification of the previous regulations and prescribed the death penalty for the Anabaptists. One can see, however, how much the civil and ecclesiastical authorities endeavored to meet the demands of the Anabaptists in wanting to have religious fellowship only with persons of morally irreproachable character. The pastors and officials were required to exercise careful oversight in regard to all persons of immoral tendencies and it was made their duty to punish acts of immorality whenever they occurred.

According to the new regulations the following practices were not to be tolerated in the "Christian church": the rejection of infant baptism and the repetition of baptism; the view that a Christian cannot accept civil office, cannot punish evildoers, cannot partake in just war, cannot receive or give interest or tithes, and cannot swear proper oaths; the view that the incarnation of Jesus was not accomplished by the work of the Holy Spirit; the denial of the forgiveness of mortal sin after baptism; the acceptance of communism of goods; crimes against marriage (bigamy, or separation on the ground of divergence of faith followed by remarriage). The following acts were threatened with the death penalty: unauthorized preaching or conducting of services in the forests in out-of-the-way places, or in isolated houses, and the intentional attendance of such meetings; rejection of civil authority, rejection of obedience to the authorities; return after expulsion (Hochhuth, 1858, 598). The threatened penalties were not actually carried out with great severity. The penalties were in fact due to a confusion of religious and political concepts. It is evident that these regulations were due to the influence of persons who attempted to make the ruler fear that his throne would be endangered if the Anabaptist movement should grow.

Whoever was suspected of transgressing one of the regulations was first of all to be brought to the nearest pastor and to be instructed by several learned theologians. If the attempt to enlighten and convert the erring one would be without success, then according to the regulations the persons involved should be delivered to the superintendent of the district (in Marburg, Kassel, Eschwege, Darmstadt, or St. Goar) and examined by the state counselors of the ruler, and instructed. Whoever admitted his error was required to recant in public. Whoever had previously recanted but had backslidden, and now again repented, was compelled to make a contribution to the treasury for the poor. Those who persisted in remaining true to their faith were treated with greater severity, but the ruler hesitated to actually apply the extreme penalty—death. "No Anabaptist shall be executed, even if the sentence has already been passed, without reporting the matter to us first." In the instructions to the officials a difference was made between the preachers and lay members, as well as between native and foreign persons. The foreign preacher was to be beaten with rods, branded on the cheek, and expelled from the land forever, with a threat of death penalty if he should return. Were he to return, a criminal prosecution was to be initiated against him and he was to be dealt with "according to the present regulations and the imperial laws." The native preachers were to sell their property. If they did not do so within the fixed time, their houses were to be locked, the fire put out, and the property sold. The income from the sale was to be preserved until they should demand it again (which no doubt assumed a return to the state church). They were also required under threat of death to leave the land "forever." They were to be driven out with rods and branded on the face. Whoever should return the third time was to be tortured and executed.

The lay members who were "perhaps misled due to ignorance" were to be expelled from the land if they were foreigners. If they should be caught a second time they were to be driven out with rods and branded. If caught a third time, they were to be put to death. They could however save their lives if they would recant. Native lay Anabaptists were first to be given a month's time for consideration, in which they were to be instructed by the local pastor and other clergymen. "Whoever would not listen to the instruction and join the state church was to sell his property. If this punishment should not avail, then he was to be driven out of the country with rods, but not to be branded on the cheek "because of his ignorance," and if this punishment should be without success, he was to be sentenced to imprisonment and kept there "until perhaps God should give him grace to repent and be converted." Prisons were to be built for these, where they were to be provided with slight food supplies, although they were to be permitted to have spiritual instruction, to hear the proclamation of the Word of God by a pastor of the state church, "so that God might grant His grace to them." Minor children and husband or wife who were not Anabaptists were to be dealt with as mildly as possible.

The officials dealt very leniently with those who were sentenced. The magistrate of Wolkersdorf permitted the wives of the prisoners to visit them in prison. It even became possible for the prisoners to enlarge the hole through which they received their food, by means of a saw which had been smuggled in, so that they could get out. They did not flee, but simply went in and out, sometimes remaining outside for weeks, during which time they would do their work at home, preach, and baptize, although they always returned to prison. This procedure was carried on for almost a year before it was discovered. During this time for instance Jörg Schnabel baptized almost 30 people.

In August 1538 Philip sent Gerardus Noviomagus, professor of theology at the University of Marburg, to go with Peter Dietrich Fabritius of Stadt-Allendorf to Wolkersdorf to convert the imprisoned Anabaptist preachers, Jörg Schnabel, Peter Lose, and Leonhard Fälber. (The fourth leader of the Hessian Anabaptists, Hermann Bastian, was in Marburg.) They discovered a booklet which Jörg Schnabel had written for the brotherhood answering the charges brought against the brotherhood in the Visitationsordnung of 1537. Schnabel especially denied that they practiced community of goods and that they rejected civil authority and had peculiar notions about marriage. In this booklet, which bears the title Verantwurtung und Widerlegung der Artikel, so jetzund im land zu Hessen über die armen Davider, die man Wiedertäufer nent, ausgangen sind, he defends the Scripturalness of several Anabaptist principles with remarkable evidence of familiarity with the Bible (Hochhuth, 1859, 167-81).

In this writing by Schnabel repeated mention is made of the booklets written by Peter Tasch who originally came from Jülich (Bucer mentions four writings, Lenz I, 50), and who had preached and baptized in the Lahn Valley. Schnabel was in correspondence with him. A letter was also found in which Peter Tasch gave information about the quiet progress of the Anabaptist movement in England. This letter caused Philip to send a letter in his name and that of John Frederick to Henry VIII of England, calling his attention to the spread of Anabaptism in his kingdom. A copy of the letter by Tasch was sent to Martin Luther and Philip Melanchthon. The latter was requested to prepare the letter to be sent to Henry VIII. In this letter Melanchthon spoke of the Anabaptist pestilence which was active in Germany in many places and which did not preach the pure doctrine of the Gospel; but in those regions "where the Gospel truth is preached in its purity, praise God, the people voluntarily flee from this pest because they are made secure against errors by mature doctrine." These remarks by Melanchthon were not quite satisfactory to the Hessian chancellor, Feige, wherefore the letter as written by Melanchthon was modified in many points, so that it was no longer so extreme (Lenz I, p. 320). In its new form as modified by the Hessian chancellor the letter was sent to Henry VIII on Sept. 25. Notable is an appendix which the Landgrave added to the letter as follows: "The Anabaptists are not all alike, a portion being simple, goodhearted, misled people, while another portion are dangerous, wicked, stiff-necked fellows." The Saxon translator omitted this appendix. The English government undertook severe action against the Anabaptists upon the receipt of the letter. On Oct. 1, 1538, the chancellor Thomas Cromwell issued an order to punish "the stiff-necked Anabaptists." Many of them lost their lives at the stake. (See England.)

The discussions which Noviomagus and Fabritius had on Aug. 9, 1538, with the prisoners at Wolkersdorf were a failure. The instruction of the theologians made no impression on the Anabaptist preachers. Leonhard Fälber replied with a lengthy discussion about the power of the living Word which could transform a man from evil to good and completely renew him. In the church he said the dead word was taught which did not check the sinful life of the members. Peter Lose expatiated in bitter expressions about the offensive manner of life of the Hessian preachers and teachers. In consequence the theologians could come to no agreement with the brethren. The prisoners were now taken to Marburg and put under the supervision of Statthalter George von Kolmatsch. Here likewise officials and scholars attempted to work upon them, but everything was in vain. In the meantime the movement was spreading throughout the country. Chancellor Feige, who had also conversed with the brethren, was aroused by their resistance and by the openness with which they attacked the sinful life of the members of the church. He urged the Landgrave seriously to take the matter in hand himself "and lay aside all other affairs."

Philip now sent a writing to the imprisoned preachers in which he accused them of having deceived him in that they frequently were absent from prison. He had now good reason, he said, to use severe measures against them, but he wanted to be gracious once more and give them a last opportunity to let themselves be set right by a "God-fearing man."

So a final attempt was made to convert the Anabaptists to the state church by means of a discussion (Religionsgespräch) which was held at Marburg Oct. 30 to Nov. 1, 1538, in the presence of several scholars together with the city council and delegates of the guilds in Marburg. The debate covered these topics: the ban, the church, usury, baptism, magistracy, and the incarnation of Christ. Those who took part were Martin Bucer and the imprisoned Anabaptist preachers Schnabel, Fälber, and Lose. Hermann Bastian was also present. (Hochhuth, 1858, 626-44.) At first they were asked to give Biblical grounds for their separation from the state church. Schnabel, who was asked by Bucer to speak on behalf of the group, explained that he had first accepted the Lutheran teaching and had become at once an official in charge of the treasury for the poor. In the course of his work he noticed that the management was not always carried on in the Biblical spirit. He raised objection to his pastor but received no attention for his criticisms about usury and the practice of the ban, as well as his remarks about the bad conditions in the church. He felt his conscience was bound in the sight of God, and so he could not bring himself to the point where he was willing to loan out the money of the church for interest, while many of the poor people in the community were in great need. For that reason he told the pastor, the mayor, and the council of Marburg, that they were not doing right in the matter of usury and the ban. For that reason he separated himself from them.

Bucer denied that the Anabaptists had the right to separate from the church. He said that a separation from the church could be brought about only by the church itself when it expelled those who were not willing to listen to its admonitions. Jörg had committed an error by dealing only with the pastor and failing to report to the church the evils which he had criticized to the pastor. When he was not willing to listen to the sermons any more he had not only shunned the pastor, but the pastor's work. Let him furnish a passage of Scripture on the basis of which he would be justified to shun the pastor, the pastor's work, and the whole church, before there had been a public excommunication. There was no justification for shunning the church nor a preacher nor any other official just because the church did not throw a sinner overboard. "Even though officials should be found negligent in punishing evil, yet it was not proper for any particular member to shun them or to hold them worthy of shunning," if the church did not excommunicate them.

The Anabaptists showed no appreciation for such views. Jörg declared that the church had not dealt with him and his brethren in the spirit of the Bible. It had taken their books "and plunged them into darkness"; it had driven them from house and home, "and if one should ask the council and citizens of Marburg they would say of those who had been banished that they did not deserve it and they would recognize them as pious people" (Hochhuth, 1858, 633). Although Bucer was not willing to admit that the church in Hesse had dealt unjustly with the Anabaptists since, as he insisted, it was not the church but the authorities which had imprisoned them on account of the discord, yet Jörg's argument on this point was not without influence on Bucer's attitude for the future. "We would not want to justify injustice in the church," said Bucer. The church desired "to be one" with the Anabaptists. Bucer endeavored to compromise with the views of the Anabaptists. He stated that he did not reject the ban and that the church did not want to approve of usury. He even was willing to grant the right to refuse obedience to the authorities for conscience' sake, but he said, "If a subject should know that the authorities would demand of him to do that which is wrong he should not obey" (p. 637). Bucer's explanations that little children were baptized in the time of the apostles made no impression on the Anabaptists. Jörg declared, "I prefer to stand by what I am sure about, namely, that the apostles baptized those who repented. I prefer to let go points on which I am uncertain." In the matter of the incarnation of Christ he explained that he would abide by the article in the general confession of faith on this point, but he believed "that God would in time help him to understand what he did not understand now."

Even though no agreement was reached on all the points under discussion, and in particular in the matter of baptism, in which the prisoners maintained their position, they ultimately agreed to let themselves be influenced to resume their connection with the state church. The ecclesiastical officials hoped that now all the Anabaptists would join the state church. Possibly the concession they made to the Anabaptists in the matter of baptism, namely, the introduction of confirmation, by which they hoped to bridge over the gap between the two views, was the method by which they hoped to bring about the reunion.

In his discussion on the question of baptism, Schnabel had emphasized the point that in the church the children were only baptized and nothing more was done; the children were not taught repentance and oneness of life. Bucer could not deny this fact. He therefore agreed with Schnabel and admitted that something would have to be done in this matter, namely, "the children should be catechized diligently when they came to an age of accountability and should be taught to observe everything that the Lord had commanded" (Hochhuth, 1858, 637). The accusations which Schnabel brought against the state church were now to be met by the introduction of a procedure hitherto unknown in the churches of the reformation, namely, the introduction of general instruction for the youth, followed by confirmation, in order that the Anabaptists might no longer be offended by the neglect of the religious care of the youth. Bucer wrote to Philip on Nov. 17, 1538, from Wittenberg, whither he had gone after the discussion at Marburg, that the Anabaptists could not be dealt with in a way that would be of more use to the church and at the same time the common people more effectively guarded against them, "than by a better organization of Christian life and the more earnest application of Christian discipline" (Lenz I, p. 53).

The Anabaptists did not join the church without conditions. Following the discussion at Marburg they submitted a writing to the Landgrave on Dec. 9, 1538, entitled Bekenntnis oder Antwort etlicher Fragestücke oder Artikeln der gefangenen Täufer und Anderer im Land zu Hessen (Hochhuth, 1858, 612-22). In this writing they pointed out once more how the church was lacking in its conflict against sin among the people and did not bring up the people to thankfulness and love toward God and to the praise of the Gospel. They expressed to him their conception of baptism, of the Lord's Supper, of the ban, and of swearing of oaths, and finally declared, "as soon as we feel that all possible diligence is used to apply the ban, according to the ordinance of Christ and the apostles, we are willing with our whole heart to gladly enter into fellowship with the church, even though perfection may not be attained at once (p. 620). . . . We promise to conduct ourselves toward the whole church and toward everyone in a free, brotherly, just, and serviceable fashion, just as we desire that everyone should conduct himself toward us" (p. 622). This writing, which was signed by Peter Tasch, Jörg and Ludwig Schnabel of Allendorf, Leonhard Fälber, Thonig Möler, Christian of Odenhause, Jungheim of Geyssen, Cautz Schmyt of Horbach, and Peter Lose of Gemünden, was turned over by the Landgrave to his theologians for examination (Martin Bucer, Johannes Kymäus, Dionysius Melander, Johannes Pistorius, and Justus Winther). In their reply it is interesting to note that they scarcely contradicted at all the shortcoming and failings of the pastors which the Anabaptists attacked, but much rather expressed themselves in regard to those points which dealt with the doctrine of faith and good works. On this point they hoped that "there are not many among the preachers of our confession who did not frequently and faithfully preach after this fashion. But we do not desire to defend ourselves nor others any further (p. 623) . . . and therefore have no quarrel with them in this first point, but rather agree in Christian peace" (p. 624).

The theologians complained of a shortcoming in the statements of the Anabaptists in that "they were not willing to confess more expressly and willingly their sin and grievous wickedness which they have been guilty of against the church and the congregation of Christ and its ministers and members, along with all sorts of not insignificant errors and false teachings, but rather laid the entire blame for their separation from the church on us and our shortcomings" (p. 625). But if the Anabaptists should desist from their meetings and teachings, should attend the services of the church, should cease to despise and object to infant baptism, should let their children be baptized "since these are born into the church still more than unto their parents," take the oath, assume the obligations of citizens in military service and other matters, and reunite with the church, then they should be accepted with the patience and love of Christ in the hope that they would "by their Christian and kindly association, their faithful admonition, and their devoted living, help to edify the church indeed and bring about true church discipline and the exercise of the Christian ban." Furthermore, no pain should be spared in the church to make matters right and wherever neglect should appear and the Anabaptists or any other persons should call attention of the leaders in the church to the matter, "we faithfully promise to do our best by the grace of God so that men may see that we are concerned about Christian discipline" (p. 626). "These brethren," as the Anabaptists are now called, "should be gladly forgiven for everything they have ever done against the church. On the other hand, the Anabaptists should also forgive if they feel that they have been dealt with too severely."

This opinion of the theologians stands in sharp antithesis to the previous attitude of the Hessian clergy. In it a high regard for the attitude of the Anabaptists can be recognized, a response which was bound to make an impression on the Anabaptist leaders as soon as they were able to realize the emphasis which was being put upon their endeavor to promote holiness, and how much good effect on the church was anticipated as a result of their co-operation. From this point of view it would not be right to say that it was only the noted dialectical ability of Martin Bucer which was the cause of the bridging over of the differences in the discussions with the Anabaptists, but rather the sincere endeavor of the theologians to make available to the state church the teachings of the Anabaptists which seemed to them to be worthy of acceptance.

The new discipline for the Hessian church was undertaken at once. By the end of November 1538 the synod met at Ziegenhain and adopted the new discipline. It appeared in print in the following year. In this discipline it is quite easy to see the influence of the discussions with the Anabaptists. The discipline required that "all children as soon as they are old enough should be sent to the catechetical instruction which shall be arranged at each place at such a time that it will not be a burden to send the children" (Diehl, p. 17).

With this regulation which rose out of the struggle between the state church and Anabaptism, the Hessian state church created an institution which was introduced at first in the evangelical state church in Hesse and then in the following three centuries gradually into all the evangelical churches of Germany under the name "confirmation," that is, a ratification of the baptism which had been performed upon infants which were as yet unaware of what was being done.

The attitude of Philip to the reforms which arose out of the discussions with the Anabaptists is of importance. In his instruction to the government he said:

"My dear counselors and retainers: We have read the decisions of the synod which has just met at Ziegenhain concerning the ban, confirmation, and the Anabaptists and desire to make known that we are graciously pleased with the decisions, but we have noticed several points which seemed thus to be in part unbalanced and in part possibly not clear.

"As regards the application of the ban, especially at the beginning, in the attempt to prevent a falling away from the Gospel, prevent strife and offense, we have fears that this may be misused just as was the case in former times, and that the ban may not be applied with Christian sympathy and modesty. We also fear that not all preachers and pastors have equal gifts in the matter of teaching or in common sense or in Christian modesty, and feel therefore that the ban should be introduced everywhere in all parishes at once, but should first be applied in the cities and villages where the most able and most learned preachers are to be found, as for instance at Kassel and at Marburg, so that we can see how things go and so that the other preachers and pastors who are not so able should observe and learn thereby how the ban should be exercised. . . . We express ourselves thus also because we have heard that the scholars who were present at the synod are also of this opinion and feel that so far as the ban is concerned, it should not yet be publicly announced in the church or in printed form, but should first be tried out in the various places as mentioned above.

"In the matter of the Anabaptists and their punishment, it will be necessary that you, our Chancellor, should go into this matter and should prepare a proper regulation in accordance with our command which everyone may clearly understand and accept. It shall have the following form: If an Anabaptist should do this, he should be punished for it; if he should do that, he should be punished with a more serious punishment. Further, it is necessary to note that when Anabaptists are about to be punished or sentenced they will probably cry out in public and say, for they are well able to speak, 'Dear people, we are suffering very much today on account of our faith, and on account of righteousness.' Thereupon the poor, common, ignorant people will no doubt be much offended and embittered in spirit. Therefore it would be better not to sentence an Anabaptist unless it is made known in advance to our counselors at Kassel and Marburg, and furthermore that they should not be sentenced anywhere except at Kassel and Marburg. Further, if such a one should be sentenced, several officials must be on hand to explain to the people that we are punishing the Anabaptist for this or that transgression, and the preachers are to publicly proclaim to the people that the Anabaptists are in error on this or that point and are misleading the people. All this should be done in order that the people may hear that the Anabaptists are not being punished for the true Christian faith and for righteousness' sake but because of their transgression and disobedience, and also that they may learn that the Anabaptists are in error in this and that point and are unrighteous, in order that these errors may become offensive to the people and that they may learn to save themselves from them. In Kassel the following persons should do this, namely, the Chancellor and two or three of the most able preachers, such as Dionysius Melander and Johannes Pistorius, while at Marburg it is to be the Statthalter and two or three of their most learned preachers, such as Master Adam and others."

These decisions and regulations give abundant evidence of the extent to which the struggle against the Anabaptists influenced the religious and moral life of the country. The officials desired to really educate and train the populace in the proper manner but were aware of the difficulties attending such endeavors. This is the reason for the cautious method of introducing the ban. Compulsory membership in the state church was incompatible with the application of the ban according to the principles of the Anabaptists. For this reason one of the two had to be dropped if there was not to be continual conflict. The principle of the Anabaptists which was based upon the assumption of freedom in religious matters simply could not be applied without modification of the state church. For this reason the introduction of the ban in the Hessian church never got beyond the stage of experimentation.

The Anabaptists in the country appear to have taken a distrustful attitude toward the assurances which had been given their leaders at Marburg. They could not reconcile the threats of punishment in case of refusal to rejoin the state church with their conception of freedom of faith and conscience. They hesitated to enter into permanent union with a church in which the sword of civil authority exercised dominant influence in matters of faith. Martin Bucer understood their attitude as is evident from the proposal which he made to Philip on Nov. 4, 1538, to send out the Anabaptist preachers who had already entered the state church as missionaries to win over their followers. In this proposal he says: "There are more of the Anabaptists in your Highness' land than I had supposed and among them are many goodhearted people who are so suspicious of us preachers that they will not accept anything or at least very little from us. If therefore they are threatened with punishment the result is that the most pious among them will simply be strengthened in their attitude, for they will thereby think that they are suffering for the Lord's sake, whereas those who yield, usually do it against their conscience and for this reason they will not remain steadfast in their new faith or will forsake all religion and thereby become the most infamous people which can be found, just as I have experienced in many cases" (Lenz, p. 51).

According to Bucer's report Peter Tasch is said to have prevailed upon about 200 members of the Anabaptist group to return to the state church. We learn later of various other commissions which Tasch, Bastian, Jörg Schnabel, and Peter Lose received in the matter of winning back their previous comrades in faith for the Hessian church. However, they were not able to accomplish any great success (Lenz I, 325). Peter Tasch followed Bucer to Strasbourg. What Bucer had said to the Landgrave concerning such Anabaptists who yielded to pressure against their conscience (in his letter of Nov. 4, 1538) was demonstrated in his case. Tasch not only gave up his faith but later the ethical principles of Anabaptism as well. He led an extravagant life, fell into debt, deceived his creditors, and finally disappeared from the city about 1560 (Rembert, 457).

The Anabaptist movement in Hesse was by no means suppressed by these measures. Quite a number of Anabaptists remained steadfast to their faith. On Jan. 22, 1544, Philip wrote to Master Adam that he intended "to drive out of the country the Anabaptists who were not willing to accept the articles which had been accepted by Schnabel, Tasch, and others" (Hochhuth, 1858, 181).

In order to escape the continued pressure by civil and ecclesiastical authorities, many Anabaptists migrated to Moravia, where they joined the Hutterites, whose missionaries for a long time regularly visited their coreligionists in Hesse. For instance in July 1544 a company of 12 travelers whose leaders, Peter and Jacob, had already suffered several imprisonments in Hesse on account of their teaching and baptizing, were arrested by Hessian officers (Hochhuth, 1859, 208). They had decided to emigrate on account of the order which they had received to participate in the war, which was against their faith.

Although Philip was very anxious to restore unity of religious faith in his country and made severe threats against all those who resisted his program, he nevertheless did not permit himself to be brought to the point where he gave his consent to the actual application of the death penalty. At the end of his long reign (he died on March 31, 1567) he could set down these words in his last will: "We have never killed a human being because he did not believe aright." He admonished his sons to follow his example.

After Philip's death his country was divided into four districts. Wilhelm received the principality of lower Hesse with its capital Kassel, Ludwig received upper Hesse with its capital Marburg, Philip received the lower county of Katzenellenbogen with St. Goar, while George received the upper county of Katzenellenbogen with Darmstadt.

In the Reformationsordnung of 1572 which included regulations taken from the mandate of 1539 against the Anabaptists, Landgrave Wilhelm fixed the highest penalty against Anabaptists as expulsion from the country. These regulations also provided that if the instruction of the Anabaptists should be in vain the superintendent should sell the property of such persons within 14 days. However, in contrast to the usual practice in other countries, the guilty persons retained the right to dispose of the proceeds. If the property was not sold within the set time of 14 days the officials were required to sell it at the best possible price and hand over the proceeds to the guilty persons as soon as they had passed a point 12 miles outside of the border. However, if the guilty persons should voluntarily leave the country on request they were permitted to retain their property and rent it and later sell it. If they should return to the state church, their transgressions should be forgiven them.

Landgrave Wilhelm had previously manifested his more tolerant attitude toward the Anabaptists when the synod of Kassel laid before him in 1569 the question whether children of Anabaptist parents should be forcibly baptized. Wilhelm had received several opinions from his advisers. For instance, superintendent Dr. Johannes Marbach of Strasbourg, who had participated in the debate with the Anabaptists at Pfeddersheim in 1557, and who had published a book entitled Prozess in which he recommended to the authorities the death penalty for Anabaptists, recommended that the children of Anabaptists should be forcibly baptized against the will of their parents. Matthias Flacius Illyricus gave the same opinion. Landgrave Wilhelm however could not accept this point of view. It appeared to him that there were more arguments from human reason in the opinions than proofs out of the Bible. According to him, although the authorities had the power to compel their subjects to obey, he thought that it was quite questionable whether this power extended so far as to control the conscience which God alone was to judge. The Landgrave therefore had serious doubts about applying forcible baptism. In his mind a Christian ruler frequently had to make concessions to prevent harm and to maintain Christian love. To drive out of the country the "poor misled folk" or to inaugurate compulsory baptism might encourage Catholic princes to similar procedure against the evangelicals. He was supported in his opinion by the opinion which the Hessian superintendents Johannes Pistorius of Nidda and Johannes Gidarius submitted. Both of them pointed out the prevailing disorderliness among the members of the state church, which was frequently advanced by the Anabaptists as the reason for their separation from the church (see Heppe, ML II, 284).

It is worth while noticing in this letter several expressions by Anabaptist leaders. For instance, Martin Richter declared to the superintendents and preachers: "The teaching on infant baptism is incorrect, and likewise there is little improvement in life to be noticed among the members of the evangelical church." Even threat of punishment against him made no impression, so that he finally said he could not give up the truth which he had accepted but must be patient and suffer whatever he was to suffer. He requested however that he should be dealt with according to the regulations of the ruler and should be permitted to leave the country with his wife and child. Another Anabaptist, Hans Kuchenbecker of Hatzbach, expressed himself as follows to the Chancellor, preachers, and counselors at Marburg, on Feb. 5, 1577: he had observed very little improvement of life among the preachers and their hearers, and he did not desire to belong to such a crowd.

The remnants of the Anabaptist church in Hesse were not wiped out until the Thirty Years' War and their influence continued even beyond that time. The superintendent, Dr. Karl W. H. Hochhuth, the first scholar to work through the Anabaptist archives in Hesse, asserts "that the principle of ethical mysticism which lay at the roots of the Anabaptist movement could not be suppressed, and that it is impossible to deny the influence which certainly contributed a great deal toward reinvigorating church life and strengthening the grasp on old and almost forgotten redemptive principles" (Hochhuth, 1859, 234). A later scholar, Eduard Becker, writes as follows in a monograph on The Anabaptists in Upper Hesse (Die Wiedertäufer in Oberhessen): "It is noteworthy that a considerable number of villages which were known to have been centers of Anabaptism later became centers of pietism and in our day are now centers of the Gemeinschaften" (q.v.).

Although Anabaptism was suppressed, it exerted its influence upon the public life of Hesse. A modern scholar in church law, Dr. Walter Sohm, comments as follows on the consequences of the reunion of the Anabaptist leaders with the State Church: "It is impossible to fail to recognize that Bucer and the Landgrave accomplished an extraordinary thing in this reunion . . . their procedure did not mean the destruction of the movement as was the case in Electoral Saxony; it meant the fortunate assimilation of the movement, the winning over of opposing forces and the exploitation of the movement with all its strength for the promotion of the purpose of the church. Nevertheless Christian society did not come out of this struggle without a loss. The Anabaptism which had been suppressed breathed something of its spirit into the body of the whole Hessian church life. . . . The conception of the pastoral office as having for its sole function the preaching of the Word was restricted by adding to it a disciplinary task in the church of Christ which was quite un-Lutheran. This was done by the inauguration of the church ban which was set up in the disciplinary regulations of 1539 adopted at Ziegenhain . . . . The legitimate state church movement and the sectarian side movement were united. In this act the last and decisive word was spoken as to the public character of the Hessian church society in so far as it undertook at all the education of its Christian subjects . . . . The suppressed Anabaptist revolution had its effect in the life of Hesse. It left a heritage therein which bore its characteristics" (Sohm, 163-66). (See also Rhenish Hesse.) HEGE.

E. Becker, "Zur Gesch. der Wiedertäufer in Oberhessen," Archiv f. hess. Gesch. u. Altertumskunde, Neue Folge X (Darmstadt, 1914); E. H. Correll, Das Schweizerische Täufermennonitentum (Tübingen, 1925); W. Diehl, Zur Geschichte der Konfirmation (Giessen, 1897); H. L. I. Heppe, Kirchengesch. beider Hessen (Marburg, 1876); K. W. H. Hochhuth, "Mittheilungen aus der protestantischen Secten-Geschichte in der Hessischen Kirche," Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie, 1858, 538-644; 1859, 167-234; 1860, 258-84; Max Lenz, Der Briefwechsel Landgraf Philipps mit Bucer (Leipzig, 1880); F. O. zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann (Haarlem, 1885); Rembert, Wiedertäufer; Walter Sohm, Territorium u. Reformation in der hessischen Geschichte 1526-1555 (Marburg, 1915); A. Trieb, Ibersheim am Rhein (Eppelsheim, 1911); P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); Franz, TA: Hessen; Chr. Hege, "Early Anabaptists in Hesse," MQR V (1931) 157-78; T. Sippell, "Confession of the Swiss Brethren in Hesse 1578," MQR XXIII (1949) 22-34; ML II, 294-303.

Hesse-Nassau, formerly a province of Prussia, area 6,504 sq. miles, pop. 2,688,922, which was formed in 1866 principally from the former duchy of Nassau, the landgraviate Hesse-Homburg, and the free city of Frankfurt a. M., as well as the electoral principality of Hesse-Cassel, administratively divided into the two government districts of Cassel and Wiesbaden. In the treatment of the Mennonites by the governments these regions have in the course of centuries shown great contrasts. In the 16th century the Anabaptists were systematically suppressed by the governments, but favored in the 18th and 19th. In both eras, in spite of their small numbers, they exerted a lasting influence on the development of the country; in the 16th century in the sphere of religion (see Hesse) and in the 18th, of economics.

In the 18th century the Mennonites became pioneers in a new type of agriculture. The Anabaptists of the 16th century had long since been driven out and suppressed; they were replaced in the 18th century by persecuted Swiss Mennonites, who found their way into Hesse-Nassau after temporary residence in Alsace and the Palatinate. The first immigrants settled in Nassau at the end of the 18th century; they were farmers from the vicinity of Heidelberg and Mannheim. Highly pleased, von Kruse, the provincial governor, who was himself a capable agriculturist, received the Mennonites, and in 1783 he leased his estate Mosbach near Wiesbaden to Valentin Dahlem (q.v.), who later became the preacher of the congregation at Wiesbaden. The estate soon became the first of the larger Mennonite model farms in Nassau-Usingen. The remaining families had received in lease from the government, farms in the districts of Wiesbaden and Idstein, where there was frequently much waste and other uncultivated land. Baron von Kruse planned systematically to turn this region, especially around Wiesbaden, where there were still hundreds of acres of waste land, into fertile land.

The achievements of the Mennonites in the culture of the soil in a short time are evident in the reports on the state of the country by the two ministers of state, von Marschall and von Jagern, to the Duke of Nassau. "Agriculture remains the chief source of German prosperity. If it were not of such high quality, how could our nation have endured so many hardships (i.e., the continental blockade). . . . Especially our Anabaptists have set a good example, neighbors from the former Lower Palatinate, and in competition with them progress has been made everywhere. The cultivation of clover has aided us. Uncultivated land grows less. Cattle-raising is thriving."

The Mennonites were now actually used as teachers of the peasants. About 1830 there were in the duchy of Nassau 14 Mennonite families with 80 souls and 17 Amish families with 130 souls (see table of distribution in ML II, 303).

From here several families settled in the electoral principality of Hesse-Cassel, the later Prussian district of Cassel. In the 1880's a member of this group, J. Schlabbach, was elected to the Prussian parliament.

At the close of the 18th century the Mennonites living around Wiesbaden organized a congregation, with Valentin Dahlem as their elder, but dissolved after his death in 1840. The Amish group met at various places for their religious services. About 1890 this congregation also became extinct.

During the 20th century a decline in numbers and a transfer of residence to the cities became evident. About 1870 the census enumeration shows 204 Mennonites in the province of Hesse-Nassau, that of 1925 only 135, of whom 72 lived in the cities of Frankfurt, Wiesbaden, and Cassel. According to the statistics of the census in Berlin, the Mennonites were distributed through the various areas (see table in ML II, 303).

At the end of 1926, in the south of the Fulda area near Neuhof a Bruderhof was formed, under the leadership of Eberhard Arnold, which represents the principles of the first Anabaptists, was interested in evangelization, and in the spirit of the Hutterian Brethren has carried out a community of goods, of life, and of work. In addition to a library of approximately 5,000 volumes there were here numerous copies from old court records, Rechenschaften, letters, and songs of the 16th century Anabaptists, especially of the Hutterian Brethren. The Eberhard Arnold-Verlag was located here. A further enterprise was the children's community of the Bruderhof (see Rhönbruderhof) with its own elementary and secondary school; it has also accepted a number of poor and neglected children. At the beginning of 1930 the brotherhood numbered 70 souls. The group was expelled from Germany in 1935.

A congregation was established in Frankfurt (q.v.) in 1948, after meetings had been held regularly since 1913. (For the small Amish settlement which existed near Marburg ca. 1780-1850, see Waldeck-Hesse Amish.) HEGE.

E. H. Correll, Das schweizerische Täufermennonitentum (Tübingen, 1925); A. Hunzinger, Das Religions-, Kirchen- und Schulwesen der Mennoniten (Speyer, 1830); RGG, 562, where the Hutterites are confused with the Quakers; C. Spielmann, "Die Mennoniten und ihre Bedeutung für die Kultur für Nassau," Annalen des Vereins für nassauische Altertumskunde und Geschichtsforschung XXVI (1894) 137-44 (reprinted in Menn. Bl., 1895, 19 ff.); ML II, 303 f.

Hesseling, Pieter Andriesz, usually called simply Pieter Andriesz, b. 1588 at Rotterdam, d. 1645 at Amsterdam, preacher of the Waterlander congregation at Amsterdam. A tailor by trade, and evidently the son of poor and non-Mennonite parents, he became acquainted with Hans de Ries, and was baptized by him; Hans de Ries must have taught him Latin.

While he was living in de Rijp he married Adriaantje Willemsdr of Amsterdam, Feb. 17, 1613. She was baptized in January 1612. She was an older sister of the wealthy grain dealer, Joost Willemsz Nieukerck (a brother-in-law of the poet Joost van den Vondel) and of Hester Willemsdr (the mother of the poet Reyer Anslo). In 1613 he obeyed the request of the Waterlander preachers to settle in Amsterdam.

Hesseling was at once chosen preacher and was ordained on Feb. 5, 1617, by Hans de Ries and Reinier Wybrantsz. On Dec. 30, 1615, he signed (with Reinier Wybrantsz and Nittert Obbesz) a book titled Vreede-schrift of eene Christelijke Vermaaning en Andwoord, 't welk van de Vereenigde Gemeente binnen Amsterdam geschreeven en aan Eenigen, die zonder genoegzaame oorzaake van de Gemeente afgeweeken (zijn) en eene bijzondere vergaderinge aangesteld hebben, over geleverd is, . . . (Amsterdam, 1616). This work deals especially with the ban in mixed marriages, the Incarnation, and the baptism of those who had been baptized as adults by the Reformed. They took a moderate position, as they also did in the second booklet, Noodwendige Verklaaringe, . . . (Amsterdam, 1616). Pieter Andriesz stepped into the fore especially in the dispute with Preacher Nittert Obbesz, who differed from the other preachers in his faith. After Nittert Obbesz had severely criticized a sermon by Pieter Andriesz in 1624, and at a meeting on Nov. 25, 1625, had called another sermon by Pieter Andriesz "stupid tricks," the latter induced the others to exclude Obbesz from communion. Then Jan Theunisz, who was on the side of Obbesz, created an offensive disturbance at the service conducted by Pieter Andriesz. In connection with this quarrel Pieter Andriesz, Reinier Wybrantsz, and Cornelis Claesz Anslo wrote Apologia ofte verantwoordinghe . . . tot onderrechtinghe van alle oprechte Broeders en Zusters sijnde in deselve Gemeente, diemen oock Waterlanders noemt (Hoorn, 1626). The quarrel took its course in public view through the 13 articles of peace set up by Nittert Obbesz.

About this time Pieter Andriesz must also have been involved in a quarrel about the confiscation of some wax. He did not carry out his intention to settle in Danzig. In 1628 he disputed with Pastor Abdias Widmarius at Uitgeest. In the report by Widmarius, written in detail, but not in favor of his opponent, he calls the latter the "bishop of the Mennonites of Amsterdam."

Pieter Andriesz was a cloth merchant and lived at the Nieuwendijk at Amsterdam. He was a "very peace-loving and pious preacher, in matters of minor import conciliatory, who, with all his meek gentleness, proper in a preacher, held fast to the sound doctrine of the truth and piety, although he had to endure much scorn and shame for it" (Maatschoen III, 85). His portrait, with a signature by Spinniker, engraved by J. Folkema, is found in Schijn-Maatschoen, III, 80. There is also a portrait of him made by Chr. van der Passe. H.F.W.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis der Mennoniten III (1745) 80 ff.; Memoriaal van Reynier Wybrandsz and Banboek in the Mennonite archives at Amsterdam; van Douwen, Socinianen en Doopsgezinden, 147 ff.; Blaupot t. C., I, 273; (Jan Theunisz), Teghenlooper Ontmoetende den Meester van den voorlooper (1626); Jan Theunisz, Een Vraghe van Nittert Obbesz (1627); Knuttel, Pamfletten-catalogus, No. 3711; N. W. Posthumus, De nationale organisatie der lakenkoopers (1927) 249 and 289; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, passim; H. F. Wijnman, "Jan Theunisz," in Jaarboek-Amstelodamum (1928) 78 ff.; idem, "Pieter Andriesz Hesseling" in N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 757 ff.; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1024; DB 1864, 49, 51, 62 ff.; 1907, 51, 55 ff.; ML II, 293.

Hesselink (Hesseling, Hesselingk), a Dutch Mennonite family. A branch of this family lived in the city of Groningen where they usually belonged to the (Groningen) Old Flemish Mennonite congregation: Willem Jacobsz Hesselink (d. 1720) was a preacher of this congregation 1694-1720, as was his son Jacob Willemsz Hesselingk (d. 1760) 1725-ca. 54; Willem Arendsz Hesselink (1707-68) also served this church as a preacher 1753-54, while many members of this family served as deacons, not only of the Old Flemish congregation, but also after this congregation had merged in 1809 with the Waterlander-Flemish congregation; e.g., Albert Hesseling, deacon 1782-1802, and Jan Hesselink 1826-30. Jacob Derks Hesselink (d. 1878) bequeathed a considerable amount of money to the congregation to build an old people's home, Hesselink-stichting.

From this Groningen branch also descended Gerrit Hesselink (q.v.) (1755-1811), Mennonite minister and professor. Other ministers bearing this name were Wybo Hesseling, b. at Groningen, d. 1778 at Leiden, who studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary 1762-67 and served the congregation of Leiden 1768-77. Matthijs Hesselink, b. at Groningen, was educated at the Seminary 1773-77 and served as minister at Huizen 1777-88, Emmerich 1788-96, Zutphen 1796-1802, Westzaandam "Oude Huys" 1802-5. In 1805 he resigned. In 1809 he made a plan to found a fund for pensioning the widows of Mennonite preachers.

Whether Pieter Andriesz Hesseling (q.v.) (1588-1645), preacher of the Waterlander congregation of Amsterdam, belonged to the same family, could not be ascertained. vdZ.

Hesselink, Gerrit, b. Oct. 23, 1755, at Groningen, d. Nov. 7, 1811, at Amsterdam. After securing the Ph.D. at the University of Groningen in 1778 he studied at the Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam, and served as preacher at Bolsward 1781-86. In 1786 he was appointed to a professorship at the Mennonite Seminary in Amsterdam, demonstrating in the office his great energy and many-sided learning. For a time (1797-98) he also taught the Remonstrant students. He also (1800) lectured in mathematics, logic, metaphysics, even physics. Cramer says (DB 1901, 18) that he was more of a natural scientist and philosopher than theologian. Of his many writings in various fields of science, we mention only Uitlegkundig woordenboek ter verheldering van de schriften des Nieuwen Verbonds (Amsterdam, 1790, 2nd ed. 1804). He was a keen thinker. As an exegete he used the grammatico-historical method. His free and independent judgment led him often on new paths. His love to the Mennonite brotherhood is evidenced by his attempts at unifying the congregations and his collaboration in the founding of the A.D.S. in 1811. He was a modest and helpful man, in spite of his unusual learning, and won the hearts of his students through his personal fellowship with them. vdZ.

B. Glasius, Godgeleerd Nederland II ('s-Hertogenbosch, 1853) 88-91; Biogr. Wb. III, 780-85; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 686 f.; II, Nos. 618, 2507; Naamlijst 1815, 47-49; DJ 1850, 122-44; DB 1872, 8 f.; 1901, 18; ML II, 293 f.

Hesston Mennonite Church (MC), located in Hesston, Harvey Co., Kan., a member of the South Central Conference, was organized on Sept. 9, 1910, with six families and several students then attending Hesston Academy. J. D. Charles served as the first pastor. The group first met in the assembly room of Green Gables, and later in the chapel hall of the administration building on the Hesston College campus. The following have served as pastors and bishops of the congregation: J. D. Charles, D. H. Bender, Noah Oyer, Milo Kauffman, Irvin Burkhart, M. A. Yoder, Jess A. Kauffman, John P. Duerksen, and Ivan Lind. The membership in 1956 was 270. A new church was dedicated in 1956. J.A.Ka.

Hesston College and Bible School (MC) developed from an appeal to the Kansas-Nebraska Conference in 1907 for a Mennonite (MC) school west of the Mississippi "in which Bible would be made a specialty." Many parents and church leaders of the early 1900's were ready to comply with the current trend toward general high-school attendance; they saw the need of fitting young people for positive living in church service and chosen vocations but they demanded the assurance that such training be received under Christian influences.

During its 44-year history the institution has held sacred this wish of its founders. The Bible department of 1909 began as a two-year course on a high-school level and has continuously readjusted itself to fit the developing curriculum. At present the college gives a B.R.E. course on a four-year college level. By an agreement between the two colleges, effective 1942-54, three years of the five-year Th.B. course offered at Goshen College Biblical Seminary could be given at Hesston for later transfer to Goshen.

The institution opened Sept. 22, 1909, on a site adjoining Hesston, Kan., an 80-acre donation by A. L. Hess. There were 21 students and four faculty members—D. H. Bender principal, J. D. Charles, J. B. Kanagy, Estella Cooprider—and one building, now a dormitory for high-school girls.

In 1914-17 the Administration Building was added; in 1946-47 Hess Memorial Hall, an Auditorium-Gymnasium; in 1948-52 the J. D. Charles Hall of Science and Arts; in 1954-56 a chapel-church—Bible department building. An accommodating cluster of practical arts shops, dormitories, offices, health unit, home economics workrooms, and faculty homes have grown up around these major buildings.

In 1909 the institution was an academy; during 1912-13 it was state accredited; in 1915-16 college work was first given. In 1918-27 four years of college were given (a total of 29 B.A. graduates); in 1925 a junior college organization was substituted and is now accredited by the Kansas Board of Education and the University of Kansas. The present curriculum offers the terminal courses in vocational education and the liberal arts program. In 1951-52 the high-school department was admitted into the North Central Association.

The first faculty had four members, one with an M.A. degree. In 1953-54 there are 27 members with 18 Master's degrees and three who have almost completed the work for Ph.D.'s (H.C.B.S. Handbook, 1953-54).

The institution has had three presidents: D. H. Bender, 1909-29; Milo Kauffman, 1932-51; Roy D. Roth, president-elect 1951-53, president 1953- . There have been seven deans: J. D. Charles, 1919-23; Noah Oyer, 1923-24; Edward Yoder, 1924-26, 1929-32; Paul Erb, acting dean 1926-29, dean 1933-41; Ivan Lind, 1941-49; Walter Oswald, 1949-53; Justus Holsinger, 1953- .

In pace with the steady growth of the institution the area of its influence has widened. In 1909 the school opened with 21 students and the first graduating class in 1911 had five members. In 1951-52, 520 students of all grades were enrolled and 102 were graduated. Although most of the students come from the states west of the Mississippi, an increasing number of high-school students come from Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Puerto Rico. Each year, too, there is a scattering of Canadians, Negroes, and foreign exchange students from Europe or Asia.

A 1952 check on alumni vocations gives evidence that the institution has kept faith with its founders. In church institutions and activities, Hesston College alumni are in front-line service. Ten are on the Goshen College instructional staff, 15 on the Hesston College faculty, three at Eastern Mennonite College, seven on the official staff at the La Junta Mennonite School of Nursing, and seven on the Mennonite Publishing House editorial staff. In the foreign and home mission outposts—in India, Africa, Japan, South America, Puerto Rico—in MCC services, and in pastorates and teaching positions in home congregations Hesston College alumni fill responsible positions.

The 1953-54 faculty signed this pledge to send to its constituency: "We, recognizing a divine call to serve on the Hesston College and Bible School faculty, dedicate all our energies to Christ and His Church to teach in harmony with, and nothing contrary to the doctrines of the Word and the historic principles of the Mennonite Church, to be active in leading students to deeper experiences with Christ so that they may respond to His call to fellowship and service, and to do our best to maintain a fervent spiritual and evangelistic atmosphere on the campus." (†ME I) M.M.

Hesston College and Bible School Bulletin, the official publication of Hesston College (formerly Academy) and Bible School, Hesston, Kan., published continuously since May 1915. It appeared quarterly 1915-30, bimonthly 1931-39, and monthly 1940-52. As the school's official publication, the Bulletin was devoted largely to reports and announcements, with alumni numbers added in 1940. In 1953 many features of the Bulletin were incorporated in a new publication, This Month at Your College. The Bulletin, now published at irregular intervals, includes such features as the annual catalog, annual report, and alumni numbers. The number of pages and size of page vary. N.P.S.

Hesston College Journal, first issue March 1914 as the Hesston Academy Journal, was first a 16-page monthly periodical. The name was changed to the Hesston College Journal in February 1919. It remained a 16-page monthly, with the exception of the year 1925 when it contained 24 pages, until the fall of 1942 when it was changed to a four-page biweekly newspaper.

During the early years of its publication the editorial staff and reporters consisted of both faculty and students. The first editors were M. D. Landis, 1914-15; J. D. Charles, 1915-17; Paul Erb, 1917-18; and Edward Yoder, 1918-23. The first student editor was J. D. Graber in 1923, the position being held by students ever since. W.E.O.

Hesta, Leonardus, a Dutch Mennonite minister b. May 9, 1856, d. April 14, 1901, at Haarlem. He studied at the universities of Utrecht and Amsterdam, became a ministerial candidate in 1881, and served the congregations of Rottevalle in Friesland 1880-84, Norden in East Friesland, Germany, 1884-89, Sneek in Friesland 1889-90, and Haarlem 1890 until his death. His contributions to his congregations and to the Mennonite brotherhood were varied and significant. He was a member of the executive board of the A.D.S. (Dutch General Conference) and treasurer of the Fund, later the Association in Behalf of Mennonite Orphans. For many years he was the active leader of the committee for the Mennonites in the Diaspora (see Verstrooiing). He was a collector of Mennonite writings and well versed in its history. In 1887 he became one of the first editors of the Zondagsbode (q.v.). He published a historical paper in the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen of 1892, and three German sermons: Die Christliche Hoffnung (Altona, 1887); Predigt über Phil. 1, 25 (Norden, 1888), and Gedächtnisrede über 2. Sam. 1, 26a (funeral sermon for J. Pol) (Norden, 1888). (DB 1901, 127 ff., where his portrait is found; Biogr. Wb. III, 787 f.; N.N.B.Wb. VII, 785-87; ML II, 306.) vdZ.

Heubuden (Heuboden), a common Mennonite village name which was transplanted from Prussia to Russia and America. The name appeared in the following settlements: Bergthal, Russia; East and West reserves, Man.; Jansen, Neb.; Cuauhtemoc, Mexico; and Menno, Paraguay. C.K.

Heubuden, a village in the former Free City of Danzig three miles northwest of Marienburg (1929 pop. 395) the seat of the former Mennonite congregation Heubuden-Marienburg, which was the largest rural congregation of East Germany. In 1929 the membership was 1,092 besides 358 children under 15. The members were mostly farmers and owned a total of over 25,000 acres. Most of them lived in the southern part of the Gross-Werder, a smaller part in Marienburg and east of the Nogat in former West Prussia, and several at Dirschau (Tczew) west of the Vistula on Polish territory. The ancestors were almost exclusively Dutch immigrants. In 1565 there were in the area of Heubuden some Mennonite renters who were making their payments to Koczelitzki. Until the middle of the 17th century the congregation apparently had no preacher and was served by the ministers of other congregations, especially Danzig. In 1662 Herrenhagen was settled. Mennonite settlers with hereditary leases settled on the former estates of the Teutonic Knights such as Leske, Diebau, Kaminke, Kalthof, Klein-Montau, Sandhof, Laase, and Schroop; similarly on lands owned by Marienburg in Dammfelde and Stadtfelde; they also purchased pieces of land in the freikölmisch villages or bought new estates on lands farther removed from the villages. So there were at a very early time Mennonites in Koczelitzki, Altenau, Klein-Lesewitz, Halbstadt, Tralau, Lichtenau, Simonsdorf, Gnojau, Kunzendorf, Altmünsterberg, Mielenz, Schönau, and Wernersdorf.

The manager of the estate belonging to the Marienburg castle about 1584 settled a number of immigrants from Brabant and Schottland on the estate lands. Among them there were some Mennonites. Upon the complaints of the citizens and the command of Sigismund III, these were denied all civil rights; but the manager in spite of manifold objections from the citizens settled craftsmen and tradesmen here again and again. Especially after 1672 the lowlands around the castle were settled by foreign, particularly Mennonite, tavernkeepers, Höcker, and craftsmen. In Kalthof the manager rented out lands owned by the city and permitted Mennonite potters and merchants to set up business there; thus in 1767 a Mennonite established a vinegar brewery. In the Werder gristmills were built, the oldest ones in 1747 at Koczelitzki and Leske. In 1748 the city of Marienburg leased the castle lowlands, and the Mennonites were now given the rights of citizenship.

Frequently the delegates at the various Landtags protested against toleration of the Mennonites (Mannhardt). As late as 1700 a resolution was drawn up forbidding Mennonite meetings in the Vorschloss (a street in Marienburg) and in the castle warehouses.

The Mennonite worship services were not public. In the 17th century they likely sang little at their meetings; but they had hymnbooks such as van Mander's Gulden Harpe. In 1724 and 1752 Dutch hymnbooks were printed at Amsterdam for the Prussian congregations. After the beginning of the 18th century there was singing at their meetings, the singing conducted by a chorister (q.v.). For their meetings they chose "either in the wintertime large rooms on the farms or in the summer good barns and large cow stables which were carefully cleaned and decorated with greenery. The preacher, when he preaches, sits on a high-backed chair and the hearers sit round about him" (Hartwich). "The preacher delivered his long address of two hours in the Dutch language seated and without an outline before him." It was the custom that each sermon was delivered on three Sundays. Already in 1671 Georg Hansen wrote that the youth could read German better than Dutch; nevertheless the Dutch language remained in use until 1750-60. In those years a beginning was made in preaching in German from notes and in a standing position. In 1767 German hymnbooks were introduced; nevertheless soon after the beginning of the 18th century Lobwasser's Deutsche Psalmen were used, which were incorporated into the first editions of the German Mennonite hymnal.

In the wars between Sweden and Poland the Mennonites "suffered severely under many war disturbances and extortion of money by Swedes, Russians, Saxons, and Poles, but always preserved their freedom of conscience and religion as far as was permitted in Catholic countries" (Donner). On July 18, 1626, the Marienburg castle surrendered to the Swedes. In 1656 Marienburg was besieged by the Swedes, in 1659 by the Poles. In 1698 began the quartering of soldiers in the third Swedish-Polish War, which continued in this region until 1715. The people of Heubuden had to deliver horses, grain, and other produce, as well as money payments. Marienburg and the Werder were occupied and plundered in turn by Swedish, Polish, Russian, and Saxon troops. In 1765 the people of Heubuden protested against oppressive Russian quartering which was illegally imposed on them.

Breaks in the dikes of the Vistula and Nogat caused great floods—1622 and 1652 at Wernersdorf, 1717 at Kalthof, 1786 at Gross-Montau, 1816 at Wernersdorf, 1839 at Kalthof, 1845 at Schönau, and the last and greatest on March 28, 1855, at Gross-Montau. In 1620 a plague raged in Marienburg, in 1624 in the Klein-Werder, and in 1710 in the Gross-Werder.

In 1638 the Jesuits had acquired the clerical lands in Koczelitzki. On Dec. 12, 1701, the Jesuit priest registered a complaint to the royal judge in Marienburg that the people living at Heubuden were refusing to pay the tithe, asserting that they had never paid it and besides paid conscientiously the fees for baptism, marriage, and burial, and in every respect submitted to the community law. On July 7, 1755, there was again a complaint, since according to the rescript of Aug. 2, on April 3, 1699, the Mennonites were to pay the pastoral fees for the liberty to baptize, marry, and bury, and especially they were to present within a week from the birth of a child the permission for baptism. They were ordered to pay the fees of one florin for permission to baptize and for the right to marry and bury, as had been customary from olden times. "But with regard to the forbidden burial of unbaptized children among the baptized in the Mennonite cemetery, a special place beside the regular one where baptized Mennonites are buried shall be assigned to them and shall be fenced off by a fence." According to Hartwich, they buried their dead quietly in the Catholic cemeteries about 1700; they had to pay a high price for the lots to the Catholic priest. Not until 1775 were they released from payment of fees to the Catholic priests. The cemetery beside the church at Heubuden is mentioned for the first time in 1755. It was plotted and kept up by Mennonite owners of the land in the surrounding villages. In 1905 the congregation took over the burial place.

Until 1728 the congregation was served by the elders of Danzig and the Werder; by the Danzig elder demonstrably since 1694, while Elder Dirk Siemens of the Werder served the Elbing congregation. In 1728 Jacob Dyck was chosen as the first elder in Heubuden and confirmed in the office by Isaak de Veer of Danzig. He died in 1748. As early as 1741 upon the wish of the 81-year-old Elder Dyck, another elder, Gerhard von Bergen, had been chosen. In addition to the two elders there were now six preachers and one or two deacons in service. After the death of Elder von Bergen in 1771, Cornelius Regier was chosen as elder. He was succeeded in 1795 by Peter Braun. Preachers to be chosen were first called as deacons. From the ranks of the deacons the preachers were then chosen in the second stage of the election, and from among the preachers the elder was chosen. The right to vote was possessed by all male members above 21. According to the constitution adopted when the congregation became incorporated, preachers were to be chosen from among the membership.

By 1744 the congregation was so large "that they had preaching at two places on Sunday." For the members living further removed from Heubuden, services were held in the homes of members in Marienburg (Sandhof), Wernersdorf, Klein Lichtenau and Lesewitz in rotation every fourth Sunday and on the first of the holiday days. In 1774 when 14 Mennonite families had been settled by King Frederick II in Czattkau near Dirschau, these families joined the Heubuden congregation in 1778. Among them, as in the other outside locations, services were regularly held, so that there were now services every Sunday at two places, every fourth Sunday at three places, and on the first holiday day at six places. After 1700 the Flemish Mennonites living among the Frisians in the vicinity of Stuhm and Marienwerder became a subsidiary congregation, Jerczewo, united with the Heubuden congregation (see Pastwa). This congregation had its own preachers and deacons but was served by the elder of the Heubuden congregation and had a common treasury with Heubuden. In 1854 the congregation built a church in Pastwa. This sub-congregation with 81 members and over 20 children united with the Frisian congregation of Tragheimerweide in 1899.

A Privilegium granted by the Bishop of Culm on June 17, 1768, gave the Heubuden congregation and three other Mennonite congregations the right to build a church of wood 40 ells long, 22 ells wide, with walls 7 ells high, with a thatched roof and a chimney towering over the roof. The building was begun on July 19, 1768, but after considerable progress had already been made, it was forbidden by the bishop and after renewed efforts and expenses released again on Nov. 2 (see Fürstenwerder). When the work was halted, members of the congregation took individual parts of the church home and worked on them, so that rapid progress was made when the building was renewed and services were held in it at Christmas time. In 1853 the church was lengthened 14 feet and jacked up two feet and a masonry foundation laid. In its final stage it seated an audience of 800.

The congregation owned two houses each containing four apartments known as "hospitals" for poor members. They are listed for the first time in 1773 in the Prussian land records. An area of 6½ acres of cultivated land belonged to the "hospitals."

The Heubuden congregation, like those of Danzig, Gross-Werder, and Elbing, belonged to the Old Flemish branch (Danzig Old Flemish, q.v.). In the 18th century or perhaps at the end of the 17th, these congregations formed a Flemish conference with seven congregations in Holland, namely, Amsterdam, Haarlem, Rotterdam, Blokzijl, Zuidveen, Giethoorn Northside, and Oldemarkt. The Dutch language was used for church services in Heubuden until about 1770. The oldest confession of faith, as far as is known, was that of Georg Hansen, published in 1667 in the Dutch language. In 1730 it was signed by the elders and preachers of the Danzig, Heubuden, Gross-Werder, and Elbing congregations, then sent to the Dutch congregations in the conference, where it was copied and returned. They declared, "Although we have been parted for more than 100 years, nevertheless our confession has remained unchanged." This confession was printed in German in 1768 and used in the congregation until 1861. Beginning in 1862, the congregation used the confession of 20 articles worked out by Gerhard Wiebe of Elbing-Ellerwald in 1792. On Feb. 14, 1897, the congregation decided to adopt the confession worked out together by the Flemish and Frisian congregations.

For the instruction of baptismal candidates the congregation used the (Elbing) catechism compiled in 1778 by the elders Heinrich Donner of Orlofferfelde and Gerhard Wiebe of Elbing-Ellerwald, in 1929 in its ninth almost unchanged edition, in 1935 in a 10th (shortened) edition, there were, however, as early as 1700 instruction books in the form of questions and answers.

In the union of the Flemish congregations of 1730 one of the stipulations was that no one should be accepted in the brotherhood without baptism unless he had already been baptized in one of these united congregations. Members of a Frisian congregation were therefore rebaptized before being received into the Heubuden congregation. This custom was maintained until 1770, when the person to be received was admitted by simply answering some questions before the congregation if he had already been baptized. After 1819, an admission into the congregation was simply announced to the congregation. If anyone from another creed under the Polish government wished to unite with the Heubuden congregation, he had to travel to the Netherlands, be baptized there, and return as a Mennonite. After 1744 the latter could also be baptized in Königsberg, since there was a Mennonite elder there. Under the Prussian government the Mennonites were free to take in members of other confessions with the government's permission. This was later made almost impossible by the edict of July 30, 1789, according to which a person transferring from the state church no longer could retain all the privileges of citizenship (kantonfrei); however, in 1824 and 1828 concessions including all the rights of the (kantonfrei) Mennonites were still made. In 1910 in a meeting of the congregation, it was decided to admit persons of other Christian churches at their request without baptism.

Marriage with members of other churches was not permitted, and until 1775 marriage with Frisian Mennonites only when the latter joined the congregation. In the time of the strictest church discipline, a broken engagement was dealt with so severely "that not only was marriage forbidden to both, but the one breaking the engagement was excommunicated and not received again until the other died." A widower was also not permitted to marry the sister of his wife; if it happened, he was excommunicated as long as the marriage continued. This rule was dropped in 1826. Remarriage of divorced persons was not permitted. In the 1920's, however, several instances occurred in which the innocent member remarried.

Footwashing was practiced until about 1750, and especially "when an elder or teacher was called or sent into another congregation by God, so that his feet are washed when he arrived; also when a member of one congregation enters another congregation to remain."

Church discipline was carefully administered. In several meetings at the end of the 18th century and the beginning of the 19th, it was decided "to see to it that no member betray the smallest article of our faith unpunished." In cases of lesser disobedience, the one concerned had to appear before the church officers, in more serious instances, before the brotherhood; if there was no improvement, or if there were grievous offences, excommunication followed. A list of excommunicated members kept by the elder in 1805-99 still existed in 1929. After that, excommunication was not practiced.

"It was not customary for us to keep a systematic church book, and not necessary because the Polish government never demanded birth or death lists or birth, marriage, or death certificates. Each elder listed only as much as he needed for his own system." In 1775 the congregations were ordered by the Marienburg government "to draw up a list of those who were born in our congregation, had died, were married, or had attended communion." The church possessed a list of those baptized since 1771, church books on births, marriages, and deaths since Dec. 1, 1771, and a list of participants in communion since 1851. In the summer of 1799 they received instructions from the government to report all births, marriages, and deaths to the pastor of the state church. This regulation remained in effect until the introduction of the civil register in 1874.

"Since all of Polish Prussia was occupied by the King of Prussia on Dec. 13, 1772, and a day of homage was to be observed in Marienburg on Dec. 27 following, Peter Regier called the West Prussian congregations to a meeting at Tralauerfeld, to which the Flemish as well as the Frisian teachers came." Until then the officers of the Frisian and Flemish congregations had usually held separate meetings. Only at special occasions, as, for example, the granting of the Privilegiums of the Polish kings and bishops, did they appear together, because this was always very expensive. From this time on there were regular meetings for both areas, often several in the year. Because of the central location of the Heubuden Church most of the meetings were held in its territory. Of the two meetings in 1802 and the eight in 1813, six were held in the Heubuden Church.

On Aug. 22, 1774, the first taxes were collected by Preacher Hans Klaassen in Heubuden from all East and West Prussian congregations. Of the total of 13,495 souls, 1,831 were from Heubuden without Jerczewo. 503 of the 2,170 parcels (Hufen) of land were from Heubuden, and of the total sum of 30,624 guilders, 5,343 were from Heubuden. In the village of Heubuden, 67 Mennonite homes occupied 63 2/3 parcels of land.

In 1788, 17 families left the congregation with the first emigrants to Russia. No record was kept of further emigrations. According to the treasurer's books, there were frequent contributions for emigrants to Russia, especially in 1803, 1819, 1858, and 1869. On March 14, 1794, Elder Cornelius Regier and the preacher (Lehrer) Cornelius Warkentin traveled to South Russia to organize and establish the newly formed congregations there. Regier died on May 30 in South Russia. In 1795 the Heubuden congregation chose Peter Braun as elder. After his death, on June 11, 1803, Abraham Regier was chosen as elder on Jan. 6, 1804. After he had faithfully served the congregation for over 47 years, he died on Aug. 8, 1851. On May 20, 1852, Gerhard Penner was chosen as elder, serving until his emigration to America on May 30, 1877. Wilhelm Fast served from Oct. 28, 1877, to his death on Sept. 6, 1903. He was followed by Bernhard Klaassen from Jan. 31, 1904, to March 8, 1927. Heinrich Dyck served 1924-35, and Bruno Ewert 1935-45. Gustav Reimer served as deacon 1919-45.

In 1807 began for the congregation the difficult times of the French occupation. Heubuden village had to raise 22,249 florins from June 6, 1807, to June 5, 1809, for the French occupation forces; in addition the individual families were heavily burdened by quartering French and Russian troops. For the fund of 187,439 florins for the release of Mennonites from duty in the army, Heubuden had to pay 28,582 florins according to the assessment that took place in the church. With such a burden, there were but few funds for the congregation itself.

The contributions for congregational needs were raised according to land acreage owned by the members; those who lived in towns were taxed according to their wealth and the size of their businesses, in proportion to the charge on the land. In 1794, the assessment per Hufe was 4 florins, in 1796, 6 florins, in 1820, 3 florins, in 1852, 2 talers per Hufe. After 1873 congregational funds were raised by assessments through taxes on land, buildings, trade, and income. In business affairs all male members who made financial contributions had the right to vote; independent women who contributed to the congregation could be represented by a male member who had a right to vote.

The great religious and intellectual movement of the early 19th century had also affected wide circles of the congregation. As early as 1817 connections were established with the Bible Society in Berlin, and contributions were sent in. In 1822 contributions were received for foreign missions. In 1823 the English Baptist missionary Angas (q.v.) visited the West Prussian Mennonite congregations in order to gain their participation in the work of foreign missions; they sent 635 talers to London. On Nov. 7, 1826, the Christian school at Rodlofferhuben (Kalthof), founded by members of the congregations of Heubuden and Danzig, was dedicated by Elder Jakob van der Smissen of Danzig. Here Mennonite boys were trained in a positive Christian atmosphere. The first teacher, Lange, was very competent. The school was transferred to Bröskerfelde (q.v.) in 1836. In the school at Rodlofferhuben, soon after its opening, monthly missionary meetings were instituted which were kept up in the homes of the members after the transfer of the school. The Missionary Association formed by Mennonites and some Protestants celebrated its first anniversary in the school in 1830. From 1837 to 1884 these celebrations were held at the homes of members in the barns or granaries, and from 1885 to 1891 in the Protestant chapel in Marienburg. Participation was active. These festivities for a long time furnished a gathering point for many friends of mission work from near and far. In addition there existed an association for home missions (a Bible, Tract, and Abstinence Association). The contributions were contributed to the Protestant mission until 1854, when they were sent to the Dutch Mennonite missions in Java and Sumatra. In 1892 the first missionary festival was celebrated in the church of Heubuden. From now on missionary activity was applied to the Dutch Mennonite Mission, for which the congregation had instituted collections ever since 1880. The monthly missionary meetings were held from 1895 to 1923 in the church, and after 1924 with very great participation again in private homes. Besides the collections the members of the congregation furnished the salary for two native missionary helpers in Sumatra.

In 1836 a Christian Reading Circle was organized in Heubuden by Jacob Regehr together with Mennonite friends and two Protestant teachers. Originally mostly missionary periodicals were read, but soon books were procured, chiefly entertaining literature on a Christian basis. By 1929 there were 1,100 volumes on hand in addition to a number of bound periodicals on family, missions, and Mennonite subjects. In 1886 there were 36 members in this association; in 1929, 52 members. In 1905 a library of Mennonite publications was established in the congregation.

Since the middle of the 19th century singing was cultivated by means of special choirs. In January 1865 it was decided to compile a new hymnal. The old hymnal (Geistreiches Gesangbuch, 1780), now 100 years old, had become quite voluminous through several appendices in nine editions. A committee was chosen to select the hymns; after completion, the new songbook (Gesangbuch für Mennoniten-Gemeinden, 1869) was accepted into use on the first advent Sunday of 1869. In 1890 the first organ was installed.

In the first decades of the 19th century, the members of the congregation who held pieces of land in perpetual lease (emphyteutic) had very great difficulty in maintaining them. According to the legal stipulations of 1811 to 1816 the emphyteuse was to be turned into private property, but the authorities did not allow the Mennonites who were exempt from military service to acquire this land and even threatened to withdraw the pieces of land from them if they would not assume military duties. After much negotiation, therefore, the king extended the lease contracts by the Order of Cabinet of Feb. 13, 1825, first until 1845, and on Dec. 3, 1838, finally to the end of 1864. Meanwhile on the basis of a new law of land purchase clearance the Mennonites succeeded in acquiring ownership of these emphyteutic pieces of land. The clearance fee expired in Heubuden in 1912 after 56 years.

The cancellation of release from military service through the law of Nov. 9, 1857, called forth a serious crisis in the West Prussian congregations, which, especially in the Heubuden congregation, lasted a long time and became very divisive. The elder, preachers, and a section of the congregation rejected the acceptance of military duty in any form in the hope that the military law could still be changed. The largest part of the congregation, however, was ready to assume noncombatant military service in the form designated in the Order of Cabinet of March 3, 1868. Thus a deep, painful gash was torn into the congregation; from autumn 1874 to summer 1876, no communion services were held. In 1876 there were only five baptismal candidates, the others having been baptized in other congregations. On May 30, 1877, Elder Gerhard Penner (q.v.) emigrated to Nebraska; the preachers and all but two of the deacons, the choristers and a part of the congregation left the church and began to hold services in private homes. The rest of the congregation, under the leadership of Elder Claass Friesen of Rosenort, chose preachers and deacons on Oct. 28, 1877, and on that date decided that the members of the congregation should be permitted to fulfill their military duties according to the stipulation of the order of cabinet. As elder they chose Wilhelm Fast on Oct. 25, 1878. From 1876 to 1892, 55 families and 29 individuals from the congregation moved to Kansas and Nebraska. Therewith the emigration which had lasted over 100 years came to its conclusion.

In consequence of the opening of railway bridges at Marienburg and Dirschau in 1857 and still more by means of the building of paved highways the church could be easily reached at any time even by members who lived rather far away. Upon their wish services were discontinued in Czattkau in 1897, in Wernersdorf and Lesewitz in 1907, in Klein-Lichtenau in 1911. For the members living in and around Marienburg a meetinghouse with a seating capacity of 350 was built in Marienburg in 1906-7, and dedicated on June 23, 1907. In 1919 there were 333 members of the congregation living here in 122 households.

During World War I 257 members were drafted. On the battlefield 25 brethren lost their lives, in whose memory a monument was erected in the cemetery in 1920. During the war and after, several other brethren died in consequence of military service. As a consequence of the treaty of Versailles the members of the congregation were living in three different countries (Free State Danzig, Germany, and Poland) with compulsory passport regulations at the borders and several kinds of money. Thereby communication was made very difficult. Members from Germany could not come to Poland without an expensive visa, and vice versa; nevertheless the feeling of belonging together did not diminish, but was rather strengthened.

The centuries old conflict with the Protestant State Church parishes on account of the tax requirements levied on Mennonite property owners was revived in 1920. A decision by the jurists of the University of Königsberg, arrived at in 1929 on a scientific basis, put an end to any such obligation.

The congregation was a member of the Conference of the West Prussian Mennonite Congregations, and since 1913 of the Vereinigung der Mennoniten Gemeinden im Deutschen Reich. It was incorporated in 1904. In the churches at Heubuden and Marienburg worship services were held (in 1929) on every Sunday and holiday. Communion was observed twice a year, and baptism on the second holiday of Pentecost at Heubuden. The congregation was served (in 1929) by an elder, six preachers, and three deacons. Financial and legal matters were managed by a committee of 12 district leaders with 6-year terms.

The number of souls in the congregation in the course of the century has been subject to great variations. The figures were as follows:

Year	Souls	Births	Baptisms	Marriages	Deaths
1774	1831	64	32	15	43
1789	1441	56	29	13	40
1804	1643	67	30	24	29
1846	1225	41	29	10	29
1864	1309	62	21	14	30
1881	1142	37	35	15	20
1910	1520	53	41	8	14
1929	1450	16	36	14	18
1941	1500

Under Hitler the congregation experienced great changes under the influence of the current political and social philosophy. However, only eight families left the church. During World War II 200 to 250 young men were in service—they received a monthly bulletin from the congregation. Of this number about 100 died as war casualties and about as many were taken prisoner or were missing at the end of the war. When the Russian army occupied the community in early 1945 nearly all the men left at home and many of the girls and women were sent into forced labor in Siberia. Some later returned and reached West Germany. Numerous members of the congregation fled to Denmark during the approach of the Red army, and from there have gone to West Germany, Uruguay, and Canada. The last elder of the congregation, Bruno Ewert (1935-45), as well as the deacon, Gustav Reimer, Sr., emigrated to Uruguay in 1950. The church building has been turned into a Catholic church.

The Heubuden Church had a branch (with meetinghouse) in Marienburg (q.v.). It had two homes for the aged and two cemeteries. Before World War II the total Mennonite population of the congregation was around 1,500, of whom 360 were children. (†ME I.) A.D.

W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863); A. Hartwich, Landesbeschreibung der drei Werder (Königsberg, 1722); H. Nottarp, Die Mennoniten in den Marienburger Werdern, eine kirchenrechtliche Untersuchung (Halle, 1929); idem, Ergänzungsgutachten (Königsberg, 1931); Reiswitz and Wadzeck, Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Mennonitengemeinden in Europa und Amerika (Berlin, 1821); Bruno Ewert, "Four Centuries of Prussian Mennonites," Menn. Life III (April 1948) 10-18; idem, "From Danzig to Denmark," Menn. Life I (January 1946) 37; Gem.-Kal., 1941, 143; Ernst Crous, "Vom Pietismus bei den altpreussischen Mennoniten . . . ," Menn. Gesch.-Bl., 1954; ML II, 306-12.

Heukelom, van, a Mennonite family, since the end of the 17th century found at Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland, and since the 18th century also in Amsterdam. Their ancestor Hendrik van Heukelom, of Goch, Germany, in 1615 left the Roman Catholic Church and joined the Mennonite congregation of Goch. He was married, first to Janneken Hol, then to Grietje Kops of a well-known Mennonite family living in the Lower Rhine district (see Kops family). Until the 19th century the family name of van Heukelom was very common in the Goch congregation. At least two great-grandchildren of Hendrik van Heukelom, Matthys and Johannes, moved from Goch to Leiden. His son, Matthijs van Heukelom, b. 1663 at Goch, d. 1725 at Leiden, married to Trijntje Floh of Crefeld, was a deacon at Leiden 1692-94, and 1697-1704, and 1714-18, and then the manager of "De Hoeksteen," a home for the aged. He was a merchant and woolen weaver, as were many of his descendants, nearly all of whom also served the church as deacons or as managers of the Hoeksteen home. One member of this family, Frans van Heukelom (1738-87), married to Elisabeth Hartsen, moved from Leiden to Amsterdam; he and his descendants were merchants and bankers.

Many of the van Heukeloms were prominent in the leadership of the Dutch Mennonite Church. Walraven van Heukelom (1775-1853) of Amsterdam was treasurer of the A.D.S. (General Dutch Mennonite Conference), as was his cousin Hendrik Pieter van Heukelom (b. 1868), during the years 1907-41. Jean Charles van Heukelom (1840-1912) of Amsterdam was treasurer of the North Holland Mennonite Widow's Fund and the Verhogingsfonds (q.v.), and Lodewijk Casper van Heukelom (1847-1920) of Amsterdam, director of the Netherlands Bank, was also treasurer of the Verhogingsfonds. vdZ.

Ned. Patriciaat IV (1913) 1741-81; XXVII (1941) 140-57; DJ 1850, 143, 179; DB 1898, 112; 1907, 145; 1912, 220.

Heuning, Roelof, b. at Westzaan, d. Jan. 25, 1801, at Groningen, a Dutch Mennonite preacher who served the congregations of Edam 1760-71, and Groningen (Old Flemish) 1771-1804. He was elder and moderator (Commissaris) of the Groningen Old Flemish Conference from 1775 until his death. In this function he corresponded with some congregations in Prussia, like Kleinsee (q.v.), which had been struck in 1781 by a severe crop failure and was given financial support by the Groningen Old Flemish Societeit. Roelof Heuning or Honig(h) may have been a relative of the Honig (q.v.) family found in the Dutch Zaan district. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1730 ff.; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 135; DB 1890, 111.

Heusdens, F. C., a Reformed missionary, who after having been active on the Indonesian island of Celebes, was in 1940 appointed as an administrator of the leper colony at Donorodjo (q.v.) on the island of Java. This colony was founded and managed by the Dutch Mennonite Mission Society. In March 1942, during World War II, when the Japanese captured and occupied the Dutch East Indies, a crowd of fanatical Mohammedans attacked the leper camp of Donorodjo, and Heusdens was stoned to death. vdZ.

Verslagen van het Doopsgezind Zendingsveld op Java, 1940-47, 2, 12, 14; Jaarverslag Doopsgez. Zendingsvereniging 1945-49, 4.

Heuven, Arent van, a silk merchant at Utrecht, in the Netherlands, was 1646-74 a preacher of the Utrecht (q.v.) Mennonite congregation. Being an adherent of the moderate views of Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), van Heuven and his copreachers Goris van Aldendorp, Johan Andries (van Aken), and Willem van Maurik (q.v.) in 1658 came into conflict with Robert van Hoogveldt (q.v.), also a preacher of the congregation, who was conservative and an antagonist of Galenus. These three preachers published Een belydenisse aengaende de voornaemste Leer-stucken des Christelycken Godtsdienst (Utrecht, 1659) and Wijdt-loopiger Verhael van de beklaeglijcke Onlusten, onder de Vlaemsche Doopsgezinden binnen Utrecht in den jaere 1661 (against Robert van Hoogveldt) (Utrecht, 1662). On a charge of Socinianism (q.v.) van Heuven and the three other preachers were suspended from their office by the city government of Utrecht on Aug. 12, 1661. They were allowed to preach again on Aug. 4, 1664, after they had declared that they agreed with the published confession of the Mennonites. In the meanwhile a part of the congregation had begun to meet separately and this division lasted until 1675. A new conflict with the Reformed and the city government arose in 1666. Now van Maurik and van Heuven refused to sign a confession drawn up by the Reformed ministers, but finally the city government was content with a statement made by van Maurik, van Heuven, and Aldendorp. Particulars about van Heuven were not available. His years of birth and death are unknown. (Biogr. Wb. III, 806-7; DB 1916, 145-95 passim.) vdZ.

Heydanus, Caspar: see Heidanus, Caspar.

Heyden, Caspar van der: see Heidanus, Caspar.

Heyden, Jan van der, b. 1637 at Gorinchem, Dutch province of South Holland, d. March 28, 1712, at Amsterdam, was baptized in the Flemish church "bij 't Lam" at Amsterdam in 1656 and served this congregation three periods as a deacon (1675-80, 1686-91, 1696-1701).

Jan van der Heyden is renowned for his technical inventions: in 1669 he was appointed director of the service of street-lighting and organized a lighting system in Amsterdam that was unique in Europe. He is still more famous for his invention of a fire-engine in 1677. From 1672, in which year he and his brother Nicolaas were appointed directors of fire-extinguishing appliances, they had worked on this invention. Soon after Jan van der Heyden founded a fire-engine factory.

Jan van der Heyden is also known as a painter; and a number of pictures, mostly of buildings, still bear evidence of his skill and artistry. His son Goris van der Heyden was also a deacon of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation, 1701-6. Jan's granddaughter (daughter of his son Jan) Jacoba (1705-31) was married to the well-known Mennonite preacher Joannes Deknatel (q.v.). vdZ.

Bericht Wegens de nieuw-geinventeerde en geoctroyeerde Slang-brandspuiten. Uitgevonden door Jan en Nicolaes van der Heyden (Amsterdam, 1677); Amstelodamum Jaarboek XI, 1913, 29-118 f.; Amsterdamsche Stadtsgezichten van Jan van der Heyden, with introduction by C. J. 't Hooft (Amsterdam, 1912); W. v. Bode, Die Meister der Holländischen und Flämischen Malerschulen (Leipzig, 1951) 365-69, 373-78.

Heylbronn, Hendrik van, b. Feb. 4, 1697, at Heilbronn, Germany, d. Dec. 4, 1782, at Almelo, Dutch province of Overijssel, about whose youth nothing is known. His official name was Johann Heinrich Gramm von Heilbronn. In the spring of 1729 he came from Goch, where he was baptized on his faith, to Almelo, where he married Geessien Warnaars in 1729, and in 1730 became a member of the Mennonite congregation. In Almelo he was a physician. On June 21, 1742, he received his medical doctor's degree from the University of Groningen. Besides his care for his patients he found time to give expression to his passion, the making of clocks. Six clocks, made by van Heylbronn, all very beautiful and giving evidence of great skill, are still in existence. One is found in the Mennonite church of Almelo. His son Peter (1730-76) was a clockmaker by trade. vdZ.

Verslagen en Meded. Ver. v. Overijsselsch Regt en Gesch. LIX, second series XXV (Deventer, 1943) 104-8, with pictures of clocks made by Hendrik van Heylbronn.

Heylken Baillaerts, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed at Antwerp, Belgium, on Feb. 17, 1573, together with four others, because he was rebaptized and had attended the meetings of the Mennonites. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 105 f., 174; XIV, 90 f., No. 1012.) vdZ.

Heyman Jacops van Ouderamstel was appointed sheriff of Amsterdam in February 1534, succeeding Jan Hubrechts, who had been a friend of the Anabaptists. He was ordered to adopt rigorous measures against the Anabaptists, but being unwilling to punish heretics and having been reproved on that account by the imperial stadholder, he soon withdrew from the office (October 1534). In 1535, being a burgomaster of the city, he protected the Anabaptists as much as he could. He is said to have been an Anabaptist himself, but this is an error. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 187; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 93, 134, 177.) vdZ.

Heynderickgen Aert Kielezdochter of Harderwijk, a martyr, was bound in a sack and drowned at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, on Jan. 17, 1539, together with four other women. She likely was a follower of David Joris (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 749.) vdZ.

Heyndrick Pietersz, a grain merchant and active in early Dutch Anabaptism (Mellink, Wederdopers, 133, 264-65), is likely identical with Hendrik Koel (q.v.). vdZ.

Heyndri(c)k van Dale, an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned at Antwerp, Belgium, on April 3, 1562, because he "persisted in his heresy of rebaptism." He was unmarried. He had been baptized by Joachim de Suyckerbacker (q.v.). Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, who calls him simply Hendrik, gives Aug. 15, 1561, as the date of the death of a group of seven martyrs which included Hendrik. This is an error. The song mentioned by van Braght in which Hendrik and other martyrs are celebrated and beginning, "Lieve broeders, wij groeten u met sanghen" (Dear Brethren, we greet you with hymns), is found in the Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562 and is included by Wackernagel in Lieder der . . . Reformierten. (Mart. Mir. D 288, E 655; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 132, 140; XIV, 30 f., No. 353.) vdZ.

Heyne Walingsz, an Anabaptist martyr, arrested at "Krommenieërdijk in Waterlandt," i.e., near Krommenie, Dutch province of North Holland, was put to death very likely in 1534 (not 1542 as van Braght states). (Mart. Mir. D 62, E 464; DB 1917, 170.) vdZ.

Heynes, Richt, an Anabaptist martyr: see Richt.

Heyningen, Gerardus van, b. Jan. 11, 1716, at Amsterdam, d. Jan. 3, 1801, at Amsterdam, studied at the University at Utrecht, where he obtained his Ph.D. degree in 1736, then studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, was preacher of the Mennonite congregations of Utrecht 1739-58 and Amsterdam "bij 't Lam" 1758-1801. His colleague, H. Tichelaar, on Feb. 15, 1801, delivered his funeral sermon on Rev. 14:13b, Lijkrede op G. v. Heyningen (Amsterdam, 1801, with portrait). Van Heyningen was a very active and influential man in the Amsterdam congregation. He tried to promote the establishment of more old people's homes. He had some typical ideas: when the church board discussed projects such as the establishment of a school for the poor children of the Amsterdam congregation, such as was founded in Haarlem, van Heyningen opposed it and the school never came into being. On May 19, 1796, he wrote a letter to the church board announcing that henceforth no more marriages should be performed in the meetinghouse.

Van Heyningen was married to Maria de Heger of Utrecht. He stemmed from a prominent and well-to-do Dutch Mennonite family of Amsterdam, where they have been living since the early 17th century, while other members lived at Utrecht. Gerardus van Heyningen was the son of Gerrit van Heyningen (1688-1749) and Elisabeth de Clercq. Besides his doctor's thesis De Mente Humana he published a funeral sermon on the death of his colleague and uncle, Bartholomeus van Leuvenigh (q.v.): Lykrede (Amsterdam, 1760). vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 754, 848, 963 f.; Naamlijst 1802, 59; DB 1868, 97; 1898, 20, 30 f.; Biogr. Wb. IV, 12 f.

Heynrick Cornelisz, an otherwise unknown Anabaptist martyr, arrested at Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland, on the night of Jan. 24, 1535, and beheaded on Feb. 3, 4, or 5 of that year at Leiden. Together with a number of other martyrs Heynrick died singing. He was probably an adherent of Münsterite principles, though this fact is not evident from the sentence. (Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 156, Notes 1 and 3.) vdZ.

Heynrick Willemsz (Willemken van Stellinckwerf), a Dutch revolutionary Anabaptist, follower of Jan van Batenburg (q.v.), was beheaded at Utrecht in the Netherlands on July 21, 1544. (Mellink, Wederdopers, see Index.) vdZ.

Heynrick (Heyndric) Willemsz, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Hazerswoude, Dutch province of South Holland, was burned at the stake at The Hague on April 25, 1534. He belonged to a group of revolutionary Anabaptists, whose execution was dated by van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 34, E 441) in 1532. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 744, 745; DB 1917, 121, No. 139; Mellink, Wederdopers, 190.

Heyst, van, a Dutch Mennonite family, whose ancestor Michiel van Heyst, b. 1556 at Antwerp, d. after 1627 in Amsterdam, emigrated because of persecution from Antwerp to the Netherlands, first to Haarlem (about 1595) and in 1610 to Amsterdam. His son was Pieter van Heyst, b. 1598 at Haarlem, d. 1647 at Amsterdam, where he was a broker. David van Heyst (q.v.), who was a great-grandson of Michiel, was a Mennonite preacher. The son of this David, also David van Heyst (1713-84), founded the former Banking House Van Heyst en Zoon at Amsterdam. In the 18th century this family was related with well-known Amsterdam Mennonite families such as Leeuw, van Leuvenigh, Willink, and Blaauw. (Ned. Patriciaat XXXVI, 1950, 188-93.) vdZ.

Heyst, David van, a Mennonite minister, b. 1675 at Amsterdam, d. May 23, 1746, at Maarsen, married to Rebecca Leeuw and through this marriage became a man of means. He was a preacher of the Amsterdam Zonist congregation 1701-16. A conflict with his colleague Harmen Reynskes van Overwijk, who accused van Heyst of sympathizing with the ideas of Spinoza, caused the dismissal of both preachers. Van Heyst accepted a call to Rotterdam in September 1718, but here too he soon experienced some difficulty, being charged by his deacon Jan Suderman of heterodoxy. Van Heyst was called to account for his Spinozism by the burgomaster of Rotterdam and had to present a confession of his faith to the Reformed ministers. This confession was approved in 1719. He seems to have given some offense to his congregation by his sympathy with the Moravian Brethren (Hernhutters) and the Collegiants (q.v.); especially his holding meetings on each Monday evening for young Mennonite women who were Collegiants was severely criticized by a large part of the congregation. In 1726 van Heyst resigned. The following books by van Heyst were published: Onzydig onderzoek uit de H. Schriften van de wyduitgestrekte verlossing door Christus' Rantsoendood (Haarlem, n.d.); Onderwys nopens de voornaamste leerstellingen van den Christelyken Godsdienst (Amsterdam, 1753); Verzaameling van eenige uitgeleezene Predikatiën (Amsterdam, 1759).

At the end of his life his sympathy seems to have turned to the Reformed Church; his grandson David van Heyst was a Reformed minister. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 713, 927; II, 2, No. 458 h; Biogr. Wb. IV, 22 f.; N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 769.) vdZ.

Hickory County, Missouri, in the central part of the state and approximately 100 miles southeast of Kansas City, had three Mennonite churches in the last half of the 19th century. The Amish Mennonite settlement had its beginning with the arrival of Joseph Nafziger sometime before 1856, the year in which the Daniel Raber family from Lee Co., Iowa, arrived and located near several Amish families who had preceded them. The list of Hickory County Mennonite family names includes Christner, Klopfenstein, Gerber, Miller, Yoder, Kauffman, Stucky, Nafziger, Raber, Hochstettler, Neuenschwander, Rufenacht, Lehman, Diener, Schindler, Oesch, Rich, Syler, Aker, Roth, Stoll, Gilliom, Bahler, and Gerster.

In 1867 the Herald of Truth reported that there were 15 Mennonite families in Hickory County but that the community did not have a minister. In December 1870 when Preacher Joseph Stucky (q.v.) from Illinois visited the congregation Carl F. Kuntz was ordained bishop of the church in Hickory County. After worshiping in homes for many years, the congregation built a church about 4½ miles southwest of Wheatland on land donated by Christian Gerber and therefore known as Gerber's Church, although Gerber had by that time become affiliated with the General Conference Mennonite group in the county.

The Egli Amish (Defenseless Mennonites) also became established in the county, winning some of the Amish Mennonites to their fellowship. Their meetinghouse was built earlier than the Gerber Church and was located approximately one mile north of the place where the Gerber Church was later built. The two groups were settled in the Wheatland prairie, with their farms between points east of Elkton on the south and Quincy to the north.

The General Conference Mennonites had a small congregation in the south part of the county, known as the Elkton (q.v.) Church. The few families had services in homes and schoolhouses and for a time were served by Minister Peter S. Lehman, formerly from Berne, Ind. After he left the county, ministers were supplied by the church in Morgan County.

When the settlement was established, land was in open range and comparatively cheap. Because both the northern and southern armies swept through the county in the Civil War days, the Amish settlers were impoverished. The ending of the open range and the scarcity of good soil beyond the limits of the Wheatland prairie brought economic hardships to the settlement that resulted in its extinction. Only a few families remained in the county beyond the first decade of the 20th century. At least as early as 1882 Mennonite families began to leave the settlement for Johnson Co. (q.v.), Mo. The H. P. Krehbiel census of 1911 lists only one Mennonite church in the county, the Defenseless Church of nine members with Christian Zehr of Quincy serving as minister. M.G.

Hiebert (Huebert, Hubert, Hübert), a Prussian Mennonite name first recorded in the Danzig church record in 1679, was found in the congregations of Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Heubuden, and Königsberg. From Prussia the name was transplanted to Russia. Outstanding bearers in Russia were Heinrich Hübert (q.v.), the first elder of the Mennonite Brethren Church, and Johann Hübert (q.v.), a missionary to Java. From Russia the name was transplanted to America, where the following have been prominent in the work of the M.B. Church: John K. Hiebert (1865-1933), Hillsboro, Kan., pastor at Ebenfeld M.B. church; N. N. Hiebert (1874-), Blaine, Wash., pastor; P. C. Hiebert (1878-), Hillsboro, long-time (1920-53) chairman of the MCC and sometime president of Tabor College; C. N. Hiebert (1881-), Hillsboro, evangelist; G. B. Huebert (1887-), Reedley, Cal., pastor; P. N. Hiebert (1890-), Bakersfield, Cal., pastor; J. C. Hiebert (1904-), missionary to India; G. D. Huebert (1906-), Hepburn, Sask., pastor and Bible teacher; D. Edmund Hiebert (1910-), teacher in the M.B. Biblical Seminary, Fresno, Cal.; Waldo Hiebert, Hillsboro, pastor; and Lando Hiebert, minister and teacher at Tabor College, Hillsboro. The Hiebert family has been primarily an M.B. family in North America. In 1955 the only Hiebert serving as a minister in any other Mennonite body was J. N. Hiebert, E.M.B. pastor at Dalmeny, Sask. C.K.

Gustav E. Reimer, Die Familiennamen der Westpreussischen Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1940).

Hiebert, John K. (1865-1933), minister of the Mennonite Brethren Church, was born at Einlage, Chortitza Mennonite settlement, South Russia, Sept. 8, 1865, the third child of Cornelius and Katharina Wiens Hiebert. In 1876 the family emigrated to America and settled on a farm southeast of Hillsboro, Kan. Here John grew up and received his education in the Gnadenau school. Through extensive reading he later broadened his education. After his conversion he joined the Ebenfeld M.B. Church through baptism April 16, 1880, and became an active member. On Dec. 15, 1891, he married Sarah Eitzen and established a farm home in the same locality. To them six children were born. The four sons entered the medical profession.

Hiebert was deeply interested in Christian work and very active in church life. In 1904 the church elected him to the ministry and three years later ordained him. In December 1915 the pastoral leadership was entrusted to him, a position he held until shortly before his death.

The M.B. Church found in him a strong advocate of educational advance. In the founding of Tabor College he took a prominent part and became the first chairman of the board of directors of the school, serving 20 years on the board. Hiebert was also a supporter of the Bethesda Hospital, Goessel, Kan., and served on its board of directors for some time. In the M.B. Conference he was an active worker making his most noted contribution in connection with the Publication Committee, on which he served as secretary for 30 years. He died at Hillsboro, Jan. 9, 1933, and was buried at the Ebenfeld M.B. Cemetery. J.H.L.

Hierschau, a Mennonite village of the Molotschna settlement in South Russia, on the left bank of the Begim-Tchokrak, originally planned as a model village, whence its name. Plantings of fruit trees surrounded the regularly spaced farm buildings with lush green and yielded a considerable annual income. On the opposite side the gardens and the charming grove planted by the settlers were nearly destroyed in the Revolution and suffered from the drought in 1921-22.

Hierschau was founded in 1848 by settlers from the older Molotschna villages. Area, apportionment of land, number of farms, etc., are shown in the following table:

	Acres	Farms	Units (Höfe)	Population
1848	5,216	30 with 174 acres	30	201 Mennonites
1915	6,234	30 with 174 acres	62	427 Mennonites
1926	5,297	22 with 87 acres	62	373 Mennonites

Each full farm was given about an acre of additional land in the original plan to be used as a building site for a half farm; all of these were occupied by the sons of the owners by 1870, so that Hierschau had 30 full farms, 30 half farms, and a school plot, in addition to the original central thoroughfare, which had now also been built up, making a total of 62 farms. The school was built in 1852.

Under the rigid control of the Ohrloff Agricultural Association, the village was very symmetrically built. The houses were all made of burned tile. Besides the very productive soil, Hierschau before the Revolution also owned clay-pits which contributed to the prosperity of the village. The fate of Hierschau under the Soviets and during World War II was the common one of the Molotschna (q.v.) villages. (ML II, 312.) D.H.E.

Hiestand (Histand, Heistand, Heystandt), a Mennonite family represented chiefly in the Franconia and Ontario conferences (MC). The progenitor of the American Hiestands was one Abraham Hiestand, a member of the Reformed Church in Switzerland, who was born about 1703, and as a young man emigrated to Pennsylvania. In eastern Pennsylvania he and his wife united with the Mennonite Church. A deacon in the Lancaster Conference (MC) bore the name Hiestand, as did Preacher Jacob Histand (1791-1877) of the Franconia Conference (MC), and his well-known grandson, Bishop A. O. Histand (1869-1943) of Doylestown, Pa. Paul W. Histand, a nephew of the latter, is pastor of the Trevose Heights Mission. J.C.W.

High German Mennonites, or Upper Germans, in the Dutch sources called Hoogduitsche Doopsgezinden or simply Hoogduitschers, sometimes also called Overlanders, were a group of Mennonites originally found in South Germany and along the Rhine. This was the group to which the elders Zylis (q.v.) and Lemke (q.v.) belonged who disagreed with Menno Simons concerning shunning. The conferences held at Strasbourg in 1556 and 1559 were also meetings of the High Germans. Many of these High Germans made contacts with the Swiss Mennonites, especially in South Germany, and soon became one body with them. A number of High Germans, usually merchants, moved to the Netherlands, and were found in cities like Haarlem, Amsterdam, and Leiden. During the troubles when the Dutch Mennonites were divided into several branches "High German" became one of the party names, indicating a rather moderate group, which was averse to severity in banning and shunning. In 1591 a number of German congregations agreed with some Dutch congregations of Young Frisians on several points. The result of this agreement is the Concept of Cologne (q.v.). Henceforth in the Netherlands High German congregations began to unite with other groups, first with Young or Soft Frisians (q.v.), about 1600 also with the Waterlanders. So the Bevredigde Broederschap (group of churches who had made peace) came into being. For a while some troubles in Haarlem and Amsterdam (see Afgedeelde Broederschap) disturbed the peace, and though the union of the High Germans with the Waterlanders was criticized by a large number of congregations in the Rhine province of Germany who held meetings at Gladbach in 1608 and Geyn near Cologne in 1616 to protest against unification with the Waterlanders, the unification proceeded. After the United Congregation of High Germans and Frisians at Amsterdam had presented a confession in 1630 (Confession of Jan Cents), serious negotiations were made between this congregation and the Amsterdam Flemish congregation bij 't Lam which led to a union of both groups in 1639. From then on the High Germans as a special group disappeared in the Netherlands. vdZ.

Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 322-28, 458, 461; II, 71-74, 89-94, 193-94, 197-99; BRN VII, passim; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 525, 532, 536, 542, 544, 546, 555, 556, 600-2, 605-6, 628; II, Nos. 1193-1203, 1379, II, 2, No. 865b; DB 1894, 36-38; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 140-43; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 169.

In Germany, at Friedrichstadt a.d. Eider (q.v.), the High Germans may have had at their best about 100 members; about them there is less information than about the other groups; the strongest group, the Frisians, numbered about 400 members. Since the increase from the region around the Lower Rhine benefited the Flemish and Waterlanders who had united early, nothing was left for the High German element (with the exception of the Palatine families which strengthened them about five years before the general union of 1698) but the lowland plains, from the uncertainties from which people sought refuge in the privileged free city. Names like Clausen, Peters, and Jacobs have a High German stamp. Since they were least in numbers, union was more essential to them; they felt most closely drawn to the Flemish, whose preachers at a conference held in Hamburg, May 3, 1639, had for reasons of geography broken the previous close ties with the Flemish party in Hamburg and Glückstadt, and allied themselves more closely with their brethren in the adjacent region of Eiderstedt; from 1653 on there was a "Hoochduytse en flaemse vereinigde Doopsgezinden gemeynte." In Eiderstedt (q.v.), where the High Germans were represented especially in Koldenbüttel and Tetenbüll by farmers, they lost members by transfer; according to the charter they were not permitted to organize a congregation of their own, hence the Mennonites growing up there tended more and more to give up their connections with Friedrichstadt, especially because at this place the Dutch language was retained too long (1828) for divine services. In the country there was therefore increasing conformity to the immediate surroundings.

In Hamburg there was from the beginning a preponderance of Flemish; through transfer to them the Frisian congregation had dissolved by 1671; the High German group suffered the same lot, for they—like those of Friedrichstadt—were not permitted to have their own meetinghouse, but were allowed to have meetings like Bible study groups in private homes; the only preacher named for their group was Johann Peltz(er), who lived in Hamburg and died early in 1660; his widow became a Lutheran, was baptized, and married a Lutheran. (ML II, 320.) R.Do.

High Schools. The term "high school" is a technical one in American education. In the history of American secondary education, Latin schools were slowly replaced by English grammar schools, which came to be known as academies. In New England the academy movement began with the establishment of the Phillip's Academies in 1778 and 1781. By 1833, 14 states had established 497 such schools. The academy movement attained its greatest influence in the period 1830-70. The academy generally was a democratic school, with a broad curriculum, supported by fees and gifts, operated as a boarding school, open to boys and girls, and established by groups of private citizens. The academies were slowly replaced by the "free academies," supported by taxes, and by high schools. In 1821 Boston established an English classical school which three years later came to be known as the "English High School" and which introduced the specific use of the term which has become universal for this type of school in the United States. The essential features of the high schools were support through public taxation and control through publicly elected officials. In time the name was adopted for some Canadian secondary schools, although the more common name is Collegiate Institute.

Strictly speaking Mennonite parochial secondary schools are therefore not high schools, although the term has been used in a number of instances as shown below: Eden Bible and High School (q.v.); Alberta Mennonite High School (q.v.); Bethany Christian High School (q.v.). The term "academy" has been generally used for Mennonite secondary schools (see Secondary Education). M.G.

Highland Bethel Mennonite Church, Ft. Wayne, Ind., is a member of the Evangelical Mennonite Conference. In 1937 a Sunday school was started in a new addition of the city and several months later an auditorium was erected. The first regular service was held in it on Dec. 19, 1937. The church was organized on Nov. 19, 1944, with 21 charter members. By 1948 the membership had increased to 35. Pastors who have served the congregation are Milo Rediger, Paul Rupp, and M. L. Klopfenstein. M.L.K.

Highland Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, organized in 1937, is located south of DeRidder, Beauregard Parish, La. The church had a membership of 105 and a Sunday-school enrollment of 140 in 1955. Weekly Sunday-school and worship services are held, with P. W. Decker as minister in charge, assisted by Chester Johnson. Al.S.

Hijum, the name of a Mennonite congregation in the province of Friesland. Leenaert Bouwens baptized seven persons here. The first mention of a Hijum congregation is found in the resolutions of the Frisian Mennonite brotherhood in 1713; it consisted then of 15 unsupported members. The name Hijum is also found in the Naamlijst of 1784, but no longer in 1786. Blaupot ten Cate and Wartena assume that the Hijum congregation was at that time merged with Hallum (q.v.). But in all probability Hijum and Hallum were variant names of the same congregation, the latter being adopted when in 1779 it was decided to build the new church one mile north in Hallum. Hence the present church at Hallum owns the land (6 acres) which had been the property of the Hijum church. There is no further information on the church at Hijum. S.D.A.W.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 88 f., 244, 306; Naamlijst 1731-84; DB 1890, 103; 1910, 124 f., 139-41; ML II, 385.

Hikkes (Heckens, Hiekens), Amme, was an elder of the Old Flemish congregation at Midwolde in Groningen, Netherlands. Although little is known concerning him, he was without doubt an important and influential person. He attended various meetings at which disputes were settled or important resolutions passed, as the meetings of Nov. 15, 1685, and April 11, 1686, at Knijpe in Friesland, where Age Jouckes had to clear himself of the suspicion of unorthodoxy. His presence was also requested at Groningen, June 2, 1685, to form a resolution concerning the brethren who had participated in the meetings of the Collegiants. (DB 1870, 111, 114; 1879, 5, 13; 1883, 75; ML III, 312.) vdZ.

Hilarius, a minister of the Lutheran Church at Worms, Germany, was won over to the Anabaptist views in January 1527, together with his colleague Jakob Kautz. Both had to answer to the city council for their opinions. Kautz later became a convinced Anabaptist, but about Hilarius no further information is available. vdZ.

Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908) 34 f.

Hildebrand (Hildebrandt, Hilbrandt), a Mennonite name of Prussian background originally found in the congregations Rosenort, Fürstenwerder, Tiegenhagen, and Ladekopp. From here the name was transplanted to Russia and America. In Russia Peter Hildebrandt (q.v.) was an outstanding pioneer minister, Kornelius Hildebrandt (q.v.) was a pioneer industrialist, and J. J. Hildebrand, now Winnipeg, has written a number of books on the Mennonites. There are also some Hildebrands among the Mennonites (MC) of Virginia. (Reimer, Familiennamen.) C.K.

Hildebrand, Jakob Peter (d. 1867), son of Peter Hildebrand (q.v.), living on the island of Chortitza in the Dniepr in South Russia, was ordained as a minister of the Kronsweide Mennonite Church (q.v.) in 1825 and as elder in 1826. During his long term of service (1825-67) during the difficult pioneering years of the settlement, he devoted himself to the development of the congregation. He was a lay preacher, making his living by farming. J.H.E.

Hildebrand Mennonite Church (MC), located in Augusta Co., Va., ½ mile west of Madrid and six miles north of Waynesboro, took its name from the Hildebrand family who were large landowners in that vicinity and leaders in the church—Jacob Hildebrand serving as minister and bishop for a number of years. Jacob R. Hildebrand was a preacher. The church, likely the first Mennonite church in the Southern (Augusta County) District of the Virginia Conference, was a small log meetinghouse, probably built in 1828. A larger frame church was built across the road from the first in 1876. It is thought that this was the first church in Virginia to be formally dedicated. In 1955 the church had a membership of 56, with Joseph H. Weaver of Waynesboro as pastor. H.A.B.

Hildebrandt, Kornelius (1833-1920), a Mennonite manufacturer of the Ukraine, South Russia, was born on Jan. 21, 1833, on the island of Chortitza (q.v.) in the Chortitza Mennonite settlement. He worked for many years as a poor clockmaker. With the rise of industry in the settlement, however, the business flourished, and was established as a firm in 1878. In 1903 he transferred the management to his children; it then had the title, "K. Hildebrandts Erben und Priess." The partner Priess (1863-1922) was Hildebrandt's son-in-law; he was the actual founder and for many years the manager of the firm, which had a capital stock of 500,000 rubles. The factory consisted of two branches, one located in the Chortitza settlement and the other established in 1892 in Schönwiese. At the beginning of World War I the Chortitza branch employed about 80 workers, and the Schönwiese branch 100, with an annual output valued at 500,000 rubles. The firm was engaged almost exclusively in the manufacture of farm machinery, with reapers and drills as a specialty, which were sold as far away as Siberia. (ML II, 313.) D.H.E.

Hildebrandt, Peter, a Frisian Mennonite preacher (Kronsweide congregation), living on the island of Chortitza in the Dniepr, South Russia, son-in-law of the deputy Jakob Höppner (q.v.), was in the first train of immigrants from Danzig, and was one of the six men who went ahead of the party to Dubrovka with Höppner to make preparations for the group. His impressions were published in 1888 by A. Neufeld in Erste Auswanderung der Menniten aus dem Danziger Gebiet nach Südrussland. As an eyewitness and participant in the historical events of the settlement on the Dniepr in 1789 his accounts are important source material for the student of Mennonite history. He relates in the introduction to his book how he came to put down in writing the events of those years: "Several persons expressed the wish to have the most exact information possible concerning the initial steps and the further course of the emigration from Danzig to Russia. . . . I myself also wanted to record it as a memorial for my descendants. . . ." Thus P. Hildebrandt became the first historiographer of the Mennonites of South Russia. (ML II, 313.) D.H.E.

Hilfsverein of the Evangelical Mennonite Church (Kleine Gemeinde) was established in 1929, to create an agency to make it possible to borrow money within the church at a low rate of interest. A committee of three was appointed to manage the fund. An assessment of ½ per cent on net and clear property was levied on the members (payment was voluntary, however) to establish security for the fund. The first loan to the fund was deposited on Feb. 20, 1929, at the rate of 2 per cent per annum. In 1955 the interest was increased to 3 per cent. Though the amount is not large, it has been a great help to many beginners. At present every district of this church east of the Red River has its own committee member. D.P.R.

Hill City Civilian Public Service Camp No. 57 was located 16 miles northwest of Hill City, S.D. Under the Bureau of Reclamation, the camp had as its chief project the construction of Deerfield Dam for the purpose of furnishing a plentiful water supply for Rapid City and for furnishing a supplemental water supply for 12,000 acres of irrigated land in the valley downstream from Rapid City. Camp No. 57, operated by the Mennonite Central Committee, was approved Sept. 23, 1942, and was closed Feb. 28, 1946. It had a capacity of 200 men. During 41 months the conscientious objectors assigned to the camp spent 50,726 man-hours on the dam and when the camp was closed the project was 97 per cent complete. Deerfield Dam is in one sense a "Monument to Peace." In 1946 the men of the camp published a 60-page book presenting in pictures and text the history of CPS No. 57, under the title The Voice of Peace. M.G.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, 1949) 162-68.

Hillcrest Home for the Aged, Harrison, Ark., is owned by the county but operated by the Mission Interests Committee of the Old Order Amish Mennonite Church. The seventeen-bed home was opened Aug. 3, 1953. Eli Helmuth of Hutchinson, Kan., has been the administrator of the home since its opening, and his wife the dietitian. In addition two young men (usually on I-W assignment) and four young women complete the present staff. All workers are drawn from the Old Order Amish Mennonite Church. Operating costs are more than met by the fees paid by the guests. A large waiting list has made expansion imperative. H.Gr.

Hillcrest United Missionary Church, located in Springfield, Clark Co., Ohio, was organized about 1925. In 1954 the membership was 17, with Lawrence Frey serving as pastor. The name of the congregation was changed in June 1952 from Hillcrest to Neosha Ave. Ha.E.B.

Hille Feicken, an Anabaptist woman, native of Sneek, Dutch province of Friesland and baptized there, married to the Anabaptist Psalmus of Utrecht, enticed by the prophecies of Münster (q.v.) as the New Zion left Sneek in 1534 to join the "chosen" at Münster. On June 16, 1534, early in the morning she left the city of Münster with the intention—like Judith and Holophernes (in the Apocryphal book of Judith) of seducing and killing the Catholic bishop of Münster, who had laid siege to the city. Of course this enterprise signally failed. Hille was taken prisoner by the bishop's troops, tried, tortured, and put to death. Her confession, published by Kerssenbroich, Cornelius, and Niesert, contains important material concerning the revolutionary Anabaptist movement. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 41-43, 60, 243.) vdZ.

Hillegont Petersdochter of Amsterdam, where she lived in the house "De Engel," had lodged the Anabaptist bishop of Amsterdam, Jacob van Campen (q.v.). Because of this fact she was sentenced on June 1, 1535, "to be hanged and strangled before her own door, as an example to others." Hillegont was not a member of the Anabaptist congregation. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 110 f.) vdZ.

Hilleken Jacobs and Anneken, two Anabaptist martyrs, were executed shortly after Sept. 17, 1571, likely at Breda, Dutch province of North Brabant. Hilleken Jacobs, 25 years of age, unmarried, and Anneken, 58 years, wife of Pieter Pietersz, also a Mennonite who, however, escaped, were arrested on Aug. 29, 1571, at Klundert, Dutch province of North Brabant, where they lived. Both were cruelly tortured. Van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 603, E 929), who lists a number of Mennonites arrested while holding a meeting at Nieuwvart (Klundert) near Breda in 1572 (this must be 1571) and put to death at Breda, does not name these two martyrs. (DB 1912, 38, 41, 42.) vdZ.

Hiller, Matthias, a furrier of St. Gall, was baptized in Strasbourg by Jakob Gross (q.v.), a member of the Strasbourg Anabaptist group, probably left the city with Michael Sattler (q.v.), with whom he suffered a martyr's death at Rottenburg a. N. on May 21, 1527. He rejected the proffered pardon, saying that if he had seven heads he would offer them all for the sake of Christ. Neff.

T. W. Röhrich, "Zur Gesch. der strassburgischen Wiedertäufer," Ztscht für die hist. Theol., 1860, 15 and 34; G. Bossert, Das Blutgericht in Rottenburg am Neckar (Barmen, 1891); ML II, 315.

Hillsboro, a town (pop. 2,200) in Marion Co., Kan., founded in 1879 and named after John Gillispie Hill. The town, predominantly Mennonite, is located on the northern edge of the largest Kansas Mennonite settlement, stretching south beyond Newton. In Hillsboro and the immediate surrounding area there are nine Mennonite congregations: First Mennonite Church (GCM), Hillsboro; Mennonite Brethren Church, Hillsboro; Brudertal Mennonite Church (GCM) (first to be organized); Johannestal Mennonite Church (GCM); Ebenfeld Mennonite Brethren Church; Steinreich Mennonite Brethren Church; Gnadenau Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church; Alexanderfeld Church of God in Christ Mennonite; and Springfeld Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church. The Mennonites settling in and around Hillsboro came from various parts of the Molotschna settlement, Russia (General Conference, Mennonite Brethren, and Krimmer Mennonite Brethren groups), from Poland (Johannestal), and a few from Prussia (Brudertal). In addition to the Mennonite churches there are the following: Zion Evangelical Lutheran, Evangelical Church, and Seventh-Day Adventist. Hillsboro is located on the branch of the Santa Fe Railway between Marion and McPherson. It has become more and more the headquarters of the Mennonite Brethren with the Mennonite Brethren Publishing House (q.v.), Tabor College (q.v.), Mennonite Brethren Board of Missions (q.v.), and the Mennonite Brethren General Conference Headquarters. The present Mennonite community hospital was founded by the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren as Salem Hospital (q.v.). There is also the Salem Home for the Aged (q.v.).

In addition to a number of parochial schools in existence in and around Hillsboro in the early days, H. D. Penner founded here the Preparatory School in 1897 which was private till 1913 and operated by the Mennonite churches from 1913 to 1937 under J. H. Epp (see Hillsboro Preparatory School). Among Hillsboro's 140 businesses the Central Kansas Co-operative Creamery and the Buller Manufacturing Company are outstanding. C.K.

Marion W. Kliewer, "Mennonite Community Settlement," Menn. Life, January 1954, 14 ff.; A Guide to Hillsboro, Kansas (Hillsboro, 1940).

Hillsboro (Kan.) First Mennonite Church (GCM), a member of the Western District Conference, was organized in 1884 by J. S. Hirschler, who served as minister 23 years. He was succeeded by H. D. Penner, who served for 16 years. J. H. Epp became the elder in 1914, holding this position for 26 years. H. T. Unruh served as pastor 1942-52, J. W. Nickel 1952-54, and Elbert Koontz 1955- . The congregation, beginning with 39 charter members, in 1955 had a membership of 356. The church building was constructed in 1886, and since then has been enlarged and remodeled four times, the last being completed in 1950 with a seating capacity of 500. H.T.U.

Hillsboro Journal, founded in 1903 as the Hillsboro Vorwärts, had J. G. Ewert as first editor. In 1939 the name was changed to Hillsboro Journal. It was a general newspaper. The size of the paper was 15 x 22 in. It was published weekly, generally with eight pages, containing general news and reports from the different settlements mostly rural and of Mennonite interest. It was owned and published by the M.B. Publishing House, Hillsboro, Kan., though it was not an official organ of that constituency. The English language was generally used in the paper but some German reports found room on its pages. The last editor was Peter H. Berg. The Hillsboro Journal was sold to T. G. Hiebert late in 1952 and was merged with the Hillsboro Star early in 1953. P.H.B.

Hillsboro Mennonite Brethren Church in Hillsboro, Marion Co., Kan., with a baptized membership of 827 in 1954, is a member of the Southern District. Organized April 25, 1881, near Hillsboro with 34 charter members as the "Johannestal Church of French Creek," the congregation met in rural homes until 1882, when a school building was purchased in Hillsboro. The first church, built about 1890, was replaced by a larger church in 1910, which was remodeled and enlarged in 1926 to a seating capacity of 700, with a large Sunday-school building 145 x 40 ft., with an increase of auditorium space of 300 seats. The ancestral background of the membership is mostly Dutch coming from Russia and Poland in 1874-84. One third of the congregation is rural and two thirds urban in a town of 2,000. Originally the Low German dialect was used in homes and German in services, but in the last 15 years both homes and services have changed to the English language. The older people's Sunday-school classes still use German and occasionally it is used in services. Pastors serving the church were John Harms, John F. Harms, P. P. Rempel, P. E. Nickel, J. W. Vogt, and Waldo D. Hiebert. The congregation has two young people's organizations, two women's organizations, church choir, two male choruses, a Sunday school, and a Bible school for the entire congregation meeting on Wednesday. The church practices footwashing, has an electronic organ, and several pianos. W.D.H.

Hillsboro Preparatory School (Vorbereitungsschule), Kansas (1897-1936), was founded as a private school by H. D. Penner in 1897 with a two-year curriculum to prepare students for elementary teaching and college. In 1913 an association was organized, sponsored by the First Mennonite Church, Johannesthal Mennonite Church, and Bruderthal Mennonite Church of Hillsboro, which made itself responsible for the school. Occasionally members from other communities were represented on the board. J. H. Epp served as principal 1913-27. Other teachers were C. J. Epp, H. C. Voth, Gustav Frey, L. H. Linscheid, J. P. Suderman, W. F. Unruh, and Abraham Albrecht.

In 1927 the name on the catalog was given as Bible Academy, although the contents remained unchanged. The two-year course was designed to give a basis in Bible study, German language and literature, church and Mennonite history and related subjects. Gradually more English was introduced. By 1936 the interest in the parochial school had declined and most parents sent their children to the local high school. The school was closed during that year (see Preparatory Schools). C.K.

H. P. Peters, History and Development of Education Among the Mennonites of Kansas (Hillsboro, 1925) 150 ff.; Catalogs of Hillsboro Preparatory School 1897-1935.

Hillsboro Vereinsschule: see Hillsboro Preparatory School.

Hillsdale County (Mich.) Old Order Amish Mennonite Community. A small group of Old Order Amish settled near Jerome, Hillsdale Co., Mich., in the spring of 1945. This group included the families of Levi, Albert, and Peter Stoll, and William J. Schrock. In 1955 the resident minister was Amos Stoll, and Albert Graber of Middlebury, Ind., had bishop oversight. The 1949 membership was 39. A.St.

Hilversum, a town (1953 pop. 91,967, with 1,093 Mennonites) in the Dutch province of North Holland, the seat of a Mennonite congregation, formerly at Huizen (see this article, where its history is found until 1878). In 1878 a new meetinghouse was built in Hilversum (dedicated June 30 by Pastor A. Loosjes of Amsterdam) and the congregation was named Huizen-Hilversum, since 1945 being called Hilversum. The congregation rapidly increased: membership 40 in 1878; 225 in 1897; 500 in 1926; 600 in 1940; 780 in 1955. The meetinghouse was completely rebuilt and greatly enlarged in 1940. In 1908 the members of Hilversum living at Baarn (q.v.) and Bussum (q.v.) founded Mennonite circles, which have since grown into independent congregations.

Preachers of the congregation since it moved its seat from Huizen to Hilversum were (until 1885 vacant) I. H. Boeke 1885-93, J. S. Pekema 1894-1904, F. Dijkema 1905-7, P. Oosterbaan 1907-38, A. L. Broer since 1938. Activities are: Sunday school for children, young members' group, ladies' circle, church choir, mission committee. (DB 1879, 140 f.; 1908, 206; DJ 1943, 44; ML II, 364.) P.O., vdZ.

Hilzin, Elisabeth, an Anabaptist martyr who languished in the monastery prison of Othenbach in Zürich in 1639 until death released her. Van Braght adds that the authorities extorted a fine of 500 guilders from her surviving husband. (Mart. Mir. D 813, E 1112; ML II, 316.)

Himmelberg, Anthoni (Anthoni Hinnelberg in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, also called Anthi Wäber), was a Swiss Mennonite preacher who in spite of 27 months of imprisonment remained true to his faith. He was a native of Wattenwyl in the Seftigen district of Bern. Because he was a zealous defender of Anabaptist principles he was imprisoned in the Bern penitentiary and orphanage on June 24, 1658. He had been in this notorious prison over a year with several other brethren, when the Dutch Mennonites began to intervene for their release (see Bern). On Oct. 9, 1659, Abraham Heidanus (q.v.), professor of theology at the University of Leiden, at the request of the Mennonites of Holland, wrote to Prof. Christof Luthard, a member of the recent Täuferkommission in Bern, which had charge of the orphanage, requesting lenience toward the Swiss Mennonites. On Oct. 24 Hans Flamingh also wrote him a long letter, lamenting reports from the Palatinate and Alsace that the Bern government was imprisoning the Mennonites, naming Anthoni Himmelberg among others.

These letters may have been the reason why on Jan. 20, 1660, several of the Mennonite prisoners were cross-examined. The court records of these trials are found in the Bern archives (De Anabaptistis Varia. Kirchenwesen II, 131, No. 16). The questions covered 16 points. The first to be tried was Rudolf Wirtz of Kulm; the second was Himmelberg. "He will do nothing at all or adapt himself in any way, but remains absolutely by his faith. Beyond this he requests pity, but he wants to have patience for whatever God wants to do with them."

His reply to point eight, "whether the Anabaptists would have their marriages blessed by the church," and to point nine, "whether for the furtherance of truth in high, important matters, an oath or pledge could be given," was this: "He would do neither the one nor the other." He also refused to name the other preachers or lay members.

The outcome was that the Mennonites had to return to prison. The committee then debated whether they should proceed by banishing the prisoners or holding them in prison (Ratszedel of Feb. 13, 1660). They decided on the latter course on the following considerations: (1) It would be like approval of their sect to send them where their doctrine is openly preached; (2) Those who remained would be strengthened by those who left; (3) Thereby more would be led into error; (4) Exile to their brethren would be too lenient a punishment to deter their spread; (5) Imprisonment is more frightening and also makes it possible to continue efforts to convert them.

In the meantime intervention had been made by the States-General of Holland, and the cities Amsterdam and Rotterdam; the Dutch ambassador de Vreede was permitted to visit the imprisoned Mennonites. The question of exile was again opened, and the Mennonites questioned again. All remained steadfast. When Himmelberg was asked whether he would deny his faith or rather leave the canton, never to return, he replied that on account of physical weakness he begged for mercy, but that he would remain true to his faith and would willingly leave the canton.

When the council saw that their efforts at conversion were of no avail, they decided on Aug. 28, 1660, to expel all the prisoners except Himmelberg, who was too ill. On Sept. 10, 1660, they were taken by boat to Brugg, and from there to the border, where de Vreede presumably received them. The directors of the orphanage were asked to give "Anthoni Himmelberg something more in food and drink for the close of his life" (Ratsmanual 139, 323). Broken by his long imprisonment and apparently by malnutrition, he died Oct. 25, 1660, at the orphanage.

One stanza of the "Dürsrüttilied" (q.v.) commemorates his death. S.G.

A. Fluri, Beiträge zur Gesch. der bernischen Täufer, No. 2, p. 17; Müller, Berner Täufer, 173-91; court records of the Bern Staatsarchiv as follows: De Anabaptistis Varia. Kirchenwesen II, 131, especially Nos. 14, 16, 33, 37; Mandatenbuch 8, p. 189 f.; Mart. Mir. D 826, E 1124; ML II, 316 f.

Himmelsmanna, Das, a 4-page, 15 in. wide (later increased to 8 pages) monthly Sunday-school paper published by John G. Stauffer from January 1876 to December 1906, at Milford Square, Pa. (1876-80), and Quakertown, Pa. (1881-1906), with a circulation of 5,000. It also appeared in English with a circulation of 8,000 in 1879-1908 under the title The Manna (q.v.), last issue April 1909. Stauffer (1837-1911) was at first a staunch Mennonite, an associate of John H. Oberholtzer 1856-67 in the Mennonitischer Druckverein, but about 1889 lost his interest in denominational Mennonitism and apparently finally his connection also. Neither the Himmelsmanna nor The Manna was in any sense a denominational paper. In 1906 Himmelsmanna was purchased by M. S. Steiner, then president of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC), "adopted by the Mission Board" to serve as a missions paper (Gospel Witness, Scottdale, July 18, 1906, p. 241) and published by it for two years 1906-8, when it was sold to the newly organized Mennonite Publication Board and apparently discontinued. During these two years it was printed by the Gospel Witness Publishing Co. (q.v.) at Scottdale, with publication at Bluffton, Ohio, under the following administration: M. S. Steiner, Columbus Grove, Ohio, editor; D. S. Gerig, Goshen, Ind., assistant editor; Aaron Loucks, Scottdale, Pa., business manager. The English Manna remained in Stauffer's hands. H.S.B.

J. Battle, History of Bucks County (Philadelphia, 1887) 1067-68 contains a biographical sketch of Stauffer with some account of the Manna.

Hindeloopen, a town (1947 pop. 924, with 80 Mennonites), once a prosperous city in the Dutch province of Friesland, an important center of Baltic trade, since the middle of the 18th century steadily declining both in commerce and in population, is a seat of a Mennonite congregation dating back to about 1550. In 1562 Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) visited this congregation but baptized only one member. When the divisions arose among the Dutch Mennonites, the Hindeloopen congregation held to the moderate Waterlanders. Haye Hommes was a representative of this congregation at the large Waterlander delegates' meeting at Amsterdam 1647. (Whether there existed also a High German congregation in 1614 is not clear.)

The Waterlander congregation is said to have numbered 1,000 members in 1653. In this year a new meetinghouse was built, being then the largest one in Friesland. Soon after, a division in the congregation took place, the smaller group being a Waterlander congregation, numbering nearly 200 members, around 1700, and meeting in the Kleine Huys; the other group, more conservative and calling itself Flemish, meeting in the Groote Huys, numbering about 600 members at that time. Through the intercession of the Friesche Doopsgezinde Sociëteit (Mennonite Conference of Friesland) the groups united ca. 1740, but in 1749 a new schism occurred, which lasted until 1810. In this year a part of the Kleine Huys joined the Groote Huys congregation, while other members of the Kleine Huys turned to the Reformed Church. In the meantime the membership had greatly decreased as a result of the decline in trade and population. The membership of the two congregations combined was about 780 in 1700; decreased to about 200 in 1796 and to only 57 in 1838. Since then the membership has remained small—43 in 1861, 48 in 1900, 70 in 1929, 57 in 1954.

In 1808-17 and 1834-73 the pastor of Hindeloopen also served Molkwerum; in 1870-1949 its pastor served also at Koudum; since 1942 the congregations of Hindeloopen and Staveren have had the same pastor, mostly living in Staveren.

In the last half century Hindeloopen was served by the following pastors: F. J. de Holl 1900-3, G. A. Hulshoff 1904-10, A. de Jong 1910-14, R. Swart 1916-19, B. P. de Vries 1920-23, H. Bussemaker 1926, A. L. Broer 1926-29, Miss J. H. van der Slooten 1932-39, Miss S. E. Treffers (of Staveren) 1942-46, L. Laurense (of Staveren) 1949-53, vacant since 1953. Activities are a Sunday school for children since 1917, a ladies' circle since 1927. A.L.B., vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 961, 1162, 1180; II, Nos. 1926-41; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, see Index; DB 1861, 122, 136; 1870, 34-37; 1874, 87; 1903, 91; ML II, 317.

Hingst, a Dutch Mennonite family, originally living at Harlingen, province of Friesland, where Evert Hingst was a deacon about 1690, Sijbrand Hingst about 1785. Another Sijbrand Hingst (b. 1824 at Harlingen, d. 1906 at The Hague), married Jacoba Huidekoper, was burgomaster of Harlingen and a member of the First Chamber of the States-General. Of great importance for the Dutch Mennonites was Sijbrand Jan Hingst, a descendant of the same family. He was a son of Jelle Hingst and Gepke Brouwer, b. 1834 at Amsterdam, d. at The Hague, on Jan. 12, 1890; married M. C. Müller. He studied law at the University of Amsterdam and obtained his doctor's degree at Utrecht in 1859. He was a judge at Amsterdam, and beginning in 1883 a member of the Hoge Raad (Supreme Court of the Netherlands) and one of the most learned jurists of his time. Like his father he served the Amsterdam congregation as a deacon (1861-65, 1871-76, 1881-83) and also the recently founded congregation at The Hague. He was also a member of the board of the Dutch Mennonite weekly De Zondagsbode, for which he wrote a number of articles, all signed S.H. He had a keen interest in Mennonite history and was a good friend of the well-known historian Ludwig Keller (q.v.). The Amsterdam Mennonite Library contains a number of his posthumous papers and notes concerning church history and Mennonite history (oath, disputations, etc.) and also a reprint of the 1887 paper, Over de Eed. vdZ.

De Zondagsbode III, No. 12 (Jan. 19, 1890); P. R. Feith, Levensbericht van Mr. S. J. Hingst (Leiden, 1890).

Hinkel Mountain is a schoolhouse about 12 miles south of Petersburg, W. Va., where Mennonite services were held for several years to accommodate about a dozen members of the Pleasant Grove (MC) congregation who lived in this isolated community. When the members moved away, services were discontinued. The schoolhouse was last listed in the Mennonite Yearbook and Directory in 1948. T.S.

Hinkletown Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Lancaster Conference, located on the Lakes-to-Seas Highway, near Ephrata, Pa., where there had been a union church since 1851. The Mennonites had a few services in it at different times but not until the Groffdale-New Holland circuit in 1943 took charge did things really move. Under Mahlon Witmer, bishop, Warren S. Good, minister, and Harry S. Good, deacon, a thriving work has started. A new church was built in 1952. The membership (1955) is 110. I.D.L.

Hinlopen, Dirk Goykes, a dealer in wood at Workum in the Dutch province of Friesland and preacher of the Waterlander congregation, studied under the celebrated Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan (q.v.) in 1698-99, delivered his first sermon on Jan. 14, 1700, and remained in this office until his death in 1752. He was generous of heart and peaceable. When the Frisian States, at the request of the Reformed Synod of Harlingen, in 1752 circulated a formulary for the signature of all Mennonite preachers (in part to avoid the spread of Socinian views) Hinlopen not only refused to sign it, but also drew up a document of protest. Hinlopen's descendants were also loyal members of the church, able and willing to contribute many a substantial sum. Simen Dirk Hinlopen (d. 1795) left the church a legacy of 20,000 guilders. Claes Goykes Hinlopen (about 1687-1727), a brother of Dirk, married to Frouwkje Jacobs Braam of Harlingen, was from 1719 treasurer of the "Zuiderklasse" (Mennonite conference of Southwest Friesland); he was a merchant, at first at Workum, and later at Harlingen. (DB 1903, 86-89, 114-18; 1905, 4, 6 f., 41; ML II, 317.) vdZ.

Hinnelberg, Anthony, an Anabaptist martyr, named by van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 826, E 1124): see Himmelberg, Anthoni.

Hinrich Ebbinck (Doktor Klumpe) is perhaps identical with the elder Hendrik van Vreden (q.v.), who was first a co-worker with Menno Simons, but then fell away from him to follow Adam Pastor. It is certain that Ebbinck was in the same region at the same time; we come across him in 1546 in Westphalia and Gelderland. (DB 1909, 107; ML I, 500.) K.V.

Hinwil, a village in the Grüningen district of the Swiss canton of Zürich, with a population (1950) of 3,000, where the Anabaptist movement appeared soon after its rise. In July 1525 Conrad Grebel (q.v.) and Marx Boshart (q.v.) preached there with considerable success, and Hinwil soon became an Anabaptist center. Several witnesses reported on a debate between Grebel and the Pastor Johannes Brennwald (q.v.) of Hinwil. Grebel lamented to Brennwald that Zwingli had once led him to the truth, but had now "gone backwards" in many respects. When Brennwald on the issue of infant baptism based his position on the imperial mandate, Grebel replied: "You must not regard either my lords nor anyone else, but only do what God has commanded you. And what the mouth of God has spoken, that you must follow after." In conclusion he said, "It is a pitiful thing that I can receive no justice—neither civil justice, nor imperial justice, nor divine justice."

On Sunday, Oct. 8, 1525, Georg Blaurock (q.v.) appeared in Hinwil. That was the day of the remarkable scene at Hinwil when Blaurock sent Brennwald from the pulpit and began to preach himself. In the ensuing debate on infant baptism, Blaurock said to Brennwald, "Thus you are the Antichrist and are misleading the people." This somewhat drastic expression on the one hand reveals the fearless mind of Blaurock, and on the other shows the rather violent character of the age.

On Nov. 6-8, 1525, the great disputation on baptism took place in Zürich. Soon there was another scene in the Hinwil church. The Swiss Brethren returning from Zürich complained of their lack of freedom to speak. Brennwald was speaking on the baptism of infants, basing his argument on a comparison with Old Testament circumcision, with reference to John 7, when the Brethren interrupted him and openly complained in the church that they had not been permitted to speak. When Brennwald left the church with the threat that he would report this incident to the authorities, someone, as Brennwald reported, called after him, "He has accused them enough; he should be removed."

The Anabaptist movement was able to maintain itself in Hinwil for some time. In February 1527 over 30 Swiss Brethren were assembled here at one time. Toward the end of 1528 the Swiss Brethren were still meeting in Hinwil and vicinity. On Nov. 26, 1528, the pastor reported to the magistrate Berger that a number of his subjects were not coming to church; among these people were some who had already been in prison in Zürich for neglecting the "Christian Church" and holding to rebaptism. But the movement that had begun so hopefully in Hinwil gradually declined and was ultimately extinguished. S.G.

Emil Egli, Die Züricher Täufer (Zürich, 1878); TA: Zürich, see Index; ML II, 317 f.

Hippolytushoef (Sint), on the former island of Wieringen, Dutch province of North Holland, seat of a Mennonite congregation, formerly called "Hippolytushoef and Stroe," now usually called the Wieringen congregation. The date of its founding is not known. Leenaert Bouwens' baptismal lists indicate that it must have existed between 1551 and 1578. He baptized 25 persons here in 1563-65, and 10 in 1568-82. Additional information on the early congregational history is found in the membership lists of 1731-1819 and from 1869 to the present (Wiersma in DB 1891) and the old record book that was begun in 1721. In the 17th century the congregation belonged to the Flemish branch; it sent a representative to the conference at Haarlem, but in the 18th century it was usually called Frisian. In 1724 trouble arose when one of the members was appointed sheriff, thus accepting government office. Silent prayer was in use until 1728. Not until 1852 were the benches in the meetinghouse replaced by chairs for the women.

In the earlier time the care of the poor was already well developed; even non-Dutch Mennonites were not forgotten. The foreword of the record book lists rather considerable sums contributed to the Lithuanian, Prussian, and Danzig brethren. The earliest minister's name of the Wieringen congregation on record is Albert Pieter Keizer, who was installed in 1690. Other early preachers were Elbert Wognum, who served as preacher 1726-42 and as elder 1742 until his death in 1781, and Cornelis Wagenmaker, preacher 1740-43, elder 1743 until his death 1784. Elder Wognum was at the same time burgomaster. When in the government meeting an oath had to be taken or a sentence had to be pronounced or military questions were to be discussed, he left the room for a while (Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 203, note 2).

The congregation has since early times had three churches; one at "Om Eest," i.e., Oosterland, one in Stroe, and one near Hippolytushoef. The first became decrepit and was sold, the second was renovated in 1738 and was burned down in 1936. From the outside this meetinghouse (Vermaning) resembled the farm building that partly concealed it. The meetinghouse near Hippolytushoef, renovated in 1776, was abandoned in 1861, when the new church in the village of Hippolytushoef was built.

Concerning the membership no figures were available before 1815. It then numbered 120, since then increasing: 162 in 1837, 180 in 1861, 275 in 1900, 382 in 1930, 332 in 1954. In the present century the congregation was served by the following pastors: J. P. Smidts 1895-1902, D. Haars 1902-5, M. Onnes Mzn. 1905-9, J. M. Leendertz 1910-23, O. L. van der Veen 1923-29, H. W. Meihuizen 1933-36, H. J. de Wilde 1937-41, P. J. Lugt 1941-45, and A. P. Goudsbloem since 1946.

The following activities are found in this congregation: three women's circles, Bible circle, church choir, library for the youth, and youth group.

Since 1930 Wieringen is no longer an island because of the Afsluitdijk, a 20-mile dike extending from Friesland to North Holland (built 1927-33), which has converted the former Zuiderzee into a lake (IJsselmeer), and is connected by the dike with both North Holland and Friesland. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1,180; DB 1891, 42-59; ML II, 318 f.) O.L.vdV., vd.Z.

Hirschberg-Kirschbach, a Mennonite congregation in the duchy of Zweibrücken, Germany, listed in the Dutch Naamlijst for 1784 with Jacob Dätweiler as elder (1760) and Johannes Steinmann (1753) and Jacob Bachmann as preachers. It also appeared in the Naamlijst for 1769 with the names of additional ministers, Johannes Steinmann (1753), Andreas Leimberger (1753), and Jacob Thomas (1753). In the list of delegates at the Essingen Amish Mennonite Conference of 1779 this congregation is called the Zweibrücken congregation. H.S.B.

Hirschler (Herschler; not Hirschi or Hershey), a Mennonite family stemming from Switzerland, which settled in the Palatinate and in Alsace soon after 1700. The progenitor of the family at Geisberg and vicinity, where there are today several branches of the family, seems to have been Daniel Hirschler, who married Katharina Strickler on June 24, 1730. Another branch of the family flourished in Gerolsheim, where Jakob Hirschler, originally a linen weaver, then a farmer, was chosen as elder. He carried on a correspondence with Hans von Steen at Danzig (Gem.-Kal. 1935, 112 ff.) and with the Dutch Committee of Foreign Needs at Amsterdam in behalf of the Swiss immigrants and the needs of his own congregation. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1458, 1463, 1485-97, 1529, 1533-35, 1537, 1539-41.) He may also have been related to Ulrich W. Hirschler, who was chosen as elder of the Friesenheim-Eppstein Mennonite congregation in 1738, or to Hans Hirschi, who is mentioned at Wachenheim in 1716 and 1724. Descendants of Jakob Hirschler are found after 1800 in Quirnheim near Grünstadt, from where a Jakob Hirschler, married to Magdelena Jansen (or Janson), moved to Thaun, Bavaria, in the Eichstock congregation. He is the ancestor of the Hirschler families found today in the various Bavarian congregations. His grandson Abraham Hirschler (1858-1931), after two years of training in the Missionshaus at Barmen, was chosen as pastor of the united congregation of Kühbörncheshof, Heudorf, Neudorf, and Ernstweiler (Kaiserslautern joined later) and lived in Kaiserslautern. He served the congregation for 50 years. In 1900-31 he edited the Christlicher Gemeinde-Kalender (q.v.).

Abraham's brother Johannes (1856-1933) attended the Seminary at St. Chrischona, Basel, Switzerland, and served the Gemeindeverband (q.v.) as traveling evangelist until 1885, then became preacher of the Eichstock congregation (from 1893 also Munich) 1887-99, and then was called to the Monsheim and Obersülzen congregations, which he served until January 1926.

David Hirschler was one of the first members of the Zion Mennonite Church of Donnellson, Iowa. Daniel Hirschler, who had settled in Iowa, was one of the founders of the Wadsworth Seminary. David B. Hirschler was for a time a missionary among the Indians in Oklahoma. During the westward move in the seventies and eighties the Hirschlers came to Kansas. John S. Hirschler (1847-1915) of Franklin Center, Iowa, graduated from Wadsworth Seminary and became a leading minister in Kansas (Hillsboro). His son Arnold S. Hirschler (b. 1873) taught mathematics at Bluffton College, Otto T. Hirschler (b. 1889) was a minister of music in various churches and has taught music, and Daniel A. Hirschler was professor of music at Bethel College and at Emporia State Teachers' College. Christian E. Hirschler (1859-1936) of Klosterhof, Palatinate, came to Halstead in 1883 and served churches as minister in Oklahoma and Kansas. Ulrich Hirschler of Bavaria, whose children had preceded him, came to America after World War I and settled at Beatrice, Neb. Most of the Hirschler descendants in America now live in Kansas. P.S., C.K.

E. E. Hirschler, The Story of a Pioneer Family (Christian E. Hirschler) (North Newton, Kan., 1937); A. Warkentin and M. Gingerich, Who's Who Among the Mennonites (North Newton, Kan., 1943).

Hirschler, John S. (1847-1915), a Mennonite (GCM) minister and leader, was born at Maxweiler, Bavaria, Germany, on July 4, 1847, and in 1856 emigrated with his parents to Summerfield, Ill. In 1868-71 he attended Wadsworth Seminary, Ohio, after which he served the Mennonite Church at Franklin Center, Iowa, for 13 years. Here he married Christine Schmidt. Following a call of the Board of Missions of the General Conference Mennonite Church he went to Hillsboro, Kan., in 1884, where he organized the First Mennonite Church. He traveled much and spoke on many occasions, especially at conferences and conventions, promoting religious education in the Mennonite constituency. He was a member of the town Board of Education in Hillsboro, was a cofounder of the Mennonite Teachers' Institute, Bethel College, and of the Hillsboro Preparatory School. He also served as secretary of the General Conference and as its chairman in 1902-15, and as a member of its Board of Trustees and its Program Committee. Because of ill health he resigned from his position as pastor in 1906 and went to Upland, Cal., where he continued to serve by establishing a church at Escondido and a tubercular sanitarium at Alta Loma. In 1911-12 he made extensive trips in the northern and western districts to collect funds for this purpose. In 1914 he became ill again, and died May 17, 1915. C.K.

S. S. Haury, "Johann S. Hirschler," in Bundesbote-Kalender (Berne, 1916) 30 ff.

Hirschy, Noah Calvin, first president, 1900-8, of Central Mennonite College (in 1913 named "Bluffton College"), was born Feb. 25, 1867, near Berne, Ind. He was married to Augusta Hunsberger of Wadsworth, Ohio, on Sept. 5, 1895. They were the parents of two children: Lois and Hermon (d. March 11, 1925). N. C. Hirschy died at Berea, Ky., on March 13, 1924. From 1885 to 1891 he alternately taught country school and attended normal school. During the year 1891-92 he served as principal of the public schools at Berne.

In 1892 Hirschy received a call to become minister of the Wadsworth, Ohio, congregation (GCM). There he had opportunity to continue his studies at Oberlin College and Seminary, completing his collegiate course in 1897 and the theological course in 1898. From 1898 to 1901 he was principal of the Wadsworth Academy.

On May 6, 1894, he was ordained to the eldership by Ephraim Hunsberger, his future father-in-law. In 1896 Hirschy was chosen a member of the Home Mission Committee of the General Conference. In 1898 he was elected moderator of the Middle District Conference.

During these early years of his ministry N. C. Hirschy was one of the leaders in the movement to establish a conference school. In 1894 he prepared a paper to be read at the Middle District Conference meeting at Bethel, Mo., which was said to be "the first public plea on record for a new college in the Middle District." In 1896-97 he was appointed to committees commissioned to draft plans for a conference college. He delivered the principal address at the laying of the cornerstone of the first building of Central Mennonite College on June 19, 1900. After several entreaties he accepted the presidency in 1900 but did not take up residence at Bluffton until 1901. He guided the college through the troublous initial years, resigning in 1908 to accept the presidency of Redfield College, Redfield, S.D. In 1906 he received his master's degree from the University of Chicago and in 1907 his doctorate of philosophy from the University of Bern in Switzerland. He served as president of Redfield College for five years (1908-13), following which he was financial secretary of Windom College, Montevideo, Minn. (1913-14), and principal of public schools, Winnie, Tex. (1914-16). In 1920 he joined the faculty of Berea College, Berea, Ky., serving as head of the botany department until his death in 1925. R.K.

C. Henry Smith and E. J. Hirschler (ed.), The Story of Bluffton College (Bluffton, 1925), Bluffton College, An Adventure in Faith (1900-1950) (1950); H. P. Krehbiel, The History of the General Conference of the Mennonites of North America (Canton, 1898).

Hirzel, Rudolf. Three Hirzels are listed in the chronicles of the Hutterian Brethren in the 1620's: the cousins Rudolf and Christoph, and Konrad Hirzel. The best known was Rudolf. When after the death of Ulrich Jaussling on April 8, 1621, the brotherhood had been without a head for four weeks because of the danger of meeting earlier, they chose Rudolf Hirzel to be their leader on May 9. He was apparently not qualified for the position, and soon fell into disrepute in the brotherhood.

The impression that the Hutterites had stored up vast treasure was prevalent in the land, supported by the writings of Christoph Andreas Fischer (q.v.). For this reason Cardinal Franz von Dietrichstein had Hirzel and two other brethren seized at Neumühle and taken to prison in Nikolsburg. After several weeks Hirzel was sharply questioned concerning the location of this money, by the cardinal and two other prominent men. If he refused to give this information willingly, they would eradicate the brotherhood from the ground up, beginning tomorrow with Neumühle and Nikolsburg. But if he gave the information, the emperor would protect them as his true subjects and give them liberties. At the same time they promised that the money would not be taken from them, but merely put into safekeeping to keep it out of the hands of the rebels.

Thus they persuaded the leader to deliver the money of the brotherhood, the "hard and sour sweat of so many pious persons," which had been entrusted to him. He thought he was thereby saving the lives of his people, but he reaped only shame and disgrace on every hand; he was deposed from his office and excommunicated. In Jesuit circles it was reported that the money Hirzel had delivered was being used for the imperial army, that this had caused such bitterness in the brotherhood that many moved away, others joined other groups of Anabaptists, and that ten had become Catholic. Rudolf Hirzel confessed his error and repented with tears. He died at Göding in Moravia, April 27, 1622. His successor, Valentin Winter, was chosen on Feb. 22, 1622.

Christoph Hirzel was one of the men imprisoned with Rudolf. Konrad Hirzel, with Franz Walter, a preacher, and 138 men, women, and children, fled before the troops of Buquois to Echtelnitz and Schächtitz, and from there they went to Transylvania and Alwincz to form a settlement. Konrad Hirzel was chosen a preacher in Transylvania, but he was released from this duty after a year, at his "earnest request and insistence." (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 393-97; Loserth, Communismus; ML II, 319.) LOSERTH.

Histoire des Anabaptistes. There are two books bearing this title, both in the French language. The first, published at Paris in 1695, was written by the Jesuit François Catrou (repr. Paris 1706); the second book is anonymous. It was published at Amsterdam in 1700 and is a partial re-edition of L. Hortensius' (q.v.) Tumultuum Anabaptistarum liber unus.

Historia Christianorum: see Herman Schijn.

Historical Committee of the General Conference Mennonite Church is the continuation of the Mennonite Historical Society (Association) and is the official General Conference organ to "collect, preserve, and make available for research, materials of historical and cultural value to Mennonites." It is "responsible for preserving and maintaining places and items of historical and cultural significance" and is to "promote Mennonite research and recommend desirable materials for publication" (revised constitution of G.C.M. Church, 1950).

The Historical Committee came into being when the Mennonite Historical Society (q.v.), which was an independent association within the General Conference since 1911, but always reported at conference sessions, recommended in 1938 that a "standing committee" be created to be responsible for historical interests of the conference and of a Mennonite Historical Institute, which was to be created. As a result the Executive Committee of the conference appointed four members to the Historical Committee, which met for the first time July 11, 1939. Although the Mennonite Historical Institute was not realized, the newly created Historical Committee gradually took over the work and the collections of the Mennonite Historical Society. The new Historical Committee was, at the beginning, directly responsible to the Executive Committee of the conference, but since the adoption of the revised constitution of the conference (1950) it functions under the Board of Education and Publication, which appoints its members, approves the budget, and of which a member serves as chairman of the committee. The materials collected by the former Mennonite Historical Society were taken over by the Historical Committee and are now located mostly in the vault of the Bethel College Historical Library, which houses material of the conference, as well as of its own historical collection. The documents, collected mostly by H. R. Voth and H. P. Krehbiel, pertain, as a rule, to the Mennonites living in the prairie states.

The new Historical Committee, originally under the guidance of A. Warkentin, has been active in collecting, cataloguing, and binding materials which were obtained through donations and purchase. Among the projects carried out by the Committee during the last years are (a) the working out of a plan by which the grounds and the church building of the Germantown Mennonite Church would be safeguarded and remain a Mennonite historical marker, (b) the microfilming of Anabaptist and Mennonite documents in this country (church records, diaries, correspondence) and abroad (archives containing Anabaptist materials in Holland, Germany, Austria, and others), (c) helping to finance the publication of the Täuferakten, (d) publishing the Mennonite Historical Series (From the Steppes to the Prairies, L. Harder, Plockhoy from Zierik-zee, etc.). The Historical Committee also helps the Mennonite historical libraries of the Mennonite Biblical Seminary, Chicago, Bluffton College, and Bethel College purchase rare Mennonitica. In 1956 the members of the committee were Don. E. Smucker, chairman; Cornelius Krahn, secretary; and Delbert Gratz, Gerhard Lohrenz, and D. J. Unruh. C.K.

Historical Committee of the Mennonite (MC) General Conference was established by the 1911 session of the General Conference as a committee of ten with the assignment to prepare a Mennonite church history, and has continued as a standing committee of the conference. In 1937 it was authorized to co-opt additional members and since then has usually had a membership of 12. Officers have been: chairman, S. F. Coffman 1911-47 and H. S. Bender 1947- ; secretary, John Horsch 1911-27, L. J. Burkholder 1927-35, H. S. Bender 1935-47, J. C. Wenger 1947- ; custodian of the archives, H. S. Bender 1940-47 and Melvin Gingerich 1947- ; treasurer, J. C. Wenger 1939-41, 1945-47, Edward Yoder 1941-45, and Ira D. Landis 1947- .

The committee early promoted the building up of a Mennonite historical library at the Mennonite Publishing House, Scottdale, Pa., which was for a time its property, with John Horsch as librarian, but later this library was turned over to the House. The committee appointed historians for the various district conferences to secure material for a history of the Mennonite Church in America. Throughout its history it has from time to time recommended, promoted, and supervised the publication of historical works, and has served as assistant to the Mennonite Publishing House and the latter's Publishing Committee in the choice of historical writers and in the production of historical literature.

A new phase of the committee's work began in 1939 with the organization of the Mennonite Historical Association, whose officers are the officers of the Historical Committee. At the same time it began the publication of the Mennonite Historical Bulletin (q.v.), which is still published. In 1940, by direction of the Mennonite General Conference, it established the archives of the Mennonite Church (q.v.) located in two rooms in the Goshen College Library, at Goshen, Ind., which it continues to operate. In recent years it has generously subsidized the publication in Europe of the series of volumes of Anabaptist documents known as the Täuferakten. The committee holds annual business meetings. H.S.B.

Historical Libraries. Collections of writings on Anabaptist-Mennonite history and of writings by Anabaptists and Mennonites have first of all been made by scholars and writers in the field, then by certain of the older and wealthier Mennonite congregations in Europe, and finally by American Mennonite colleges and seminaries. Extensive special Mennonite historical libraries, well-cataloged and serviced, are of only comparatively recent date, and except for the Amsterdam Mennonite Library are to be found only in a few American Mennonite schools. Most of the personal historical libraries and collections of the historians have found their way into the institutional libraries, hence in 1956 there were no extensive private collections. Numerous catalogs of private and congregational collections in Europe have been published. Only one such catalog has been published in America, that of the Mennonite Publishing House Library, Scottdale, Pa. (1929).

Private Historical Collections. The first of such collections was that of the Dutch Mennonite preacher Marten Schagen (1700-70), who published a list of Mennonite writers and works in 1745 presumably based upon his own collection (sale catalog published in 1771), which was bequeathed to the Utrecht, Holland, congregation, which in turn later presented it to the Amsterdam Mennonite Library. The fate of Gerardus Maatschoen's (d. 1751) large collection (the sale catalog of 1752 contained 258 pages, though not all Mennonite) is not known. The fate of the collections of Steven Blaupot ten Cate (1807-84), sale catalog in 1885, and J. D. Hesselink, sale catalog in 1878, is unknown. Most of W. J. Kühler's (1874-1946) small collection was secured by the Goshen College Library. The smaller collections of the German Mennonite historian Christian Neff (1863-1946) and Christian Hege (1869-1943) have become the property of the German Mennonite Historical Society (Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein), the former remaining at Weierhof, the latter now incorporated into the library of the Mennonite Research Center (Mennonitische Forschungsstelle) at Göttingen. Ulrich Hege (1808-72) of Reihen had a small circulating library, of which a catalog was published at Leipzig in 1843 (Verzeichnis der Leih-Bibliothek von Ulrich Hege in Bockschaft). It was largely pietistic in content; its Mennonite books were secured by John Horsch in 1922. In America J. F. Funk's (1835-1930) extensive collection, largely selected and purchased by John Horsch (1867-1941) in 1887-95, ultimately came to the Goshen College Library. The smaller collections of C. Henry Smith (1875-1948), N. B. Grubb (1850-1938), and C. H. A. van der Smissen (1851-1950) came to the Bluffton College Library. John Horsch's personal collection was incorporated in the Mennonite Publishing House Library and came to the Goshen College Library. S. W. Pennypacker (1843-1916), a former governor of Pennsylvania, had a considerable collection of Mennonitica (auction catalog 1920), much of which was purchased by the Schwenkfelder Library at Pennsburg, Pa. Bethel College obtained the F. C. Fleischer library of the Netherlands, and the collections of C. E. Krehbiel of Newton, Kan., and Cornelius Jansen of Beatrice, Neb., as well as numerous smaller libraries of its constituency of the prairie states. Some of these libraries are preserved as memorial collections. Recently the Franconia Mennonite Historical Society (q.v.) has established a regional historical library at Souderton, Pa., and a similar library is being established at Salunga, Pa., for the Lancaster Mennonite (MC) Conference district.

Institutional Libraries. (A) Europe. The oldest institutional Mennonite historical library is that of the Amsterdam (Holland) Mennonite Church (q.v.). The library, which contains much more than Mennonitica, was established in 1680, although its major accessions of Anabaptistica and Mennonitica came after 1750 and chiefly in the 19th century. Catalogs of the Mennonite publications in the library have been published in 1854, 1888, 1919. In 1919, 3,800 Mennonite titles were listed, not including serials. A catalog of the large archival collection in the library was published in 1883-84. The present director of the Amsterdam Library and Archives is N. van der Zijpp. The small library of the Danzig Mennonite Church (a catalog, Katalog der Kirchenbibliothek der Mennonitengemeinde zu Danzig, published in 1869 at Danzig, listed 140 Mennonite titles) was scattered in the fighting of 1945 and following years, some items being brought to the Bethel and Goshen College libraries by returning relief workers and others. The larger library of the Hamburg Mennonite Church published a catalog in 1890, Katalog von der Bibliothek der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona, which listed over 500 titles by and about Mennonites. This library, established at the end of the 18th century by the bequest of the preacher R. Rahusen (1735-93), was attempting in 1890 (according to the foreword in the catalog by the church board of the congregation) to assemble a complete collection of all such writings. It has numerous rare Dutch titles of the 17th and 18th centuries. The library was temporarily stored elsewhere for safety during the last years of World War II and suffered some loss by theft. There have been few accessions during the past 30 years, but in 1916 it had 2,000 volumes, over half of them Mennonitica. The German Conference known as the Vereinigung der Mennoniten-Gemeinden im Deutschen Reich (q.v.) attempted to create a theological library, which was added to the Hamburg Mennonite congregational library. The congregations of Crefeld, Emden, and Heubuden had small libraries with Mennonite collections. The Heubuden library, kept in the meetinghouse as a circulating library, was in part destroyed 1945-48, and in part taken over by Polish authorities who may have placed it in the Danzig city library collection. The Weierhof school (Realanstalt am Donnersberg, q.v.) had only a small collection of Mennonitica. The Mennonitische Forschungsstelle at Göttingen (est. 1948) is vigorously building up a Mennonite library and now has over 500 titles and numerous serials. It is the only active Mennonite library today (1956) in Europe outside of Amsterdam. The Swiss Mennonite Conference has a small library and archives housed in the Jeangisboden meetinghouse in the Jura district near Tramelan.

(B) America. The major Mennonite historical libraries, outside of Amsterdam, are those of the Mennonite colleges at Newton, Kan. (Bethel College) and Goshen, Ind. (Goshen College). The Goshen College Mennonite Historical Library was established in 1907 by the G.C. Alumni Association and developed in a small way by C. Henry Smith until his departure from the institution in 1913. The serious development of the library did not begin until 1929 (holding then ca. 200 titles) when Harold S. Bender was given charge of the collection and the Mennonite Historical Society began its substantial support. In 1940 when the collection was placed in the new college library building, it had ca. 1,800 volumes. In 1956 its holdings were over 12,500 volumes including serials. The director was Bender and curator Nelson P. Springer, the latter in charge of the library since 1949. The Mennonite Historical Library of the Mennonite Publishing House at Scottdale, founded ca. 1908 (librarian John Horsch), reached its height about 1929, when its catalog was published (Catalogue of the Mennonite Historical Library in Scottdale, Pa.) containing more than 3,000 items. The catalog lists only some 1,300 titles of books and pamphlets valuable for Mennonite History. Of this number slightly more than 900 (all the foreign language titles and some English) were given in exchange to the Goshen College Library in 1944 where they are shelved as the "John Horsch Collection." The remaining historical materials at Scottdale are now a part of the larger working theological library there serving the Publishing House editorial staff (Alta Erb, librarian). The Goshen library is particularly rich in 16th- and 17-century Anabaptistica, as well as in Mennonitica Americana.

The Bethel College Mennonite Historical Library, now over 12,000 volumes, including serials (Cornelius Krahn director since 1944), was established by A. Warkentin in 1935 (1,130 cataloged books in 1940), although the collection was begun by C. H. Wedel (d. 1910). The library has grown steadily under the direction of Cornelius Krahn, assisted by John F. Schmidt since 1947. Some 2,000 books and pamphlets were obtained through its director during his sojourns in Europe in 1952 and 1953-54. Larger collections of Mennonitica such as the collection of the Mennonite Historical Association (q.v.) have been incorporated, although part of the latter collection went to the Mennonite Biblical Seminary in Chicago. Although the library aims to collect every item pertaining to the Anabaptists and Mennonites in general its holdings are possibly most complete in the realm of Dutch, Prussian, Polish, and Russian Mennonitica. The library is housed in spacious quarters in the new Bethel College Library building, which was completed in 1953.

Additional notable smaller Mennonite historical collections are found as follows: Bluffton College, established as a separate collection in 1928, holdings now about 4,000 volumes; Mennonite Biblical Seminary in Chicago, established in 1944, holdings now about 1,600; Eastern Mennonite College, established ca. 1950, holdings now about 1,000 (Irvin Horst librarian since 1955).

The Schwenkfelder Library at Pennsburg, Pa., has a small collection of Mennonitica, mostly American, the core of which it secured from the S. W. Pennypacker collection in 1920. It has attempted to serve as a depository for Mennonite materials from Eastern Pennsylvania, especially Montgomery, Bucks, and Chester counties. The Historical Society of Pennsylvania Library at Philadelphia has a considerable number of Mennonitica Americana, especially Pennsylvania imprints, as does also the large collection of Pennsylvania German imprints in the Pennsylvania German Folklore Center at Franklin and Marshall College, Lancaster, Pa.

The largest collection of Anabaptist material, outside of Amsterdam, Goshen, and Bethel, is to be found in the Prussian State Library (formerly in Berlin, now at the University of Marburg except for unknown war losses), the University of Munich, Germany, and the libraries in Zürich, Switzerland (university, canton, and city). In the United States the Baptist historical libraries at Crozer (Chester, Pa.) and Colgate-Rochester (Rochester, N.Y.) theological seminaries have considerable amounts of Hubmaier and early Anabaptist material. The Union Theological Seminary Library in New York City has the largest general collection of Anabaptist materials in the New World outside of the Mennonite libraries. The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary Library at Louisville, Ky., is building up an Anabaptist collection, as is the Baptist Theological Seminary Library at Zürich/Rüschlikon, Switzerland.

Most of the Mennonite Historical Library collections contain not only printed books and pamphlets, but also periodicals, historical documents, historical manuscripts such as dissertations and papers, microfilms, photocopies, photographs, pictures, recordings, and museum items. Not infrequently denominational archival collections are attached to or housed with or near the collections. Only the Bethel College and Goshen College libraries are attempting exhaustive collections in all fields, languages, and groups. They have established a union catalog. (See Amsterdam Mennonite Library; Archives; and the articles Mennonite Historical Library of Bethel College, Bluffton College, Goshen College, and Mennonite Biblical Seminary.) H.S.B.

Historical Library (of Mennonite colleges: see Mennonite Historical Library (of the colleges).

Historical Societies. In 1956 there were four Mennonite Historical Societies in existence, three in the United States and one in Europe. The Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein (q.v.) of Germany, the largest with about 800 dues-paying members, was founded by Christian Hege (q.v.) and Christian Neff (q.v.) in 1935. It is unique in character as a national organization with a large number of Mennonite ministers as well as laymen in its membership. It publishes (1) a journal, Mennonitische Geschichtsblätter (q.v., 1936-), and (2) a publication series, Schriftenreihe des Mennonitischen Geschichtsvereins, supports the Research Center (Mennonitische Forschungsstelle, q.v.) at Göttingen, and holds annual meetings.

The Mennonite Historical Society (q.v.) of Goshen College, Goshen, Ind., is a purely local society of professors and students of Goshen College and Biblical Seminary, with about 100 dues-paying members. Founded in 1920, it was moribund until reorganized in 1924 by Harold S. Bender and Ernst Correll. It publishes the Mennonite Quarterly Review (1927-) edits a publication series, Studies in Anabaptist and Mennonite History, which it formerly published (up to 1950, since then published by the Mennonite Publishing House at Scottdale, Pa.), holds quarterly meetings during the school year, and supports the Mennonite Historical Library at Goshen College. The Franconia Mennonite Historical Society (q.v.), founded in 1930 by John D. Souder and others, is a district society for the Franconia Mennonite Conference (MC) in eastern Pennsylvania with no dues-paying membership, which holds annual meetigns, supports the Franconia Mennonite Historical Library at Souderton, Pa., and has published J. C. Wenger's History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference. The Iowa Mennonite Historical Society (q.v.), founded in 1948 by Elmer G. Swartzendruber, is a regional society with its center near Kalona, Iowa, with no dues-paying membership, which holds annual meetings. The Mennonite Historical Association (q.v.) was created in 1938 by the Historical Committee of the Mennonite General Conference (MC) as a nominal organization of the subscribers of the Mennonite Historical Bulletin (q.v.). It holds no meetings. The Echo-Verlag (q.v.) of Canada, though not called a historical society, is similar to one, with dues-paying members. Earlier, in 1911, H. P. Krehbiel had organized a Mennonite Historical Association (Society, q.v.) in the General Conference Mennonite Church, which reported regularly to the triennial sessions of the General Conference and collected a large amount of historical literature and materials, but held no regular meetings. It was replaced in 1938 by the Historical Committee of the General Conference. H.S.B.

Historie der Martelaren, published at Haarlem in 1615: see Martyr Books.

Historie van de Vrome Getuygen Jesu Christi, published at Hoorn in 1626: see Martyr Books.

Historie der Warachtige Getuygen Jesu Christi, published at Hoorn in 1617: see Martyr Books.

Historiography I: Anabaptist. General. Anabaptist historiography was formerly the privilege of its enemies. The Anabaptists could not take part, for from 1528 on the German imperial and national laws threatened death to any defender of Anabaptism. Any attempt to refute false accusations was directly followed by persecution and arrest. Therefore the opponents of Anabaptism were able to spread the most absurd assertions concerning the life and doctrine of the Anabaptists without having to face a rebuttal. They took copious advantage of their position. This violent suppression of the right of self-defense naturally injured the entire Anabaptist brotherhood, for those who were not in a position to draw their own conclusions from observation had to consider them hostile to the state as well as to religion. The few fanatical manifestations among the Anabaptists, which modern research has shown to have occurred largely when their sober leaders had been forcibly removed, were the principal foundation for the attacks of the writers—chiefly theologians—of the 16th century. In their hostile attitude the writers made no distinction between the character of quiet Anabaptism and the extreme excrescences. The few objective contemporary historians like Sebastian Franck (q.v., 1499-1543, Chronica, Zeytbuch und Geschychtbibel, q.v., 1531) were exceptions and exerted little influence. The difficulty of securing a printer also handicapped the Anabaptists in publishing their views. An Amsterdam printer was executed in 1544 for publishing a book by Menno Simons.

This one-sided attitude dominated the body of church historical writings far beyond the 16th century. The very titles of the books dealing with the origin and doctrine of the new brotherhood betray this. One of the oldest writings was Zwingli's In Catabaptistarum Strophas Elenchus of 1527; another of the same year was that by Urban Rhegius which appeared in Augsburg: Wider den newen Tauff-orden, Notwendighe Warnung an alle christ gleubigen durch die diener des Evangelii zu Augsburg. Also of 1527 was J. Bader's Brüderliche Warnung für dem newen Abgöttischen orden der Widertäuffer. In 1528 appeared Philip Melanchthon's book, Unterricht wider die Lere der Wiedertauffer verdeutscht durch Justus Jonas, and eight years later the admonition to the princes by the same author, Das weltliche Oberkeitt den Widertaufferen mit leiblicher straff zu weren schuldig sey. In 1528 Andreas Althamer also wrote a book, Ein kurze unterricht den Pfarherrn und Predigern in Brandenburg . . . ; it draws the conclusion that Anabaptist doctrines carried revolt in their train. In 1531 Heinrich Bullinger wrote Von dem unverschampten fräfel, ergerlichem verwyrren und unwarhaftem leeren der selbsgesandten Widertouffern; in 1560 he wrote a second book, Der widertäufferen ursprung, fürgang, secten, wäsen, fürneme und gemeine irer Artickel. This method of attack continued in the 17th century. In 1603 Christoph Andreas Fischer published his polemic, Von der widertauffer verfluchten Ursprung, Gottlosen Lehre und derselber grundtliche widerlegung, followed in 1607 by his equally venomous book, Der Hutterischen Widertauffer Taubenkobel. In 1623 Theobaldus Zacharias wrote Widertaufferischer Geist, das ist Glaubwürdiger und historischer Bericht, was Jammer und Elend die alten Widertauffer gestifftet und angerichtet (repr. by W. A. Mayer at Cöthen in 1701). Note also L. Duck's Adversos impios Anabaptistarum errores (Hagenau, 1530) and Johannes Gast's De Anabaptismi exordio, erroribus, historiis abominandis (Basel, 1544).

These few samples from the literary flood issuing from all the churches are sufficient to show how little interest there was in treating the Anabaptist movement with justice. These works were used as sources by later historians, who took them over without question; very few historians went back to the original confessional writings of the Anabaptist leaders; it occurred to only a few to compare them with the statements of contemporary opponents. Well into the 19th century the great Anabaptist movement of the 16th century was uncritically identified with the Peasants' War of 1525 and the events in Münster; Menno Simons was thought to have gathered the dispersed remnants of the Münster Anabaptists and to have turned them to the ways of peace. But of the persecutions, which lasted in Holland until the last quarter of the 16th century, in Germany until the outbreak of the Thirty Years' War, and in Switzerland until the 18th century, and brought a martyr's death to thousands, practically nothing was said. Not even the imperial laws against baptism upon confession were mentioned.

The inevitable consequence was that these biased presentations could not hold their ground against scholarly investigation as soon as the nature and goals of the Anabaptist movement were clearly recognized. It, of course, took several centuries to reach this point. But when it was reached, an amazing reversal took place in the judgment of scholars regarding Anabaptism. In the meantime many of the Anabaptist ideas, such as liberty of faith and conscience, the rejection of force in religious matters, complete separation of church and state, for which the old Anabaptists had struggled so long and valiantly, had already become so commonly accepted that the movement, so long despised, now attracted the scholar. "Thanks to the research of recent years," writes Adolf Harnack (Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte III, 1910, 772), "the portraits of distinguished Christians from Anabaptist circles have been given us; and not a few of these honorable and strong-minded men are more comprehensible to us than a heroic Luther or an iron-willed Calvin."

The foundation for this unprejudiced presentation of the Anabaptist movement could not be laid until historians took the trouble of becoming acquainted with the writings of Anabaptist leaders and the testimony of the victims of persecution. There was, to be sure, not a wide selection, but the few writings available were sufficient to enable an unprejudiced scholar to form a judgment. Information on their doctrine was found in the works of Hans Denk, Menno Simons, and Dirk Philips. Their spiritual stature is indicated in their hymns, which were begun in 1535 by the prisoners in the castle at Passau in the oldest Anabaptist hymnal, the Ausbund. A collection of the testimony of the martyrs appeared first in the Dutch martyrbook Het Offer des Heeren (1562), which Tieleman Jansz van Braght expanded into his Martyrs' Mirror (q.v., 1660).

The first writer of church history to make a complete break with the accepted presentation of Anabaptism was Gottfried Arnold (q.v.). In his extensive work, Unparteyische Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie, first published in Frankfurt in 1699 (enlarged 3d ed. Schaffhausen, 1740-42), he proves the untruth of a series of false assertions. He was familiar with the writings mentioned above and recognized the injustice of the church toward dissenting Christians. A factor in his interest may have been the fact that he was closely connected with the arising Pietism; through the spiritual relatedness of Pietism with Anabaptism he may have been granted a deeper understanding of it than the theologians of the traditional school. He was reproached with prejudice in favor of the "heretics." But this did not prevent his work from actually forming the transition from the orthodox, limited concept of church history to an objective evaluation of events and processes. Ernst Troeltsch calls Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie "a church history which is even today not out-of-date and which can still be compared with modern church historians. It covers an incredibly rich field of material and carries the student into the atmosphere of extra-ecclesiastical Protestantism as no other book does" (Sociallehren, 1912, 800).

Nevertheless it took a long time for Arnold's work to find recognition from scholars. The prejudices against circles outside the state church were so deepseated that the principles represented by the Anabaptist brotherhood were intentionally overlooked. German writers of church history were still so much under the spell of the traditional concepts that they could not free themselves for objective reporting, and writers of secular history did not investigate into the religious history of the 16th century deeply enough to recognize the significance of the Anabaptist movement. They saw in it rather a mere secondary phenomenon of the Reformation, which must in the nature of things disappear of itself after the large churches of the Reformation were firmly established. "At the time when the older men of our generation were students," said Walther Köhler in a lecture on Mennonite historical research, "we scarcely heard anything mentioned [about the Anabaptist movement], and if it did happen, a judgment was passed upon it in advance by the use of the word 'fanatics'" (Gedenkschrift, 1925, 173). A familiar type of writing about the "heretics" (Anabaptists always one of the chief) was the Ketzer-Historie (q.v.), Ketzer-Lexikon, or Ketzer-Geschichte ("Ketzer" being the equivalent of "heretic"), which flourished in the 18th century.

A more careful cultivation of Mennonite history was made first in Holland, where the Mennonites found official toleration earlier than in other countries. Here, after the preliminary work done by van Braght (q.v.), the desire for further research was already awakened. The large numbers of Mennonites there—in the 17th and 18th centuries about 10 per cent of the population of Holland belonged to the Mennonite brotherhood—and their economic prominence brought about a greater attention to their own history. In addition the numerous polemics of their opponents compelled them to make an attentive study of the sources. Since in Germany there was no literature of this kind, German writers frequently dealt only with the Dutch Anabaptists.

The oldest historical work produced by the Mennonites was published anonymously in 1615 under the title, Het beginsel en voortganck der geschillen, scheuringen, en verdeeltheden onder de gene die Doopsgesinden Genoemt worden (q.v.). For a long time it served with Het Offer des Heeren and the Martyrs' Mirror as one of the three principal sources for the history of the Dutch Mennonites in the 16th century. One hundred years later, in 1720, J. Chr. Jehring published a German translation (Gründliche Historie). About this time the works of Herman Schijn, a Mennonite historian, also began to appear. A work of importance was Geschiedenis der Mennoniten in three volumes, 1743-45, by Schijn and Gerardus Maatschoen; another was Nachrichten von dem gegenwärtigen Zustand der Mennoniten, written by the German historian, S. F. Rues, published at Jena in 1743, and in a Dutch translation in 1745.

In the 19th century new interest awoke in Holland through the influence of Samuel Muller (1785-1875), a professor at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, who published the Jaarboekje voor de Doopsgezinde Gemeenten (1837-50). S. Blaupot ten Cate (1807-84) did outstanding regional histories. The historical work of J. G. de Hoop Scheffer (1819-92), also a professor at the Amsterdam Seminary, and the outstanding authority on the Reformation in Holland, was also epoch-making. He brought to light the oldest sources, which he used in many works of lasting value. Alongside of de Hoop Scheffer, Samuel Cramer (1842-1931), professor at the Seminary, deserves credit for his publication of rare 16th-century books dealing with the Anabaptists, in the Bibliotheca Reformatoria Neerlandica, the noted collection of works from the time of the Dutch Reformation, which he edited (1903-14).

An abundance of historical treatises appeared in the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen, 1861-1919. Dutch Mennonite historiography was brought to a climax with the work of W. J. Kühler (1874-1946) and N. van der Zijpp, both professors at the Seminary. Kühler devoted three volumes to the 16th- and 17th-century Dutch Anabaptists (1932-45) and van der Zijpp presented a brief history of the Dutch Mennonites from the beginning to the present (1952). Cornelius Krahn, the author of the latest complete biography of Menno Simons (1936), summarized the "Historiography of the Dutch Mennonites" in Church History, September 1944, and MQR, October 1944. Eberhard Teufel presented an annotated bibliography pertaining to the Dutch Mennonites entitled "Täufertum und Quäkertum im Lichte der neueren Forschung" in Theologische Rundschau, No. 1 and 2 (1941) 21-48; No. 2 (1948) 161-81. W. Köhler's "Das Täufertum im Lichte der neueren Kirchengeschichtsforschung" (Archiv f. Ref.-Gesch. 1940-48) also contains valuable historiographical material on Dutch Anabaptism. (See Historiography: Netherlands below.)

In Germany in the 17th century presentations of the whole of Anabaptist history were predominantly in the Latin language. The best-known works are those of A. Meshovius (q.v.), Historiae Anabaptisticae Libri Septem (Cologne, 1617) and J. H. Ottius (q.v.), Annales Anabaptistici (q.v., Basel, 1672). Since the middle of the 18th century German research scholars have engaged in the study of Anabaptist history. In his copious collection of sources on Swiss Reformation history (Beyträge zur Erläuterung der Kirchen-Reformations-Geschichten des Schweitzerlandes, Zürich, 1741-53), the Swiss scholar J. C. Füsslin (q.v.) published valuable materials on Swiss Anabaptist history. On the Anabaptist movement in Bavaria in the 16th century V. A. Winter published in 1809 a fragmentary presentation (Geschichte der baierischen Wiedertäufer) based on several archival sources, in which he nevertheless completely misinterpreted their character. He even attempted to justify the Anabaptist persecutions against Kant's conception of the conscienceless character of the heresy judges. In the Anabaptist movement he saw only mischief and ruin to the state (p. 162). The results of more recent research were used by Siegmund Riezler in his sensitive presentation in Geschichte Bayerns (1903).

The first comprehensive history of the Anabaptists (Geschichte der Taufe und Taufgesinnten) was published in 1789 by Joh. Aug. Starck, the Hessian court chaplain. Starck was severely attacked by the rationalistic wing; he called his book a sort of defense of his theological position (p. VI). Beside the writings (1821, 1829) of G. L. von Reiswitz and F. Wadzeck it was the most reliable informative work on the history of the Mennonites in the first centuries up to that time. J. Hast's Geschichte der Wiedertäufer (1836), written by a Catholic, is typical of the early 19th century. The liberal Karl Hagen (Deutschlands . . . Verhältnis im Ref.-Zeitalter IV, 1844) and the orthodox Max Goebel (Geschichte des christlichen Lebens II, 1848) began a juster objective reporting.

A great impetus was given to the study of Anabaptist history about the middle of the 19th century by the noted Old Catholic historian, Carl A. Cornelius (q.v.), who by his thorough research (e.g., Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs, 1855-60) sought to fathom the nature and significance of Anabaptism, and thus came to the conclusion that the movement emanated from more worthy motives than the historians, secular and religious, had up to that time given it credit for.

In rapid sequence thorough investigations of the Anabaptist movement of the 16th century were now published, throwing light upon this hitherto neglected branch of church history. For a while nearly every year produced several works on the history of the Anabaptists in various countries or on leading personalities in the movement. Heberle wrote on Hans Denk (1851 and 1855) and Capito's relation to Swiss Anabaptism (1858), G. E. Röhrich on Hans Denk (1853) and the Anabaptist movement in Strasbourg (1860), K. Keim on Ludwig Haetzer (1856), K. W. H. Hochhuth on the movement in Hesse (1858-60), Friedrich Nippold on David Joris (1863-68), and Chr. Meyer on the movement in Upper Swabia (1874). Later many individual biographies of Anabaptist leaders appeared; e.g., Denk (Keller 1862, Haake 1897, Schwindt 1922, Weis 1925, Coutts 1927, Vittali 1932); Haetzer (Weis 1930, Goeters 1956); David Joris (Bainton 1935); Grebel (Bender 1950); Blaurock (Jecklin 1891, Loserth 1898, Moore 1955); Hofmann (Leendertz 1883, zur Linden 1885); Hubmaier (Vedder 1905, Mau 1912, Sachsse 1914, Wiswedel 1939); Menno (Cramer 1837, Roosen 1848, Vos 1914, Horsch 1916, Krahn 1936).

Some excitement was caused by the research done by archivist Ludwig Keller (q.v.) of Münster on the forerunners of the Anabaptists and by his attempt to prove direct connection between them and the old-evangelical parties of the Middle Ages. In his investigations he was led by the idea that the Anabaptists, in whom he recognized a revival of apostolic church life, must be the descendants of those suppressed brotherhoods, and he tried on a large scale to construct an unbroken chain of free evangelical brotherhoods from original Christianity to the present. Even though this attempt failed, nevertheless his book, Die Reformation und die älteren Reformparteien (1885), retains its value by virtue of the source material it contains; it was a powerful incentive to further research on Anabaptist history in all countries in which congregations were formed during the Reformation. Even before this book appeared, Ludwig Keller had published monographs on the Anabaptists, for the purpose of serving the truth. His presentation of the life of the Anabaptist leader Hans Denk (Ein Apostel der Wiedertäufer, 1882) won wide attention.

In the following years books and articles on the Anabaptists were published as follows: J. Habets on Maastricht (1877), J. Hansen on Aachen (1884), F. O. zur Linden on Melchior Hofmann (1885), Gustav Bossert on the Anabaptist movement in Württemberg (1888 ff.), C. Gerbert, in Strasbourg (1889), Karl Rembert, in the duchy of Jülich (1893 and 1899), A. H. Newman on the Anabaptist movement in the 16th century (1897), Joh. Loserth, in Styria (1894), Eduard Jacobs, in the Harz (1899), Friedrich Roth, in Augsburg and Upper Swabia (1900), Eduard Becker, in Kürnbach (1902), Rudolf Wolkan on the hymns of the Anabaptists (1903) and the Hutterian Brethren in America (1918), Christian Hege on the Anabaptists in the Kurpfalz (1908), Paul Wappler, in Thuringia (1908 ff.), Hermann Nestler, in Regensburg (1926), and Alt, in Kaufbeuren (1930).

The theology of the Anabaptists and their place in the history of Christian thought has received considerable attention in recent years. Ernst Troeltsch's Sociallehren der christlichen Kirchen und Gruppen (1912, English 1936) was epoch-making and influential for the typology of the Anabaptist movement. Johannes Kühn's Toleranz und Offenbarung (1923) was a further creative and stimulating effort in this direction. Karl Holl, "Luther und die Schwärmer" (Gesammelte Aufsätze, 1922), and Ulrich Bergfried, Die Verantwortung als theologisches Problem im Täufertum des 16. Jahrhunderts (1938), while containing much valuable information, wrote wholly from the strict Lutheran standpoint with a negative critical outcome, similar to H. Lüdemann's earlier Reformation und Täufertum (1896) from the Reformed standpoint. Fritz Heyer, Der Kirchenbegriff der Schwärmer (1939) is better but still misconceives the Anabaptist position. Walther Köhler, Dogmengeschichte als Geschichte des Christlichen Selbstbewusstseins, II Das Zeitalter der Reformation (1951) is the first general history of dogma to give the Anabaptists both space and a fair evaluation. F. W. Littell's The Anabaptist View of the Church (1952) is by all odds the best monograph an Anabaptist theology yet produced. John Horsch's Infant Baptism and its Origin among Protestants (1917) treats a limited field thoroughly and is important for its assembly of documentary evidence for the emergent years of Anabaptism. Ethelbert Stauffer's important article "The Anabaptist Theology of Martyrdom" brilliantly opens a new aspect. H. S. Bender has set forth the essence of the Anabaptist faith in The Anabaptist Vision (reprinted from MQR XVIII, 1949). The Mennonite Quarterly Review's "Special Anabaptist Theology Number" (January 1950) contains valuable studies. J. C. Wenger published "The Theology of Pilgram Marpeck" (MQR XII, 1938, 205-56). The latest study is Peter Kawerau's Melchior Hofmann als religiöser Denker (1954).

Modern comprehensive accounts of Anabaptism, following the initial attempt by Anna Brons in her Ursprung, Entwickelung und Schicksale (1884), have been delivered only by English and American writers (except for the brief account in Horst Penner's Weltweite Bruderschaft of 1955). In English A. H. Newman's History of Anti-Pedobaptism . . . to 1609 (1897) was the first good account, and is still useful. E. B. Bax, Rise and Fall of the Anabaptists (1903), written from the social and socialistic point of view, does not go beyond Münster. E. C. Pike, The Story of the Anabaptists (1904), is better but brief. C. H. Smith's general works on Mennonite history (1920 and 1941) give the best comprehensive treatment, although John Horsch's Mennonites in Europe (1942) gives more detail, and R. J. Smithson's The Anabaptists (1935) is a reliable popular account. Roland Bainton's treatment of the Anabaptists in his Reformation of the Sixteenth Century (1952) is the best in any general history of the Reformation or of the church as a whole. At last the true character of the Anabaptists is being reported by the best modern church historians, among whom the American Bainton is a peer. W. Wiswedel's well-written and reliable essays on a large number of Anabaptist leaders and episodes in his 3-volume work, Bilder und Führergestalten aus dem Täufertum (1928, 1930, 1952), together with numerous articles in scholarly journals, stamp him as one of the best living scholarly popular writers in Anabaptism. He writes ex animo.

In prewar Austria the Hutterian Brethren had their history written by their own chroniclers and distributed by means of copies. To the outside world the brotherhood was shut away for centuries. These valuable documents were published in extracts in 1883 by Josef Beck in volume 43 of the Oesterreichische Geschichts-Quellen as Geschichts-Bücher der Wiedertäufer. Finally the full publication of the large Geschicht-Buch was accomplished by Rudolf Wolkan in 1923 and A. J. F. Zieglschmid in 1943, followed by the Klein-Geschichtsbuch by Zieglschmid in 1947. The large Hutterian hymnbook had already been published in 1914; the fully edited scholarly edition by Zieglschmid (manuscript deposited in the Goshen College Library) still awaits a publisher.

There had already been some articles published by Gregor Wolny on the Anabaptists in Moravia (1850) and by von Kripp on the Anabaptist movement in Tirol (1857). The work and collection of materials of Beck was followed by publications by Alexander Nicoladoni on Johannes Bünderlin (1888 and 1893), by Joseph Jäkel on the Anabaptist movement in Upper Austria (1889 and 1895), by the outstanding scholar Joh. Loserth on the Anabaptist movement in Tirol (1892 and 1894), on Balthasar Hubmaier (1893), the Anabaptist movement in Moravia and Styria (1894), on the communism of the Hutterites in Moravia (1894), and on the movement in Lower Austria (1899), besides numerous articles in the Mennonitisches Lexikon and in other periodicals. Loserth's work is of the highest quality. Worthy of mention are also the works by Hartmann Amman on the Anabaptist movement in the Puster Valley (1896 and 1897), by Georg Loesche on Anabaptism and Protestantism in Tirol and Vorarlberg (1926), by Robert Friedmann on the Habaner (q.v.) in Czechoslovakia (1927), by Lydia Müller on the communism of the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia (1927), by Fr. Hruby on the Anabaptists in Moravia (1935), by Franz Kolb on the movement in the Wipptal (1951), and by Widmoser on Tyrolese Anabaptism (1951). John Horsch's Hutterian Brethren (1929) is the only good general work on the Hutterites in English.

A stately series of writings has also been produced in Switzerland, the country of Anabaptist origins. In addition to the studies by Füsslin, pioneer work was done by Emil Egli on the Anabaptists in Zürich (1878) and in St. Gall (1887), and in his important collection of court records regarding the history of the Swiss Reformation (Actensammlung zur Schweizerischen Reformationsgeschichte, 1879). Egli's research in the field of church history yielded disclosures fundamental to the study of Mennonite origins. After his death Georg Finsler published (in 1910) the first volume of the history of the Swiss Reformation (1519-25), which Egli had almost completed. Here Egli's research is unusually comprehensive, precisely on the Anabaptist movement. From the socio-economic viewpoint Ernst H. Correll throws light on Swiss Anabaptist-Mennonites (1925); his work was the first thorough presentation of an Anabaptist group in the sociological sense. (See Historiography: Switzerland and Historiography: France below for further details.)

On the Anabaptist movement in Italy the publications of Karl Benrath, Wiedertäufer im Venetianischen (1885) and Reformation in Venedig (1887), have been superseded by the work of Henry DeWind "Anabaptism and Italy" in Church History (1952), based on his unpublished doctoral dissertation at the University of Chicago, "Relations Between Italian Reformers and the Anabaptists in the Mid-Sixteenth Century" (1951). DeWind has shown that there was no true Anabaptist movement in Italy, Benrath and Comba (I Nostri Protestante, 1897) having confused anti-Trinitarians with Anabaptists. (See Italy.)

Anabaptism in England will receive full treatment for the first time in Irvin Horst's doctoral dissertation (Amsterdam, 1957).

The chief repository of scholarly articles on Anabaptist history, theology, etc., is the Mennonite Quarterly Review, which since its founding in 1927 has published a vast amount of material in this field and seeks to keep abreast of current research. Significant articles have appeared in Archiv für Reformations-Geschichte and in Church History.

Independent judgments on the Anabaptist movement are found in few handbooks on church history. One of the first objective presentations was that by Max Goebel in his Geschichte des christlichen Lebens in der evangelischen rheinisch-westfälischen Kirche (1848). The most thorough evaluations were given by K. Müller in his Kirchengeschichte (2nd ed. 1922) and Möller-Kawerau in Lehrbuch der Kirchengeschichte (1907). Noteworthy articles appear in HRE (3rd ed., 1896-1908), and in RGG (2nd ed., 1926).

The historiography of utopian as well as scientific socialism also dealt with Anabaptism. This trend, represented especially by Kautsky (Vorläufer des neueren Sozialismus I, 1895) and Bernstein (d. 1932), had two objectives: (1) to explain the Reformation in general according to the principles of materialistic historiography; (2) to see especially in the Anabaptist movement the "forerunners of modern socialism." A critical summary of these attempts was given for the first time in Correll, Das schweizerische Täufermennonitentum (1925), p. 6 f.; see also p. 16; see also his sections "Allgemeine historisch-soziologische Kennzeichnung des Täufertums" and "Ausbreitung und ökonomisch-sozialer Charakter des Täufer-Mennonitentums" with historiographical remarks. Socialistic historiography has to its credit the recognition of the distinction between radical and pacifist Anabaptists. Recently East German writers have exploited the Anabaptists for the Communist cause; e.g., K. Kleinschmidt, Thomas Münzer (1952).

Finally the religio-sociological standard works by Ernst Troeltsch (Protestantisches Christentum und Kirche in der Neuzeit, 1909, and Die Soziallehren der christlichen Kirchen und Gruppen, 3rd ed. 1923, translated into English, The Social Teachings of the Christian Churches, N.Y., 1936) and Max Weber (Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie I, 1920, and "Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft" in Grundriss der Sozialökonomie, 1922) have removed the last trace of a sectarian judgment. To the same end Walther Köhler (1870-1946), the Zwingli scholar, worked in an eminently objective manner.

For a treatment of bibliographies see the article on this subject in Volume I of this ENCYCLOPEDIA.

Source Publications. The past 30 years have witnessed a significant amount of publication of major Anabaptist sources. The first such enterprise was the publication of two Marpeck writings, one, the Vermahnung edited by Christian Hege in the Gedenkschrift of 1925, the other the Verantwortung edited by Johann Loserth in 1929 (Quellen und Forschungen zur Geschichte der oberdeutschen Taufgesinnten im 16. Jahrhundert). Meanwhile the Verein für Reformationsgeschichte, led by Hans von Schubert and Otto Scheel, had undertaken the publication of all Anabaptist archival sources in the German language area, under the series title, Quellen zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer (changed to Täufer in 1951). The following volumes appeared before 1940: Herzogtum Württemberg 1930, Markgraftum Brandenburg (Bayern I) 1934, Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter (Hutterite) 1938. After World War II, the Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein (q.v.) now being a partner in the project, the following additional volumes appeared: Bayern II 1951, Baden-Pfalz 1951, Hans Denk's Works 1956. Further volumes are in preparation: Alsace I (Strasbourg), Glaubenszeugnisse II, Württemberg II, Hutterite Epistles 2 vv., Austria 3 vv., Rhineland 2 vv.

The Täuferakten for Hesse (1527-1626) were also published in 1951 by the Historische Kommission für Hessen und Waldeck, and in 1952 Leonhard von Muralt began the publication of a Swiss Anabaptist source series (Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer in der Schweiz) with a volume on Zürich, to be followed by a volume containing the Berner Gespräch of 1538, and at least two other volumes.

The two great Hutterite chronicles have been published, the first in two editions (Wolkan, Vienna, 1923, and Zieglschmid, Philadelphia, 1943), the second, again by Zieglschmid, in 1947 at Philadelphia. Riedemann's Rechenschaft was reprinted twice (in 1903 at Scottdale, Pa., and in 1938 in England), then published in an English translation in England in 1949. The Mennonite Quarterly Review has published a series of English translations of shorter documents and tracts by J. C. Wenger, such as the Schleitheim Confession. The American Series, The Christian Classics, published in 1956 one volume on the Anabaptists and related groups.

There has been extensive use of the Anabaptist theme in literature, with the Münsterites used most often. Two doctoral dissertations surveyed this field up to 1913: W. Rauch, Johann von Leiden, der König von Sion, in der deutschen Dichtung (Leipzig, 1912), and H. Hermsen, Die Wiedertäufer zu Münster in der deutschen Dichtung (Stuttgart, 1913). Elizabeth H. Bender published a series of articles on Anabaptists and Mennonites in German and American literature in the Mennonite Quarterly Review 1943-46, and Mary E. Bender's doctoral dissertation (Indiana, 1957) surveys the field since 1900.

The hymnology of the Anabaptists received an outstanding treatment by Rudolf Wolkan in his Die Lieder der Wiedertäufer (Berlin, 1903). The great German hymnologist, Philipp Wackernagel, treated Anabaptist hymnology twice. His Lieder der niederländischen Reformierten aus der Zeit der Verfolgung im 16. Jahrhundert (Frankfurt, 1867) is largely devoted to Dutch Anabaptist hymns, reproducing a total of 79, while volume III of his Das deutsche Kirchenlied (Leipzig, 1870) reprints 45 hymns of German Anabaptists (441-86). (See Hymnology.)

The only comprehensive treatment of Anabaptist historiography to date is that by Christian Hege in his article Geschichtsschreibung in ML II, 96-101, to which the present article is much indebted. H.S.B.

Historiography II: Switzerland. General Histories. The best general accounts of the Anabaptist-Mennonite movement in Switzerland are those by C. Henry Smith, The Story of the Mennonites (3rd ed. 1950), and John Horsch, Mennonites in Europe (2nd ed. 1950). Samuel Geiser, the only Mennonite historian of Switzerland, published a very valuable history of the Swiss Mennonites under the title Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (1931, pp. 496), but as the title suggests it is not limited to the Swiss, only pp. 126-214 and 369-486 being devoted to this group. Anna Brons, Ursprung, Entwickelung . . . der Mennoniten (1884) has a generous section on Switzerland. Ernst Correll, Das schweizerische Täufermennonitentum, Ein soziologischer Bericht (1925, pp. 145), includes France and South Germany. Ernst Müller's Geschichte der Bernischen Täufer (1895, pp. 411) and Delbert Gratz's Bernese Anabaptists (1953, pp. 205) are thorough regional histories, Gratz including emigrant settlements in Europe and America. All general surveys of Anabaptism and Mennonitism must of course pay attention to the history of Swiss Anabaptism as the initial aspect of the whole movement and need not be further mentioned here; likewise general or cantonal histories of Swiss Protestantism. However, A. H. Newman's A History of Antipedobaptism . . . to 1609 has a very good section on Swiss Anabaptism, pp. 88-152; J. H. Ott's Annales Anabaptistici, hoc est Historia Universalis de Anabaptistarum origine, progressu . . . (1672; pp. 360) reports chronologically year by year, consists largely of quotations from sources, and does not segregate Swiss material, though containing much of it. J. Heberle, "Die Anfänge des Anabaptismus in der Schweiz," Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie III (1858), 225-79, and C. A. Cornelius, Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs II, Die Wiedertaufe (1860, pp. 413), 1-30 and 240-50, are excellent. Special monographs on Swiss Anabaptism include: H. S. Burrage, A History of the Anabaptists in Switzerland (1882, pp. 230); Gottfried Strasser, "Der Schweizerische Anabaptismus zur Zeit der Reformation," in Berner Beiträge zur Geschichte der Schweizerischen Reformationskirchen (1889, pp. 168-245); and Richard Nitsche, Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in der Schweiz (1885, pp. 107). L. von Muralt gives a valuable summary of Swiss Anabaptist doctrines in Glaube und Lehre der schweizerischen Täufer in der Reformationszeit (1938, pp. 49), while H. Lüdemann, Reformation und Täufertum in ihrem geschichtlichen Verhältnis zum christlichen Prinzip (1896, pp. 95) sharply attacks the Anabaptist position. Georg Thormann gives a valuable report on the Swiss Anabaptists of the 17th century, particularly in Bern, in his Probier-Stein oder Schriftmässige und aus dem wahren innerlichen Christenthumb Hergenommene Gewissenhafte Prüfung des Täuffertums (1693, pp. 610). Robert Friedmann's Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries, Its Genius and Its Literature (1949, pp. 287), besides the chapter "The Devotional Literature of the Swiss Brethren 1600-1800" (pp. 154-75), devotes the first part (pp. 3-90) to a treatment of "Anabaptism and Pietism" based largely on a study of the Swiss J. J. Wolleb, Gespräche zwischen einem Pietisten und Wiedertäuffer (Basel, 1722, pp. 314). Paul Peachey's Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer (1954, pp. 157) gives the first thorough report on the social origins of the Swiss Anabaptist population.

Cantonal and Local Histories. Zürich, known as the birthplace of Anabaptism, has received the most frequent treatment. Heinrich Bullinger's two books, Von dem unverschampten fräfel . . . (1531, folios 178) and Der Widerteufferen Ursprung, fürgang, Secten, wäsen (1560, pp. 231), while most valuable, are polemical attacks rather than history. The best monograph is Cornelius Bergmann, Die Täuferbewegung in Kanton Zürich bis 1660 (1916, pp. 176). But see also Emil Egli, Die Züricher Wiedertäufer zur Reformationszeit (1878, pp. 104), and Walther Köhler, "Die Züricher Täufer" in Gedenkschrift zum 400-jährigen Jubiläum der Mennoniten (1925), 48-64. Fritz Blanke's brilliant Brüder in Christo (1955, pp. 88) tells the story of the rise and end of the first Anabaptist congregation at Zollikon, canton of Zürich, in 1525. Paul Kläui, Geschichte der Gemeinde Horgen (1952, pp. 746), 185-92, includes the story of the Anabaptist congregation at Horgen. Walter Rauschenbusch, "The Zürich Anabaptists and Thomas Müntzer," in Amer. Journal of Theology (1905, pp. 91-106), prints Grebel's letter to Müntzer in 1524 with comments. A report of persecutions in the Zürich territory 1635-45 is contained in an undated pamphlet, Ein warhafftiger Bericht von den Brüdern im Schweitzerland, in dem Zürcher Gebiet, wegen der Trübsalen, which has been reprinted (46 pp.) in all American editions of the Ausbund beginning in 1742. See also Wahrhaffter Bericht unsers des Bürgermeisters . . . der Statt Zürich . . . unserer Handlungen gegen den Widertäufferen (1639, pp. 71). Other cantonal and local histories worthy of note are Emil Egli, Die St. Galler Täufer (1887, pp. 64); Ernst Müller, "Langnauer Täufer vor 200 Jahren," in Kirchliches Jahrbuch für den Kanton Bern IV (1893) 63-133; P. Burckhardt, Die Basler Täufer (1898, pp. 125); C. A. Bächtold, "Die Schaffhauser Wiedertäufer in der Reformationszeit" in Beiträge zur vaterländischen Geschichte (1900, pp. 73-118); W. J. McGlothlin, Die Berner Täufer bis 1532 (1902, pp. 37); G. Appenzeller, "Solothurner Täufertum im 16. Jahrhundert," in Festschrift für Eugen Tatonioff (1938, pp. 110-34) and "Beiträge zur Geschichte des Solothurner Täufertums" in Jahrbuch f. Sol. Geschichte (1941, pp. 50-89); A. Fluri, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Bernischen Täufer (1912, pp. 69, reprint from Blätter f. Bernische Geschichte, . . .); J. Heiz, "Täufer im Aargau" in Taschenbuch . . . des Kantons Aargau (1902, pp. 107-205); R. Feller, "Die Anfänge des Täufertums in Bern" in Festgabe für Heinrich Türler (1931, pp. 105-12); O. Vasella, "Von den Anfängen der Bündnerischen Täuferbewegung," in Ztscht f. Schw. Geschichte (1938, pp. 165-84). T. de Quervain's Kirchliche und soziale Zustände in Bern (1906, pp. 286) has a good chapter on the Anabaptists (pp. 120-58) and Max Stiefel's similar Die kirchlichen Zustände im Knonaueramt nach der Reformation 1531-1600 (1947) has a useful chapter on the Anabaptists (pp. 152-67); R. Wolkan, Die Lieder der Wiedertäufer (1903, pp. 295), has considerable sections on the hymns of the Swiss Brethren (pp. 26-56, 118-64). For biographies of Conrad Grebel, the founder of Zürich Anabaptism, see Christian Neff, "Konrad Grebel," in Gedenkschrift (op. cit., pp. 65-133) and H. S. Bender, Conrad Grebel (1950, pp. 326). Beatrice Jenny's theological treatment, Das Schleitheimer Täuferbekenntnis" 1527 (1951, pp. 81), taken with Fritz Blanke's "Beobachtungen zum ältesten Täuferbekenntnis" in Arch. f. Ref.-Geschichte (1940, pp. 242-48) and J. C. Wenger's translation and commentary, "The Schleitheim Confession of Faith," in MQR XXIV (1950, pp. 243-53), gives a definitive picture. Milton Gascho's "The Amish Division of 1693-1697 in Switzerland" in MQR XI (1937, pp. 235-66) is excellent, based on the sources. Jan Matthijssen gives a good account of the great Bern disputation of 1538 in MQR XXII (1948, pp. 19-33). M. de Boer's "Vom Thunersee zum Sappemeer, ein Täufer- und Auswandererschicksal aus drei Jahrhunderten," in Berner Zeitschrift für Geschichte und Heimatkunde (1947) 1-24, is a valuable account of the Swiss Mennonite settlement in Holland in 1711 ff.

Source publications. The Swiss Anabaptist sources are to be published in a series of at least four volumes, Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer in der Schweiz, of which Vol. I, Zürich, edited by L. von Muralt and Walter Schmid (replacing Egli's Aktensammlung of 1879) appeared in 1952 (pp. 428). The next volume (due in 1957) is to be the record of the Bern disputation of 1538. J. C. Füsslin, Beiträge zur Erläuterung der Kirchen-Reformations-Geschichten des Schweitzerlandes, 5 vv. (1741-53), contains much material not in von Muralt-Schmid, which stops with 1533. The discussions of the Reformed preachers of Bern with Hans Pfistermeyer in 1531 were printed under the title Ein christenlich Gespräch (pp. 90). Oecolampadius' written reply to the Anabaptists Carlin and Hubmaier appeared in 1527 under the title Underrichtung von dem Widertauff von der Oberkeit, und von dem Eyd, auff Carlins N. Widertauffers Artikel and Antwort auff Balthasar Hümeiers Büchlein wider der Predicanten Gespräch zu Basel von dem Kindertauff (pp. 103). The only other public Anabaptist disputation to be published was that of Zofingen of 1532 (Handlungen oder Acta der Disputation gehalten zu Zofingen, 1532, folios 154). H.S.B.

Historiography III: France. No adequate treatment of the history of Anabaptism or Mennonitism in France has been published, and the French Mennonites have produced no thorough historians. Pierre Sommer (1874-1952), long a leader in the French Conference, did more than anyone else to gather and publish historical materials. (See Pages choisies de Pierre Sommer précédées d'une Esquisse Biographique, 1955, pp. 143). With Valentin Pelsy he published Précis d'Histoire des Eglises Mennonites (1914, new ed. 1937, pp. 162), but the section "Les Mennonites en France" contains only nine pages (119-28). His most extensive work was done in a historical series in Christ Seul, which he founded in 1907 (preliminary publication 1901-7), published 1930-33 in 49 articles with separate historical sketches of all existing and extinct Mennonite congregations in France. His successor as editor of Christ Seul, Pierre Widmer, is also historically active, having published Almanach Cinquantenaire (1901-1951), with much historical material. Pierre Sommer also contributed numerous articles to the Mennonitisches Lexikon including the one on France. C. Henry Smith, John Horsch, and Anna Brons have little on the history of the French Mennonites in their general volumes.

The history of Anabaptism in Alsace has been treated in all the general works on Anabaptism, and also in monographs, the best of which is A. Hulshof, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg van 1525 tot 1557 (1905, pp. 262). Louis Hauth, Les Anabaptistes à Strasbourg au Temps de la Reformation (1860, pp. 34), although a Strasbourg dissertation (B.Th.), is unimportant. Much more valuable is the work of T. W. Röhrich, "Zur Geschichte der Strassburgischen Wiedertäufer in den Jahren 1527 bis 1534," in Ztscht f. hist. Theologie (1860, pp. 3-121), and particularly Camill Gerbert, Geschichte der Strassburger Sectenbewegung . . . 1524-1534 (1889, pp. 200). See also X. Mosemann, Les Anabaptistes á Colmar 1534-35. Robert Kreider, "The Anabaptists and the Civil Authorities of Strasbourg 1525-1555" in Church History (1955, 99-118) has much to contribute, as does Christian Neff's article Martin Bucer (ME I, 455-60).

On the Mennonites of France in the last 250 years see Les soirées Helvetiennes, Alsaciennes, et Fran-Comtoises (1772), A. Michiels, Les Anabaptistes des Vosges (1860, pp. 333), and Ch. Mathiot, Recherches historiques sur les Anabaptistes de l'Ancienne Principauté de Montbéliard, d'Alsace et des Regions voisines (1922, pp. 158). "Anabaptistes" in these titles refers to modern Mennonites, since the latter term had not come into general use in the French language until recently. Correll's Das schweizerische Täufermennonitentum (1925) has a strong section on the modern French Mennonites, "Die Täuferemigranten im Elsass, in Baden und der Kurpfalz (der 'elsässische' und 'pfälzische' Mennonit im besonderen)" pp. 75-135, with special emphasis on the sociological and agricultural aspects. Paul Leuillot, "Les Anabaptistes Alsaciens Sous le Second Empire d'après une Enquête Administrative de 1850" in Journal d'Alsace LXXXVII (1947) 207-11, calls attention to a valuable governmental report. P. Marthelot, "Les Mennonites dans L'Est de la France" in Revue de Géographie Alpine XXXVIII (1950) 475-91, is a useful socio-geographic account of the Mennonites in Alsace and Lorraine, emphasizing their agricultural contribution. H.S.B.

Historiography IV: Netherlands. Introduction. Anabaptism in the Low Countries began predominantly as a movement among the lower classes of the cities. In the Netherlands the Mennonites shunned the "world" more consistently and extremely than anywhere else, but being mainly urban and sharing the wealth and opportunities of the Golden Age of the country, the more progressive factions of Dutch Mennonitism gradually become secularized. They began to take part in all the functions of the social, cultural, economic, and political life of the country. Soon we find among them men like the great writer Joost van den Vondel, and the poet and painter Carel van Mander. Thus it is not surprising that scholarly inquiry into the beginnings of their own history could grow and develop.

When a movement originates in struggle and persecution there is little time for retrospection and objective description of facts. This was especially true in the case of the Dutch Anabaptists, who for a long time were persecuted, gradually tolerated, and finally granted freedom. The early literature relating to them, as during the first centuries of the Christian church, was produced by both friend and foe. Controversy is the characteristic of all historic literature of this period. And Anabaptism had to struggle not only with the foe outside the flock but also the foe within the brotherhood. The attempt to establish a church "without spot or wrinkle" caused the internal controversy. Accordingly, before entering the field of modern historiography, it is necessary to follow the high lights of this controversial literature as far as it has value for the historian of Mennonitism.

Controversial Historical Literature (1530-1740). 1. External Controversy. Before Menno Simons withdrew from the Catholic Church and became the leader of the Dutch Anabaptists he wrote "a very clear and explicit" pamphlet against Jan van Leiden, the king of the New Jerusalem (1535). But Menno Simons was involved in religious discussions with more worthy opponents than Jan van Leiden. John a Lasco, reformer of East Friesland, had a religious debate with Menno Simons in Emden in 1544, after which Menno presented to him his confession of faith (Opera omnia, 517-42; Complete Writings, 419-54). A Lasco replied to this (J. a Lasco, Opera, ed. A. Kuyper I, 1866, 1-60). Gellius Faber, who had participated in the debate, wrote a pamphlet against the Anabaptists in which he denied the proper calling of the Anabaptist minister (Eine antwert . . . vp einen bitterhönischen breeff der Wedderdöper, Magdeburg, 1552). In answering this challenge Menno gives the most detailed and valuable information concerning his development as a priest and consequent conversion to Anabaptism (Een klare beantwoordinge over een schrift Gellii Fabri, Opera, 225-324; Complete Writings, 623-781).

An early and outstanding Catholic opponent of Menno Simons and the Anabaptists was M. Duncanus (Anabaptisticae haereseos confutatio et vere Christiana baptismi ac potissimum paedobaptismatis assertio, adversus M. Simonis Frisii virulentas de baptismo blasphemias 1549). The strongest attack by a representative of the Reformed Church of this time was made by Guido de Bray (La racine, source et fondement des anabaptistes ou rebaptisez de nostre temps, 1561). A number of reprints of a Dutch translation appeared, and an English translation at Cambridge, Mass., in 1668. The great Reformed theologian Dathenus (q.v.) was not only the chief opponent of the Anabaptists at the Frankenthal debate (1571) but also a writer against them. Gerhard Nicolai translated Heinrich Bullinger's Adversus anabaptistas into the Dutch and added a refutation of Dutch Anabaptism (Inlasschingen in het vertaalde werk v. Bullinger: "Teghens de Wederdoopers," Embden, 1569, reprinted in BRN VII). The complete record of the religious debate held at Emden (1578) between representatives of the Reformed Church and the Mennonites continuing through 124 sessions (see Emden Disputation) was published. A similar debate consisting of 156 sessions, held at Leeuwarden in 1595 (see Leeuwarden Disputation), was also published. Pieter van Keulen was the outstanding Mennonite representative at both places.

J. P. van der Meulen wrote the Successio Apostolica (1600) to prove that the Anabaptist church was in direct lineal descent from the Apostolic Church. A Catholic priest (Simon Walraven) answered this in the Successio Anabaptistica (1603), which proved to be an important source for Mennonite history, and was reprinted by S. Cramer (BRN VII). H. Faukelius, a Reformed minister, wrote Babel, d. i. Verwerringhe der Weder-dooperen onder malkanderen (1621), in an attempt to produce evidence of the weakness and heresy of Anabaptism because of its numerous divisions. This was answered by A. Roscius, among others, in Babel, d. i. Verwerringe der Kinderdooperen onder malcanderen (1626). He pointed out that on the same grounds the believers in infant baptism must be guilty of greater heresy, since there were more divisions among them than among the Anabaptists. J. Cloppenburch was another minister who wrote against the Anabaptists (Gangraena Theologiae Anabaptisticae, 1645). A well-known source on Anabaptism is Grouwelen der voornaemster Hooft-Ketteren . . . (1623) which was originally published in Latin and translated into German and Dutch (Catalogus Amst., 7). J. Hoornbeek, a Reformed theologian, wrote numerous books concerning the Anabaptists, among which Summae controversarium Religionis (1658) is outstanding. His colleague F. F. Spanheim also participated in this controversy. His book, Selectarum de religione controversiarum elenchus (1687), was answered by the Mennonite minister Engel Arendszoon van Dooregeest, in Brief aan den Heer F. Spanhemius Prof. der H. Godsgeleertheyt en der Historien tot Leyden. Another outstanding defender of the Mennonite cause was the well-known physician and minister of the Mennonite Church at Amsterdam, Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan, in his Verdediging der Christenen die Doopsgezinde genaamd worden, beneffans korte grondstellingen van hun gelove en leere (1699). Among the many books of devotional, controversial, and historical character written by Pieter Jansz Twisck we mention in this connection his Chronijck van den Onderganc der Tijrannen (2 vols., 1619-20).

About the middle of the 18th century a revival of controversy occurred, when the Mennonites were accused by their Reformed neighbors of harboring Socinian beliefs. This accusation centered mainly around the gifted Mennonite minister, Johannes Stinstra. A case similar to Stinstra's was that of A. van der Os. A detailed account of this controversy was given in Chr. Sepp's Johannes Stinstra en zijn tijd (2 vv., Amst. 1865-66); W. J. van Douwen's Socinianen en Doopsgezinden (Leiden, 1898); W. J. Kühler's Het Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1912); and J. C. van Slee's De Geschiedenis van het Socinianisme in de Nederlanden (Haarlem, 1914). (For further literature on it, see Catalogus Amst., 109-46.) The article "De Nederlandsche gereformeerde synoden tegenover de Doopsgezinden (1563-1620)" by F. S. Knipscheer (DB 1910 and 1911) discusses the attitudes of the Reformed synods to the Mennonites. The proceedings of the Reformed synods were published by Reitsma and van Veen in Acta der Provinciale en Particuliere Synoden (I-VII, 1892-98).

2. Internal Controversy. Historical source material can be found in both devotional and controversial literature. Furthermore, in some instances it is hard to distinguish between the two types, since a given book may have both purposes. A number of books by Menno Simons and Dirk Philips deal with matters of internal controversy. Outstanding are questions of church discipline, that is, excommunication and shunning. A valuable account of the origin and the divisions among the early Anabaptists was written by Obbe Philips (Bekenntenisse, 1584, reprinted in BRN VII). He had baptized Menno Simons and his own brother Dirk Philips, but later withdrew from the brotherhood. A similarly significant source is Het beginsel en voortganck der geschillen, scheuringen, ein verdeeltheden . . . (1659, reprinted in BRN VII).

The outstanding contribution of the Anabaptists of the 16th century to the field of devotional and historical literature was the compilation and publication of Het Offer des Heeren (1562), the first edition of the famous collection of biographies, testimonies, and songs of Anabaptist martyrs (reprinted in BRN II). Hans de Ries, the prominent writer and leader of the more liberal Mennonites (Waterlanders), enlarged this collection considerably and had it published in 1615 under the title Historie der Martelaaren. P. J. Twisck, a voluminous writer and representative of the more conservative Mennonites (Old Frisians), edited a reprint of this edition for his churches and added a confession of faith (1617). The resulting controversy brought forth a significant description of the inner conditions of the Mennonite church during the latter part of the 16th and early 17th centuries in Hans Alenson's Tegen-Bericht op de voor-Reden van 't groote Martelaer Boeck der Doops-Ghesinde, 1630 (BRN VII).

Better known is the enlarged edition of the Martyrs' Mirror edited by Tieleman Jansz van Braght under the following title: Het Bloedigh Tooneel der Doops-gezinde en Weereloose Christenen, die om het getuygenisse Jesu . . . geleden hebben en gedoodt zijn, v. Christi tijt af, tot dese onse laeste tijden toe. Mitsgaders een beschrijvinge des H. Doops en stucken . . . Begrepen in twee boecken. Zijnde een vergrootinge vande voorgaenden Martelaers-Spiegel (1660). The second edition (1685) was illustrated by the Mennonite artist and poet Jan Luyken. Van Braght's book is not merely a compilation of facts and biographies concerning the Anabaptist martyrs, as the previous edition had been, but an attempt to interpret history. In tracing the history of the martyrs from the Apostolic Church down to the Anabaptist persecution he concludes that the true Christian church has always had its martyrs. He also includes a history of baptism in his book proving that adult baptism was practiced during the first centuries of the Christian church and was later replaced by infant baptism (see Martyrology).

Until the middle of the 17th century the internal controversy in Holland centered mainly around questions of the degree of rigidity and strictness of church discipline and the attitude of the church toward the world. This divided the Mennonites into numerous factions such as Waterlanders, Frisians, Flemish, and others, which in turn were again subdivided. Then a great new upheaval overshadowed the former divisions and caused the formation of two main wings. This was caused by the rationalistic-pietistic movement of the Collegiants and the Socinians, mentioned above in connection with the discussion on the external controversy of the Mennonites.

Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan, a brilliant physician and minister of the Flemish Mennonite Church of Amsterdam, became the central figure of the Collegiant movement in the Netherlands. His chief opponent was his colleague, Samuel Apostool, also a physician and minister in the same church. The latter represented the conservative Mennonite groups, while the former, influenced by modern trends and thought of his time, advocated a liberal reformation of his church. Being an outstanding and influential leader he had a large following. The controversy resulted in a split in the Amsterdam church in 1664 which gradually spread throughout the country. The followers of Galenus were known as "Lamists" and those of Apostool as "Zonists" from the names of their respective meetinghouses in Amsterdam. From the flood of pamphlets and writings which resulted from this controversy only a few typical titles will be given here. Theodore van der Meer wrote Het Gekraay van een Socianiaanse Haan, onder Doopsgezinde Veederen (1663). An outstanding anonymous pamphlet was Lammerenkrijgh (1663). Most recently this era and controversy has been treated by H. W. Meihuizen in Galenus Abrahamsz (1954).

Beginnings of Scholarly Historiography. During the first half of the 18th century the historiography of the Dutch Mennonites became more scholarly. It was, however, not the liberal wing that made the first contribution of this type. To be sure, they had founded a theological seminary at Amsterdam in 1735, but their main interest centered around current problems, such as the relationship of religion to natural science, philosophy, etc. The spirit of unlimited tolerance and increasing indifference which was spreading among them was not conducive to appreciation and study of their past; hence this progressive wing of the Mennonites could not at this time make any significant scholarly contributions in this field. At the threshold of modern historiography in the Netherlands there are representatives of the conservative "Zonists" like Herman Schijn, Gerardus Maatschoen, and Marten Schagen.

Schijn's first book, Korte historie der protestante Christenen, die men Mennoniten of Doopsgezinden noemt . . . (1711), was written for the general public. Encouraged by the fact that scholars abroad made wide use of it, he wrote a Latin version of his book (Historia Christianorum qui in Belgi Foeder. inter Protestantes Mennonitae appellantur, 1723), which was followed by a second volume (Historiae Mennonitarum plenior deductio, etc., 1729). M. van Maurik translated these two volumes into Dutch (1727 and 1738). Maatschoen, like Schijn, a minister and physician at Amsterdam, made another translation and added a preface, annotations, illustrations, and a third volume (Geschiedenis dier Christenen, welke in de Vereenigde Nederlanden onder de Protestanten Mennoniten genaamd worden, 1743-45). Although these men were not scholarly historians in the modern sense of the term, they produced a significant piece of work in compiling much valuable material. They viewed past and present controversial matters objectively and encouraged others to continue along these lines. Another ardent collector of Anabaptistica and the author of a book on the Waldenses was Marten Schagen, linguist, book dealer, and minister. He was the translator of F. S. Rues's Aufrichtige Nachrichten von dem gegewärtigen Zustande der Mennoniten . . . (Jena, 1743) into Dutch (Tegenwoordige Staet der Doopsgezinden of Mennoniten, in de Vereenigde Nederlanden, 1745), to which he added material of his own. The extent of the libraries owned by Rues and by Maatschoen, as revealed in the printed catalogs, indicates their extraordinary interest and knowledge in this new field of study. Non-Mennonite writers who should be mentioned in addition to Rues are Jakob Mehrning (S. Baptismi Historia: Das ist, Heilige Tauff-Historia . . .), the Remonstrant historian Geeraert Brandt (Historie der Reformatie, 4 volumes, 1671-1704), A. Moubach and B. Picard (Naaukeurige Beschryving der uitwendige Godstdienst-plichten, 6 volumes, 1727-38).

The second half of the 18th century is marked by a general indifference and decline in Dutch Mennonite church life. Both numerically and spiritually the group reached its lowest level at the end of the century. To be sure, in 1778 the noted Teyler Theological Association (Teyler's Godgeleerd Genootschap) of Haarlem was founded and has contributed, especially of late, to the promotion of research in the field of Anabaptistica. At that time, however, in accordance with the general spirit of the age, the relationship of religion to the natural sciences and philosophy was the main concern of the organization. Thus Mennonite historiography received a setback from which it did not recover until the beginning of the 19th century.

A Century of Historiography (1840-1940). The beginning of the 19th century marks a new era in the history of Dutch Mennonites. The most sincere and loyal among them realized the necessity of uniting the scattered churches and the divided forces of the small brotherhood. After a number of local unions had been formed, the Dutch Mennonite conference, Algemeene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit (A.D.S.), was organized in 1811, which included nearly all the Mennonite congregations of the Netherlands and the adjacent German Mennonite churches. The general and main purpose of this organization was to care for the spiritual and economic welfare of the churches and to prevent further decline. To accomplish this the newly established A.D.S. accepted the supervision of the Mennonite Theological Seminary at Amsterdam, which had thus far been taken care of by the local Amsterdam congregation, and gave financial support to small churches which could not provide for themselves.

The revived church life as well as the newly established church unions aroused historical interest. From this time on the Mennonite Theological Seminary of Amsterdam was the center of Mennonite historical research. Efficient professors and librarians collected and preserved, in the library and archives of the Mennonite Church of Amsterdam, what is now known as the best collection of Dutch Anabaptistica. The first of the professors to pioneer in this field was Samuel Muller. He introduced a course in Mennonite history at the seminary and founded and edited the Jaarboekje voor de Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in Nederland (1837-50). In addition he wrote numerous articles and collected much material. Furthermore, he inspired his students in theology to continue his work. A. M. Cramer wrote the first comprehensive biography of Menno Simons (Het leven en de verrigtingen van Menno Simons, 1837). S. Blaupot ten Cate was the author of an extensive and scholarly history of the Mennonites of the Netherlands which is indispensable even today, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Friesland (1839); Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Groningen, Overijssel en Oost-Friesland (1842), Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Holland, Zeeland, Utrecht en Gelderland (1849). J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, professor and librarian at Amsterdam, was editor of the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen (published 1861-1919) and a pioneer historian. Christiaan Sepp also carried on extensive research in the field of Anabaptist history. (Geschiedkundige Nasporingen, 3 vv., 1872-75; Johannes Stinstra en zijn tijd, 2 vv., 1865-66.)

1. The Origin of Anabaptism. The relationship between the Münsterite Anabaptists and Dutch Mennonitism had always been a touchy subject for the earlier Mennonite writers. From the time of the writings of Menno Simons against Jan van Leyden and Menno's Fundamentboek until the history of the Mennonites was written by Schijn-Maatschoen, the main object was defense. The opponents emphasized the similarities which pointed to a common origin with the fanatical elements in Anabaptism, while the Mennonite writers denied or minimized this and attempted to prove the Biblical character of their church, which they traced back, hypothetically, to the Apostolic Church. The interpretation of the history of the Mennonites by T. J. van Braght in the Martyrs' Mirror has been mentioned. In this theory of the Successio Apostolica the Waldenses furnished a welcome link. Outstanding among those who did research in the history of the Waldenses and their supposed connection with the Anabaptists was A. M. Cramer in his book on Menno Simons (1837). Neither he nor S. Blaupot ten Cate found any definite evidence of a direct lineage from the Waldenses to the Anabaptists. J. H. Halbertsma based his theory of historical connection on the similarities between the Waldenses and the Anabaptists (De Doopsgezinden en hunne herkomst, 1843). This proved to be a challenge for further research in that field. Blaupot ten Cate wrote Geschiedkundig onderzoek naar den Waldensischen oorsprong van de Nederlandsche Doopsgezinde (1844), while others made contributions of lesser importance to this field. However, even after the Dutch Mennonite historians had given up this theory, a staunch advocate arose in the German historian and archivist Ludwig Keller. In his numerous writings, he advocated the theory of the direct descent of the Anabaptists from what he called the pre-Reformation Old-Evangelical Brethren Churches. In this chain of evangelical churches, the Waldenses formed an important link (Die Reformation und die älteren Reformparteien, Leipzig, 1885, and other publications).

It must be noted that it was the research of the Catholic scholar C. A. Cornelius, which changed the approach to the problem radically (Berichte der Augenzeugen über das Münsterische Wiedertäuferreich, Münster, 1853; Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs, 2 vols., Leipzig, 1855-60). From that time on both Catholic and Protestant scholars gradually gave increasingly unprejudiced consideration to the Anabaptist movement of the 16th century.

The manner in which the assertion of a connection between the Mennonites and the Münsterite Anabaptists was revived in our own century is an irony of history. This time it was not a debate between an "orthodox" Catholic or Protestant and a "heretic" Anabaptist, but a lively and lengthy discussion between the two leading Dutch Mennonite historians, viz., Karel Vos, minister and historian, and W. J. Kühler, professor in the Mennonite Theological Seminary and the University of Amsterdam. In 1917 Vos published (in DB) "Kleine bijdragen over de Doopersche beweging in Nederland tot het optreden van Menno Simons." Influenced by the materialistic and socialistic interpretation of the Münster incident, Vos does not hesitate to consider the chiliastic and revolutionary element of Anabaptism, as it found its most extreme expression in the "kingdom" of Münster, as genuine original Dutch Anabaptism. According to this interpretation, the Biblicist peaceful element became dominant after the Münster catastrophe by falling from one extreme to another. Kühler replied to this in his article, "Het Nederlandsche Anabaptisme en de revolutionnaire woelingen der zestiende eeuw" (DB 1919). This in turn was answered by Vos in "Revolutionnaire Hervorming" (De Gids, LXXXIV, 1920). Kühler concluded the controversy with his "Het Anabaptisme in Nederland" (De Gids, 1921). In his article, as well as in his subsequently published history of the Mennonites in the Netherlands, Kühler emphasizes that the Biblicist peaceful type of Anabaptism, without the practicing of adult baptism, existed in the Netherlands before the preaching and baptizing by Melchior Hofmann in 1531 (in the Sacramentist movement, the Brethren of the Common Life, etc.). Hofmann and his preachers were reaping without sowing. After Hofmann's arrest the Anabaptist movement split into two groups: the left wing of Münster, and the right wing of Obbe and Dirk Philips, Menno Simons, and others. No doubt Kühler came closer to the historical truth than Vos, even though he probably overemphasized the independence of the reformatory movement in the Netherlands. One of the studies that have since appeared dealing with this subject is A. F. Mellink's De Wederdopers in de Noordelijke Nederlanden 1531-1544 (1954), which follows the Vos-Kautzky line, whereas N. van der Zijpp thoroughly criticized Vos' thesis in "Menno en Munster," in Stemmen (1953).

2. General and Local History. In addition to these histories on the origin of the Dutch Anabaptists some earlier and some recent monographs and studies of a general character deserve mention. The Mennonite historians of the 19th century, Samuel Muller, de Hoop Scheffer, Samuel Cramer, and others, furnished a number of articles on the Mennonites, Menno Simons, etc., for the internationally known encyclopedias of different countries. De Hoop Scheffer's article, "Korte geschiedenis der Mennoniten en Doopsgezinden" (DB 1882), translated from the second edition of the Real-Encyclopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche (see also Chr. Sepp, Bibliotheek, 387-89), and Cramer's article, "Mennoniten," in the third edition of this work, deserve special mention. The latter also wrote, among other contributions, a significant study, "De Doopsgezinde Broederschap in de negentiende eeuw" (DB 1901), and a survey of Dutch Mennonite statistics of the 19th century (DB 1902). The most significant history of the Mennonites of the Netherlands, after that by S. Blaupot ten Cate, was Anna Brons's Ursprung, Entwickelung und Schicksale der altevangelischen Taufgesinnten oder Mennoniten in kurzen Zügen übersichtlich dargestellt (1884), which covers the history of all Mennonites in all countries.

The need for a scholarly Dutch history of the Mennonites of the Netherlands grew more and more urgent. W. J. Kühler published Geschiedenis der Nederlandsche Doopsgezinden in de zestiende eeuw (Haarlem, 1932), which was continued in 1940 when the first half of the second volume appeared, now entitled Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Tweede deel, 1600-1735, eerste helft). After Kühler's death one chapter of Vol. II, Part 2, "Gemeentelijk leven," appeared (Haarlem, 1950). N. van der Zijpp published the first modern complete history in Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (1952). A general survey of early Anabaptism, including the Dutch, was written in England by R. J. Smithson entitled The Anabaptists, Their Contributions to our Heritage (London, 1935), and in America by H. E. Dosker, The Dutch Anabaptists (Philadelphia, 1921). C. Henry Smith's Story of the Mennonites (1941) and John Horsch's Mennonites in Europe (1942) give major attention to the history of Anabaptism in Europe, particularly in Holland, and later Dutch Mennonite history.

A. L. E. Verheyden has published considerable material on the Anabaptists in Flanders in addition to his major work, Het Mennisme in Vlanderen, which awaits publication in English or Dutch. Among his publications are Doopsgezinden te Gent (1943), and Anabaptist Martyrologes for Brügge (1945), Gent (1945), and Courtrai-Brussels (1950). Most valuable is Bibliographie des Martyrologes Protestants Néerlandais (2 vv., 1890) and Jean Meyhoffer, Le Martyrologe Protestant des Pays Bas 1523-1597 (1907). For further literature consult the Catalogus of the AML (146-55, 287-97).

The Lower Rhine and Northwest Germany until recent time were culturally in close contact with the Netherlands. Besides the works of Goebel (1848) and Rembert (1899), an outstanding contribution is the series of articles by Ernst Crous in Der Mennonit, May-August, 1956, "Von Täufern zu Mennoniten am Niederrhein."

3. Biographies and Genealogies. Melchior Hofmann was the medium through which Anabaptism was spread from South Germany to the Low Countries. He expounded his teachings in a number of books. For these reasons considerable literature about him is available. Teyler's Godgeleerd Genootschap awarded prizes for two biographies and published them. One was written by W. I. Leendertz entitled Melchior Hoffman (1883), and the other by F. O. zur Linden entitled Melchior Hofmann, ein Prophet der Wiedertäufer (1885). Samuel Cramer's edition of Melchior Hofmann's writings, with a valuable introduction, was published in 1909 as Volume V of BRN. The most recent publication is Melchior Hofmann als religiöser Denker by Peter Kawerau (1956). The latest biography which lists all the literature by and about David Joris, who for a while lived and worked in the Netherlands, is written by Roland H. Bainton and entitled David Joris Wiedertäufer und Kämpfer für Toleranz im 16. Jahrhundert (Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte, Ergänzungsband VI, Leipzig, 1906).

Throughout the century of Mennonite historiography no other leader was the object of as many studies as Menno Simons. A. M. Cramer pioneered in this field by presenting a thorough study, Het leven en de verrichtingen van Menno Simons (1837), on the occasion of the third centennial of Menno Simons' conversion. Of those who made special contributions in this field we mention J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, "Eenige opmerkingen en mededeelingen betr. Menno Simons" (DB 1864, 1865, 1872, 1881, 1889, 1890, 1892, 1894); G. E. Frerichs, "Menno's taal" (DB 1905); "Menno's verblijf in de eerste jaaren na zijn uitgang"(DB 1906), and Karel Vos, Menno Simons, 1496-1561, Zijn leven en zijne reformatorische denkbeelden (Leiden, 1914), which is well documented and gives evidence that the author is the best authority on the sources in that field. Two years later, John Horsch published Menno Simons, His Life, Labors, and Teachings (Scottdale, 1916).

About 1848 two German biographies of Menno Simons appeared. B. C. Roosen wrote Menno Simons den evangelischen Mennoniten-Gemeinden geschildert (Leipzig, 1848) and C. Harder Das Leben Menno Symons (Königsberg, 1846). On the fourth centennial of the conversion of Menno Simons, Cornelius Krahn presented his study, Menno Simons (1496-1561), Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte und Theologie der Taufgesinnten (Karlsruhe i.B., 1936). The first part is a biography of Menno Simons and the second an interpretation of the theology of the Anabaptists as compared with that of the reformers of the 16th century. Recent American brief biographies are Menno Simons, Apostle of the Nonresistant Life (Berne), by C. Henry Smith, and Menno Simons' Life and Writings (Scottdale, 1936), by Harold S. Bender and John Horsch. In this connection "De portretten van Menno Simons (Met 12 afbeeldingen)" (DB 1916) by G. J. Boekenoogen should be mentioned. Menno Simons' writings have been published in the Dutch, German, and English languages. However, a scholarly edition of the original writings of Menno Simons has not yet been published. The Mennonite Publishing House of Scottdale, Pa., published in 1956 in a revised translation, The Complete Writings of Menno Simons edited by J. C. Wenger, the first absolutely complete edition in any language.

The writings of Obbe Philips (S. Cramer in BRN VII, 1910), Dirk Philips (F. Pijper in BRN X, 1914), and Adam Pastor (S. Cramer in BRN) have been edited by S. Cramer and F. Pijper, who wrote introductions which contain the best available information concerning their lives. A. H. Newman wrote "Adam Pastor, Antitrinitarian Antipaedobaptist," in Papers of the American Society of Church History V (1917). Complete biographies of these and other co-workers of Menno have not yet been written.

More than thirty biographies, partly illustrated, of the great Mennonite leaders of the first century are given in the second and third volumes of Schijn-Maatschoen's previously mentioned history of the Mennonites. K. de Wit published 30 pictures of leading men in Verzaameling van de afbeeldingen van veele voornaame mannen en leeraaren (Amsterdam, 1743), each illustration accompanied by a short poem written by men like J. van den Vondel and Adr. Spinniker. The biography of Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan (1622-1706) was presented by H. W. Meihuizen (Haarlem, 1954). Important material about Mennonite Collegiant connections is found in van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895), and C. B. Hylkema, Reformateurs (2 vv., Haarlem, 1900 and 1902).

4. Characteristics and Principles. We shall not attempt to mention all of the literature which deals with Mennonite tenets, beliefs, teachings, and principles, but merely name a few outstanding titles of the past and present centuries. J. H. Scholten's De Leer der Hervormde Kerk, in which he characterized the Anabaptists, was the reason for the writing of D. S. Gorter's Onderzoek naar het kenmerkend beginsel der Nederlandsche Doopsgezinden (1850) and S. Hoekstra's Nog iets over het eigenlijke wezen van den Doopsgezinden Christen (1851). All this was just a prelude to the most significant work written on this subject by a Dutch theologian, viz., Beginselen en leer der oude Doopsgezinden, vergeleken met de overige Protestanten (1863), by Sytse Hoekstra Bz. Hoekstra, the author of numerous books in systematic theology, made a thorough comparative study of the Mennonite and other Protestant teachings and principles.

We shall not here attempt to present the interpretations of the essential principles of Anabaptism as they are given by the well-known historians, Albrecht Ritschl, Ludwig Keller, Karl Holl, Ernst Troeltsch, Max Weber, Walther Köhler, and others, but will merely mention a few significant recent publications in this field. An outstanding treatise is Ethelbert Stauffer's "Märtyrertheologie und Täuferbewegung" (Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, XV, 1933, 545-98; English also in MQR XIX, 1945, 179-214), which presents the outstanding characteristic of Anabaptism as the willingness to suffer for the Lord. The martyrs went through a threefold baptism—with the spirit, with the water, and with the blood. The willingness to suffer, which the Dutch call "lijdzaamheid," finds expression in the principle of nonresistance. How this principle was given up by the Dutch Mennonites is described by J. Dyserinck in "De Weerloosheid volgens de Doopsgezinden," in the journal De Gids I (1890) 104-61 and 303-42, by S. Cramer in "Hoe een van onze vroegere kenmerken is te niet gegaan" (DB 1898), and by Vos in De Weerloosheid der Doopsgezinden (1916). A recent Dutch study of this field was made by N. van der Zijpp in De vroegere Doopsgezinden en de krijgsdienst (1930). The most thorough study based on Dutch sources is Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863) by W. Mannhardt.

N. van der Zijpp published the only general study on Dutch confessions: De Belijdenisgeschriften der Nederlandse Doopsgezinden (1954); English translation in MQR XXIX (1955) 171-87.

The most detailed Dutch account of the development of modes of baptism was given by J. G. de Hoop Scheffer in his "Overzicht der Geschiedenis van den Doop bij Onderdompeling" (Verslagen en Mededeelingen der Koninklijke Academie van Wetenschappen, Afd. Letterkunde, 2.reeks, dl. XII, Amsterdam, 1883). Karel Vos wrote "De doop bij overstorting" (DB 1911).

Menno Simons and his followers shared the peculiar conception of the incarnation of Christ held by Melchior Hofmann. Krahn in "Der Gemeindebegriff Mennos im Zusammenhang mit seiner Lehre von der Menschwerdung Christi" (Menno Simons, 1936) attempts to point out the connection between this doctrine and their conception of a church "without spot and wrinkle." Irvin E. Burkhart wrote "Menno Simons on the Incarnation" (MQR IV, 1930, VI, 1932). The most recent treatment of this question was presented by H. J. Schoeps in Vom Himmlischen Fleisch (Tübingen, 1951).

Regarding the Mennonite principle of nonconformity a few titles deserve special mention. P. Langendijk gives an account of the complaints of the Swiss Mennonites who settled in the Netherlands about the worldliness of their Dutch brethren (De Zwitsere Eenvoudigheid, klagende over de bedorvene Zeden veeler Hollandse Doopsgezinden, 1713; see also Mennonite Life X, July 1955). C. N. Wybrands portrays the cultural and ethical standards of the past conservatism of the Dutch Mennonites in Het Menniste Zusje (1913).

F. S. Knipscheer wrote an exhaustive study concerning the controversy on silent and audible prayer in "Geschiedenis van het stil en het stemmelijk gebed bij de Nederlandsche Doopsgezinden" (DB 1897, 1898, Catalogus Amst., 188). In "Reizen naar de Eeuwigheid" (DB 1896) J. J. Honig Jz. makes a study of one of the most popular devotional books entitled Wegh nae Vredenstadt (1625) by Pieter Pietersz. The most complete study of this subject was made by Robert Friedmann in Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949). Books in the field of devotion and theology are listed in the Catalogus, pp. 212-39, 306-10. Sermons are found on pp. 239-56 and 310-24. The extensive literature in the field of religious education is given on pp. 256-65 and 324-29.

The Dutch Mennonites had their own Bible translations. Samuel Muller wrote on this subject the article "Het onstaan en het gebruik van Bijbelvertalingen onder de Nederlandsche Doopsgezinden" (Jaarboekje voor Doopsgezinde gemeenten, 1837). Also the articles Bible Translations, and Bibles used by Anabaptists (ME) give information along these lines. Pieter Jansz Twisck, one of the most prolific Mennonite writers of the 17th century, wrote a Bible concordance entitled Concordantie der Heyligher Schriftvren enz. (Hoorn, 1615), which was generally used. He added a second volume, Bybelsch Naem- ende Chronyck-boeck (Hoorn, 1632).

Libraries and Archives. The most complete collection of books and documents on Dutch Anabaptistica is to be found in the Library and Archives of the Mennonite Church of Amsterdam. Smaller collections are located in the libraries of the universities of Amsterdam, Leyden, Groningen, and Kiel, the Royal Library at the Hague, the British Museum, and certain church and private libraries among the Mennonites of the Netherlands and Germany. Most of the archives have been microfilmed by the Historical Committee of the General Conference Mennonite church. The microfilms are located in the Bethel College Historical Library.

The collections of Dutch Mennonitica in America are growing. Special efforts are being made to preserve and collect everything in connection with the history of the Mennonites, including the Dutch, by the Mennonite historical libraries of Bethel College and Goshen College. These two libraries have next to the Library of the Mennonite Church of Amsterdam the largest collections of Dutch Mennonitica.

C.K.

Historiography V: North Germany including West and East Prussia, and Poland. The Mennonites of Germany in general were later in joining scholars in Mennonite research than the Dutch. Gerrit Roosen was an exception when he published his Unschuld und Gegen-Bericht der Evangelischen Tauffgesinnten Christen . . . (1702). Little was written or published along these lines by German Mennonites until the middle of the past century when, under the influence of their Dutch brethren and scholars like Ludwig Keller, they too began to investigate phases of their history and principles and publish articles and books. The Mennonites of northern Germany were the first to do work along these lines. B. C. Roosen wrote Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinde in Hamburg und Altona (2 vv., 1886-87) and did also some genealogical research. The Familien-Chronik of the van der Smissens (1875) was published, and monographs and articles dealing with various phases of the Mennonites in the Schleswig-Holstein and Hamburg area appeared in a number of periodicals. Most significant was Robert Dollinger's Geschichte der Mennoniten in Schleswig-Holstein, Hamburg, und Lübeck (1930), which contains a fairly good bibliography dealing with this area. Heinz Münte presented Das Altonaer Handlungshaus van der Smissen 1682-1824 (1932) with a bibliography on the subject. Wanda Oesau wrote Hamburgs Grönlandfahrer auf Walfischfang und Robbenschlag vom 17.-19. Jahrhundert (1955). Scattered information about the Mennonites can be found in all major writings dealing with the economic life of the cities of Altona and Hamburg, such as A. Lichtwark's Das Bildnis in Hamburg (2 vv., 1898) and P. Th. Hoffmann's Neues Altona I (1929) 217 ff.

Some of the outstanding writings on the Anabaptists and Mennonites of East Friesland are J. P. Müller, Die Mennoniten in Ostfriesland I (1887); II (Jahrb. IV, Emden); C. A. Cornelius, Der Anteil Ostfrieslands an der Reformation bis zum Jahr 1535 (1852); E. Kochs, "Die Anfänge der ostfriesischen Reformation" I and II, in Jahrb. d. Ges. f. bild. Kunst u. vaterl. Altertümer zu Emden XIX, 109-273 and XX, 1-125; H. Reimers, Die Gestaltung der Reformation in Ostfriesland (1917); J. ten Doornkaat Koolman, Kurze Mitteilungen aus der Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinde in Ostfriesland ... und der Norder Gemeinde ... (1903); idem, Mitteilungen aus der Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Norden im 19. Jahrhundert (1904); Blaupot t. C., Groningen, Overijssel en Oost-Friesland I and II (1842). Abraham Fast wrote Die Kulturleistungen der Mennoniten in Ostfriesland und Münsterland (1947).

The Mennonites of the Lower Rhine were first extensively treated by Karl Rembert in Die "Wiedertäufer" im Herzogtum Jülich (1899). The Mennonites of Crefeld were featured in Beiträge zur Geschichte Rheinischer Mennoniten (1939). W. I. Hull treated a phase of the Crefeld Mennonite Church in his William Penn and the Dutch Quaker Migration to Pennsylvania (Swarthmore College, 1935). A related study is Friedrich Nieper's Die ersten deutschen Auswanderer von Krefeld nach Pennsylvanien (1940). The economic significance of the Crefeld Mennonites was recently investigated by Gerhard von Beckerath in Die wirtschaftliche Bedeutung der Krefelder Mennoniten . . . (1951). The Mennonite textile manufacturers of Gronau are represented in V. Muthesius, 100 Jahre M. van Delden & Co. (1954), and Das Geschlecht Van Delden (1954).

In addition to what has been said about the Anabaptism of Münster and Westphalia in the Dutch section of the historiography it should be stated that P. Bahlmann compiled a bibliography on this subject which was published under the title, "Die Wiedertäufer zu Münster" (Ztscht f. vaterl. Gesch. u. Altertums-Kunde, 1893; Part I, pp. 119-74). Outstanding are the source collections and writings on the Münsterites by J. Niesert, C. A. Cornelius, L. Keller, Kl. Löffler. Fiction writers and artists continue to deal with this subject. Among the dissertations dealing with the belles-lettres on this subject should be mentioned: W. Rauch, Johann van Leyden, der König von Zion, in der Dichtung (1912) and H. Hermsen, Die Wiedertäufer zu Münster in der deutschen Dichtung (1913). A recent treatment of the Reformation of Westphalia, including the Anabaptists, is Fr. Brune, Der Kampf um eine evangelische Kirche im Münsterland 1520-1802 (1953), which contains a valuable bibliography.

The Mennonites of the Vistula area were originally featured mostly by non-Mennonites in books like W. Crichton's Zur Geschichte der Mennoniten (Königsberg, 1786), Reiswitz and Wadzeck's Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Mennoniten-Gemeinden . . . (2 vv., 1821, 1829), and Max Schön's Das Mennonitentum in Westpreussen (Berlin, 1886). However, through the Mennonitische Blätter, started by Johann Mannhardt in Danzig in 1853, which carried many articles pertaining to the Mennonites, and the historian Wilhelm Mannhardt, who wrote the book, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (1863), interest in their own history was created among the Mennonites of Prussia. The first fruit was the brief Kurzgefasste Geschichte der Elbinger Mennoniten-Gemeinde (1883). Bruno Schuhmacher (Niederländische Ansiedlungen . . . , 1903) and Felicia Szper (Nederlandsche nederzettingen . . . , 1913) investigated the Dutch Mennonite settlements in Prussia, which subject is included also in B. H. Unruh's Die niederländisch-niederdeutschen Hintergründe der Mennonitischen Ostwanderungen . . . (1955). Walter W. Mitzka made a linguistic study, Die Sprache der deutschen Mennoniten (1931?). H. G. Mannhardt did the history of the Danzig Mennonites, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (1919). Horst Penner made a study of settlements along the Vistula, Ansiedlung mennonitischer Niederländer im Weichselmündungsgebiet von der Mitte des 16. Jahrhunderts bis zum Beginn der preussischen Zeit (see also MQR XXI, October 1949), and Gustav Reimer presented Die Familiennamen der westpreussischen Mennoniten, both of which appeared as No. 3 of Schriftenreihe des Mennonitischen Geschichtsvereins (1940). Herbert Wiebe's Das Siedlungswerk niederländischen Mennoniten im Weichseltal . . . was published in 1952. H. Nottarp wrote Die Mennoniten in den Marienburger Werdern (1929) and L. Stobbe published Montau-Gruppe . . . (1918). Horst Penner gives the best over-all summary in "Anabaptists and Mennonites of East Prussia," MQR XXII (1948) 212-25 and in his book, Weltweite Bruderschaft (1955). William T. Schreiber's booklet, The Fate of the Prussian Mennonites, summarizes the history up to the present (1955). Numerous articles on the Prussian Mennonites have appeared in Mennonitische Blätter, Mennonitische Geschichtsblätter, Christlicher Gemeinde-Kalender, and Mennonite Life.

Poland is one of the most neglected areas of research so far as the Mennonites are concerned. Walter Kuhn wrote some articles in Deutsche Blätter in Polen (Posen, 1928) and in Mennonite Life (April 1953). A summary of his research was presented in "Deutsche Täufersiedlungen im westukrainischen Raume" (Zeitschrift für Ostforschung IV, 1955, 481-505). The Mennonitische Blätter and the Mennonitisches Gemeindeblatt of the Galician Mennonites carried articles pertaining to this group. P. Bachmann presented a complete history of the Galician Mennonites from 1784 to 1934 in Mennoniten in Kleinpolen (Lemberg, 1934) with numerous genealogies. The Swiss Mennonites of Volhynia have been treated in a number of booklets written by descendants in America in a commemorative style. A complete scholarly presentation is still not available. The Low-German Mennonite settlements and congregations of Poland proper (Michalin, Deutsch-Wymysle, Deutsch-Kasun, etc.) have occasionally been dealt with in articles or in family and congregational histories. No complete and thorough study is available.
C.K.

Historiography VI: Russia. The Mennonites of Russia found early historians in the following: A. Klaus, Unsere Kolonien (Odessa, 1887), dealing particularly with the Hutterites; P. Hildebrandt, Erste Auswanderung der Mennoniten aus dem Danziger Gebiet nach Süd-Russland (Halbstadt, 1888), and D. H. Epp, Die Chortitzer Mennoniten (Odessa, 1889). The history and the sources pertaining to the Molotschna settlement were presented by Franz Isaak in Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908). D. H. Epp wrote Die Memriker Ansiedlung (Berdyansk, 1910). The history of the Mennonite Brethren, in the framework of the total Mennonite history of Russia, was written in a nearly one-thousand-page volume, Die Alt-Evangelische Mennonitische Brüderschaft in Russland 1789-1910, by P. M. Friesen (q.v.) (Halbstadt, 1911); it is an extremely valuable collection of source material. Monographs appeared on subjects such as alternative service by A. Goerz (Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Forstdienstes der Mennoniten in Russland, Gross-Tokmak, 1907), Johann Cornies by D. H. Epp (Berdyansk, 1909), Die Mundart von Chortitza by Jakob Quiring (Munich, 1928), Unser Auszug nach Mittelasien by Franz Bartsch (Halbstadt, 1907).

S. D. Bondar wrote on the Mennonites in Russia in Sekta Mennonitov v Rossii (Petrograd, 1916). From a Communist point of view A. Reinmarus (Penner) wrote Anti-Menno (Moscow, 1930), V. Schirmunski, Die deutschen Kolonien in der Ukraine, Geschichte, Mundarten, Volkslied, Volkskunde (Moscow, 1928), and B. Bartels, Die deutschen Bauern in Russland (Moscow, 1928). At the beginning of the Communist regime articles and books on the "German Red Cow" (D. V. Elpatevsky) and the contributions of the Mennonites in agriculture and other economic areas appeared by S. P. Sorokin, K. Lindemann, and others.

Valuable historical materials pertaining to the Mennonites of Russia are contained in Mennonite periodicals and yearbooks such as Der Botschafter (1905-14), Mennonitisches Jahrbuch (1905-13, H. Dirks), Unser Blatt (1925-28), Der praktische Landwirt (1925-26) published in Russia, and Unser Blatt (1947-50) published at Gronau, Germany, by the MCC for the Russian refugees.

The most fruitful and significant contribution in the realm of research and the publication of monographs, studies, and materials pertaining to the Mennonites of Russia was begun after the emigration from Russia, particularly after World War I. The first phase of this movement of Mennonites to America and their descendants of the prairie states and provinces has been studied and presented by numerous American writers such as C. Henry Smith in The Coming of the Russian Mennonites (1927), Georg Leibbrandt and E. H. Correll in the MQR (Oct. 1932, Jan. 1932, July 1935, July and Oct. 1937), in From the Steppes to the Prairies (1939), Carl Dawson in Group Settlement . . . (1936), Heinz Lehmann in Das Deutschtum in Westkanada (Berlin, 1939), and in numerous other books and articles. Gustav E. Reimer and G. R. Gaeddert presented Exiled by the Czar: Cornelius Jansen and the Great Mennonite Migration, 1874 (1956), and E. K. Francis features the Mennonites of Manitoba in In Search of Utopia (1955).

The largest wave of emigration of Mennonites from Russia after the Revolution (1920-25) stimulated and resulted in many publications in Germany, Canada, and the United States. Adolf Ehrt's Das Mennonitentum in Russland . . . (1932) is one of the best studies of the economic and social life of the Mennonites of Russia, containing a very valuable bibliography. Prior to this a popular summary with maps and illustrations had appeared, entitled Die Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Russland (1921), which had previously been published in the Dutch language. D. Neufeld wrote three booklets pertaining to his experiences during the Russian Revolution. The Deutsches Ausland-Institut of Stuttgart published numerous books on the German element in Russia including the Mennonites. Of special value is the yearbook Der Wanderweg der Russlanddeutschen (Vol. IV, 1939), which contains many maps and statistics. Otto Auhagen, who as a German agricultural expert in Moscow witnessed a flood of refugees coming to that city in 1929, described their fate in his book, Die Schicksalswende des Russlanddeutschen Bauerntums in den Jahren 1927-1930 (1942), which appeared in the Sammlung Georg Leibbrandt, in which Hans Rempel's Deutsche Bauernleitung am Schwarzen Meer was also published. (The whole edition was destroyed during the war.) K. Stumpp's Bericht über das Gebiet Chortitza . . . (1943), which contains extremely valuable statistical material and a map of the Chortitza settlement in Russia before the German invasion of Russia (1941), also appeared in this Sammlung. Die Deutschen Siedlungen in der Sowjetunion, a series Für den Dienstgebrauch, lists all German settlements of European Russia and shows them on maps (Sammlung Georg Leibbrandt, 1941). W. Quiring's Russlanddeutsche suchen eine Heimat 1938) and Deutsche erschliessen den Chaco (1936) deal with the Canadian and Russian Mennonite immigration to Paraguay.

During this period of interest in genealogical research, much valuable material was published in Germany in books and periodicals pertaining to the German element abroad, which usually included the Mennonites. Some of the German periodicals which regularly carried articles pertaining to the Mennonites of Russia and their descendants were Deutsche Post aus dem Osten, Mitteilungen des Sippenverbandes der Danziger Mennoniten-Familien (edited by K. Kauenhoven, Göttingen), and Mitteilungen der Niederländischen Ahnengemeinschaft (Hamburg). The latter, compiled by K. Kauenhoven, published in 1939 the most exhaustive bibliography on the Mennonites of Prussian and Russian background available (I, 1939, 66-109).

Among the Mennonites of Russian background in Canada and the United States the literature pertaining to their history in Russia and their new country is increasing steadily. A valuable unpublished study of the Mennonites in Russia was made by David Rempel (doctoral dissertation, Stanford University, 1933), "The Mennonite Colonies in New Russia," which contains a valuable bibliography. The Mennonitische Volkswarte (1935-38) and the Echo-Verlag (1944- , Steinbach, Man.) have published much material along these lines. The series of books of the latter publisher includes histories of the following settlements: Terek, Zagradovka, Trakt, Molotschna, Kuban, Central Asia, and biographies of Cornies, Heese, and Wiebe. Der Bote (Rosthern, 1924-) and Die Mennonitische Rundschau (1880- , since 1923 in Winnipeg) contain much valuable information about the Mennonites in Canada, South America, and Russia. The Altona Echo and the Steinbach Post carry information pertaining to the Mennonites of the 1870's in Manitoba, as well as Mexico and South America. In the United States the following periodicals have devoted considerable space to the Mennonites of Prussia, Russia, Poland, the prairie states and provinces, Mexico, and South America: Mennonite Life (1945-), Mennonite Quarterly Review (1927-), Hillsboro Journal (Vorwärts), and Mennonitisches Jahrbuch (1948-).

The most helpful bibliographies on the Mennonites of Northern Germany, Poland, and Russia can be found in Mitteilungen der Niederländischen Ahnengemeinschaft (1939) written by K. Kauenhoven, in the books listed above written by Robert Dollinger, Heinz Münte, Friedrich Nieper, Adolf Ehrt, in C. Henry Smith's Story of the Mennonites (rev. ed. 1950), and in every April issue of Mennonite Life since 1947 and in the Bibliographical and Research Notes of the MQR. Regarding publications pertaining to hymnody, art, cooking, periodicals, yearbooks, etc., see the literature under the respective articles. For a list of bibliographies and catalogs see Cornelius Krahn, "The Historiography of the Mennonites of the Netherlands," Church History XIII (1944) or MQR XVI (1944). C.K.

Historiography VII: North American Mennonites. The writing of history by North American Mennonites, either of the history of the Mennonites in their own land, or of Europe, was a late development. The lack of trained men, whether ministers or scholars, the rural conservatism combined with traditionalism and preoccupation with pioneering problems, readily account for this. It was only at the end of the 19th century and especially in the first quarter of the 20th that substantial and worthy history writing began, with C. H. Wedel (1862-1911), John Horsch (1867-1941), and C. Henry Smith (1872-1948) as the first capable historians. Before that time the few volumes which appeared as history were chiefly apologetic or polemic and occasioned by schisms. These include: Christian Funk's Spiegel für alle Menschen (1813, 54 pp.), Jakob Stauffer's Eine Chronik oder Geschicht-Büchlein von der sogenannten Mennonisten Gemeinde (1859, 439 pp.), John Holdeman's A History of the Church of God (German 1875, English 1876, 303 pp.), Daniel Musser's The Reformed Mennonite Church, Its Rise and Progress (1873, pp. 608), and John F. Funk's reply to Musser's sharp attack on the "old" church in his The Mennonite Church and Her Accusers (1878, pp. 219). Of these only Holdeman and Funk contain a significant amount of information of historical value. Benjamin Eby's little Kurzgefasste Kirchen Geschichte und Glaubenslehre der Taufgesinnten Christen oder Mennoniten (Berlin, Canada, 1841, 16mo. historical part 164 pp.), though often reprinted, was only a frontier preacher-schoolteacher's attempt to assemble a modicum of information about Mennonites in various parts of the world. The very first bit of American Mennonite history written was that by Jacob Gottschalk in 1712 (see H. S. Bender, "The Founding of the Mennonite Church in America at Germantown, 1683-1708," MQR VII, 1933, 227-50).

General Works. The first American Mennonite historian, D. K. Cassel of Germantown, self-taught writer, produced two books devoted to the Mennonites of America: History of the Mennonites (1888, 450 pp.) and Geschichte der Mennoniten (1890, 545 pp. but containing almost twice the information of the English book), containing much valuable undigested and unorganized information, gathered largely from primary sources. John Horsch's Kurzgefasste Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinden (1890, pp. 146) is chiefly valuable for its remarkable Anabaptist bibliography. C. H. A. van Smissen's Kurzgefasste Geschichte und Glaubenslehre der Altevangelischen Taufgesinnten oder Mennoniten (1895, pp. 251) is avowedly based on secondary sources, chiefly the German Anna Brons (Ursprung, Entwickelung, etc., 1884, which contains only 34 pp. out of 444 on the American Mennonites) and has next to nothing on America. Johannes Bartsch's Geschichte der Gemeinde Jesu Christi, das heisst, der Altevangelischen und Mennoniten-Gemeinden (1898, 207 pp.) is little better. C. H. Wedel's training and scholarship was registered in his useful four-volume Abriss der Geschichte der Mennoniten (1900-4, total 756 pp.), but only 80 pages of the last volume were devoted to America. C. Henry Smith's Ph.D. dissertation (he was then a professor of history at Goshen College) The Mennonites of America (1909, pp. 484) was the first and to date only scholarly general history of the American Mennonites. He reworked this material twice in combination with a general Mennonite history, once in his The Mennonites (1920, pp. 340), and again in his The Story of the Mennonites (1941, pp. 823, revised in 1950). His booklet Mennonites in America (1942, pp. 71) condensed this material for CPS men. The only other extensive general history of the Mennonites of North America yet published has been Part II of P. M. Friesen's monumental work on the Mennonites of Russia, Die Alt-Evangelisch Mennonitische Brüderschaft im Russland (Halbstadt, 1911), covering 154 large pages in three sections: A. Mennonite Brethren; B. The General Conference Mennonites; C. The "Old" Mennonites. The work is more descriptive than systematic. Friesen's source was largely Cassel's Geschichte der Mennoniten, with C. H. Wedel's Abriss, the Mennonitische Rundschau, and private correspondence with M. B. Fast and John Horsch. W. S. Gottshall's Mennonite History (1921, pp. 84) and Daniel Kauffman's booklet by the same title (1927, pp. 147) are minor popularizations. J. C. Wenger's Glimpses of Mennonite History (1940, pp. 126) devotes pp. 38-54 to American Mennonites, while the revised edition of 1947 devotes pp. 101-36 to them. J. J. Friesen's An Outline of Mennonite History (1944, pp. 114) is very general. P. J. Schaefer's Woher? Wohin? Mennoniten (pp. 491), intended as a high-school text for (German) Mennonite schools in Canada, was published in four parts: I. Western Europe (1942, pp. 66); II. Russia and the United States (1942, pp. 82); III. Canada (1946, pp. 187); IV. Mexico and South America (1954, pp. 115). The third volume is the only general work on Canadian Mennonite history yet published. Horst Penner's Weltweite Bruderschaft devotes 45 of its 224 pages to North and South America. H. S. Bender's Mennonites in America is to appear in 1957.

Denominational Histories. The following histories of individual Mennonite groups have appeared: H. P. Krehbiel, History of the General Conference of Mennonites of North America I (1898, pp. 504), II (1938, pp. 682); Klaas Peters, Die Bergthaler Mennoniten (1924, pp. 45); J. S. Hartzler and Daniel Kauffman, Mennonite Church History (MC, 1905, pp. 422); J. A. Huffman, History of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (1920, pp. 282); J. F. Harms, Geschichte der Mennoniten Brüder-Gemeinde (1924, pp. 342); W. B. Weaver, History of the Central Conference Mennonite Church (1926, pp. 254); J. H. Lohrenz, The Mennonite Brethren Church (1950, pp. 335); Walter Lugibihl and Jared Gerig, Missionary Church Association (1950, pp. 164); J. G. Rempel, Fünfzig Jahre Konferenzbestrebungen (1902-1952), Konferenz der Mennoniten in Canada (GCM 1952, pp. 491); J. J. Wiens, The Mennonite Brethren Churches of North America (1954, pp. 192), consists of pictures of meetinghouses with brief sketches of congregations.

Regional Histories. A series of regional or district conference histories of the Mennonite Church (MC) have appeared during the past 25 years, several of them outstanding in quality, including doctoral dissertations (marked herein with an asterisk *) at leading universities: M. G. Weaver, Mennonites of Lancaster Conference (1931, pp. 496); H. F. Weber, Centennial History of the Mennonites of Illinois (*1931, pp. 680); L. J. Burkholder, A Brief History of Mennonites in Ontario (1935, pp. 358); J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of Franconia Conference (*1937, pp. 523); E. J. Hirschler, Centenary History of the Swiss Mennonite Churches of Allen and Putnam Counties, Ohio (1937, pp. 150); Melvin Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa (*1939, pp. 419); John Umble, Ohio Mennonite Sunday Schools (1941, pp. 522). Several interesting county, local, or congregational histories should be mentioned, some quite brief; W. H. Grubb, History of the Mennonites of Butler County, Ohio (1916, pp. 49); Samuel Peachey, The Amish of Kishacoquillas Valley (1930, pp. 48); F. P. Schultz, The Settlement of German Mennonites from Russia at Mountain Lake, Minnesota (1938, pp. 123); Eva Sprunger, The First Hundred Years, A History of the Mennonite Church in Adams County, Indiana (Berne) (1938, pp. 344); C. Z. Mast and R. E. Simpson, Annals of the Conestoga Valley (1942, pp. 689); Edward Yoder, The Mennonites of Westmoreland County, Pennsylvania (1942, pp. 64); R. M. Yoder, Clinton Frame (Ind.) Sketches (1944, pp. 106); J. J. Gering, After Fifty Years, A Brief Discussion of the History and Activities of the Swiss-German Mennonites Who Settled in South Dakota in 1874 (1924, pp. 58); Jacob Rupp, Entstehung und Auflösung der Gemeinde zu Maxweiler bei Neuburg an der Donau in Deutschland, und erste Pionierjahre in Amerika (1924, pp. 24); C. E. Krehbiel, Historical Sketch of the First Mennonite Church, Halstead, Kansas (1925, pp. 53); P. B. Amstutz, Geschichtliche Ereignisse der Mennoniten-Ansiedlung in Allen and Putnam County, Ohio (1925, pp. 411); J. G. Rempel, Die Rosenorter Gemeinde in Saskatchewan (Rosthern, 1950, pp. 183). Numerous county histories contain valuable material on the history of early Mennonite settlements in America.

Immigration and Colonization History. Several excellent volumes have been devoted to immigration and colonization history: C. Henry Smith, The Coming of the Russian Mennonites (1927, pp. 296); idem, The Mennonite Immigration to Pennsylvania (1929, pp. 412); P. J. Kaufman, Unser Volk und seine Geschichte (1931, pp. 168, tells of Volhynian Mennonites settling in the United States); S. C. Yoder, For Conscience Sake: A Study of Mennonite Migrations Resulting from the World War (1945, pp. 300); Delbert Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists and Their American Descendants (1953, pp. 219); E. K. Francis, In Search of Utopia, The Mennonites in Manitoba (1955, pp. 294); J. W. Fretz, Mennonite Colonization (1944, pp. 80); idem, Mennonite Colonization in Mexico (1945, pp. 43); C. Krahn, Editor, From the Steppes to the Prairies (1949, pp. 115); G. E. Reimer and G. R. Gaeddert, Exiled by the Czar, Cornelius Jansen and the Great Mennonite Migration 1874 (1956, pp. 205); note also J. H. Langenwalter's earlier brief summary, The Immigration of Mennonites into North America (1914, pp. 100).

A considerable number of monographs have been published on special phases of Mennonite history, work, life, and thought in America, some of them outstanding in quality.

Missions. Building on the Rock (MC mission in India, 1926, pp. 200); Twenty-Five Years with God in India (GCM mission, 1929, pp. 250); Ed. G. Kaufman, The Development of the Missionary and Philanthropic Interest Among the Mennonites of North America (1937, pp. 224); Alta Erb, Studies in Mennonite City Missions (1937, pp. 224); Ira D. Landis, The Missionary Movement Among Lancaster Conference Mennonites (1937, pp. 119); The Gospel Under the Southern Cross (MC mission in Argentina, 1943, pp. 272); W. B. Weaver, Thirty-Five Years in the Congo (Congo Inland Mission, 1945, pp. 241); E. R. Storms, What God Hath Wrought (MBC-UMC foreign mission work, 1948, pp. 164); The Love of Christ Hath Constrained Us (MC mission in India, 1949, pp. 63); Emma Oyer, What God Hath Wrought (MC Home Mission in Chicago, 1949, pp. 186); G. W. Peters, The Growth of Foreign Missions in the Mennonite Brethren Church (1952, pp. 327); Mrs. H. T. Esau, First Sixty Years of Mennonite Brethren Missions (1954, pp. 552).

Relief. D. M. Hofer, Die Hungersnot in Russland (1924, pp. 575); P. C. Hiebert and Orie O. Miller, Feeding the Hungry (1928, pp. 450); M. C. Lehman, The History and Principles of Mennonite Relief Work (1945, pp. 48); W. H. and Verna Smith, Paraguayan Interlude (1950, pp. 184); Irvin Horst, A Ministry of Goodwill, A Short Account of Mennonite Relief 1939-1949 (1950, pp. 119); J. G. Holsinger, Serving Rural Puerto Rico (1952, pp. 232); J. D. Unruh, In the Name of Christ, A History of the Mennonite Central Committee and Its Service 1920-1951 (1952, pp. 404).

Peace and Nonresistance. J. S. Hartzler, Mennonites in the World War (1921, pp. 145); John Horsch, The Principle of Nonresistance as Held by the Mennonite Church (1927, pp. 60); G. F. Hershberger, War, Peace, and Nonresistance (1944, pp. 415, revised editions 1946 and 1953); idem, The Mennonite Church in the Second World War (1951, pp. 308); Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (1949, pp. 508); Willard Hunsberger, Franconia Mennonites and World War II (1951, pp. 30).

Education. H. P. Peters, History and Development of Education Among the Mennonites in Kansas (1921, pp. 221); J. E. Hartzler, Education Among the Mennonites of North America (1925, pp. 195); C. Henry Smith and E. J. Hirschler, Story of Bluffton College (1925, pp. 296); Bluffton College, An Adventure in Faith (1950, pp. 268); Marie Waldner, For Half a Century, The Story of Freeman Junior College (1951, pp. 103); P. J. Wedel, The Story of Bethel College (1954, pp. 632); John Umble, Goshen College 1894-1954 (1955, pp. 284).

Miscellaneous Topics. H. S. Bender, Mennonite Sunday School Centennial (1940, pp. 64); J. C. Wenger, Historical and Biblical Position of the Mennonite Church on Attire (1945, pp. 32); Ira D. Landis, The Faith of Our Fathers on Eschatology (1946, pp. 423); Robert Friedmann, Mennonite Piety

Through the Centuries (contains several chapters on America, 1949, pp. 287); J. W. Fretz, Christian Mutual Aid (1947, pp. 88); Paul R. Shelley, Religious Education and Mennonite Piety Among the Mennonites of Southeastern Pennsylvania (1952, pp. 193).

Biographies. M. S. Steiner, John S. Coffman, Mennonite Evangelist (1903, pp. 139); M. G. Brumbaugh, The Life and Works of Christopher Dock (1908, pp. 272); Memoirs of Peter Jansen, An Autobiography (1921, pp. 140); P. A. Wiebe, Kurze Biographie des Bruders Jacob A. Wiebe (1924, pp. 27); H. A. Brunk, The Life of Peter S. Hartman (1937, pp. 73); John Umble, Mennonite Pioneers (collected M.C. missionary biographies, 1940, pp. 211); J. W. Kliewer, Memoirs or From Herdboy to College President (1943, pp. 150); Paul Schaeffer, Heinrich H. Ewert (1945, pp. 161); M. G. Ramseyer, Joseph E. Ramseyer (1945, pp. 293, founder of the Missionary Church Association); Lambert Huffman, Not of This World, Biography of J. A. Huffman (1951, pp. 159); J. Paul Graybill, Noah H. Mack (1952, pp. 177); Alice K. Gingerich, Life and Times of Daniel Kauffman (1954, pp. 160); G. E. Reimer and G. R. Gaeddert, Exiled by the Czar, Cornelius Jansen and the Great Mennonite Migration, 1874 (1956, pp. 205).

Reference Works and Bibliographies. L. J. Heatwole, Mennonite Handbook of Information (1925, pp. 187); Daniel Kauffman, Mennonite Cyclopedic Dictionary (1937, pp. 443); H. S. Bender, Two Centuries of American Mennonite Literature 1727-1929 (1929, pp. 180); John A. Hostetler, Annotated Bibliography on the Amish (1951, pp. 100); A. Warkentin, Who's Who Among the Mennonites (1937, pp. 221); A. Warkentin and M. Gingerich, Who's Who Among the Mennonites (1943, pp. 428).

Periodicals. The only strictly historical American Mennonite periodical has been the Mennonite Quarterly Review (1927-), published by the Mennonite Historical Society of Goshen College, which has carried a large number of scholarly articles on Anabaptist and Mennonite history, thought, and life.

Mennonite Life (1945-), published by Bethel College, is an illustrated quarterly magazine featuring the Mennonites the world over. It has carried many briefer historical articles. In a way it is the continuation of the Monatsblätter aus Bethel College and Bethel College Monthly (1903-18), in which C. H. Wedel and others published many historical articles. The several conference yearbooks and almanacs have often carried valuable historical material and shorter articles, such as the Mennonite (MC) Family Almanac (1870-1955), the Mennonite (MC) Yearbook and Directory (1905-), Bundesbote Kalender (GCM, 1886-), Mennonite (GCM) Yearbook and Almanac (1895-1930), Yearbook of the General Conference Mennonite Church (1930-46), and Mennonitisches (GCM) Jahrbuch (1948-). The Proceedings of the Conference on Mennonite Educational and Cultural Problems (1942-) frequently contains solid historical papers.

The following books on the Mennonites in Mexico and South America should be noted: Walter Quiring, Deutsche erschliessen den Chaco (1936?, pp. 207); idem, Russlanddeutsche suchen eine Heimat (1938, pp. 192); idem, Im Schweisse deines Angesichts, largely a picture book (1953, pp. 150); A. E. Janzen, Glimpses of South America (1944, pp. 130); Walter Schmiedehaus, Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott. Der Wanderweg eines christlichen Siedlervolkes (1948, pp. 307); S. C. Yoder, Down South America Way (1948, pp. 148); Gladys Widmer, We Enter Puerto Rico (MC Mission History in Puerto Rico 1946-51; 1952, pp. 95); J. W. Fretz, Pilgrims in Paraguay, The Story of Mennonite Colonization in South America (1953, pp. 247).

In this historiographical report numerous and important periodical articles, as well as sections in books on the colonial history of Pennsylvania such as Seidensticker, Kuhns, and Pennypacker, have been omitted. H.S.B.

History Liedboeck. A Dutch hymnbook under this title is mentioned by van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 147, E 538). It is not clear what hymnbook van Braght means. A book under this title is unknown.

Hoadley (Alberta) United Missionary Church was organized in 1945. In 1948 the congregation had six members, with Lloyd Torgerson as pastor. L.T.

Hobelmacher (Zimmermann), Lux, a citizen of Strasbourg, a member of the Anabaptist congregation there, in whose house meetings were held. In 1528-29 he was several times cross-examined, once on the rack; he was to confess that "they have the women in common," but he firmly denied the charge. (Ztscht für die hist. Theol., 1860, pp. 36, 48; ML II, 319.)

Hoburg, Christian (1607-75), a mystic theologian, preacher of the Dompelaar (q.v.) Mennonite Church at Hamburg, had an eventful life. Orphaned early, he entered the University of Königsberg under great difficulty, left without completing his course, became a private tutor at Lauenburg, then cantor and assistant preacher, studied the works of Arndt and Schwenckfeld, and fought to prevent the ruin of his church. In 1640 he was proofreader and assistant preacher in Uelzen, was dismissed from his church office, took a position as tutor in Hamburg, then proofreader in a Lüneburg print shop, wrote here under the pen name of Elias Prätorius his most important work, Spiegel der Missbräuche, and under the pen name of Bernhard Baumann (q.v.), Das ärgerliche Christentum. Under Duke August of Wolfenbüttel he received the pastorate at Borne, from which he was rudely deposed. In a complicated financial state brought on by his charities he left Brunswick and secured a position as chaplain on an estate in Geldern. This position he also had to give up because of his attacks on the church. He then served as preacher of the Reformed Church at Latum (Rhineland) for 16 years until his mysticism brought him into conflict with this congregation.

After a temporary residence in Amsterdam, he spent the rest of his life as a Mennonite preacher in Hamburg. His critique of the church and the era are significant. He stands on a high tower, and shows an unusual insight and vision. He was without doubt a highly gifted man, with the purest of motives, who, however, lacked the spiritual calm and strength to develop his teaching and carry it to a successful conclusion (ADB; Menn. Bl., 1854, 11). His books (not including those published under a pseudonym), Theologica Mystica: Das ist geheime Kraft-Theologie der Alten anweisende den Weg (Lüneburg, 1650); Der unbekannte Christus, Das ist gründlicher Beweiss, dass die heutige sogenannte Christenheit in allen Sekten den wahren Christus nicht recht kennen (Frankfurt and Leipzig, 1720) (with an interesting account of David Joris, q.v.), were also widely read in the Mennonite families of the Palatinate. NEFF.

RGG II, where the following are cited: Biographisch Woordenboek van Prot. Godsgeleerden en Neerl IV, p. 49; Gottfried Arnold, Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie II, 17, chapters 1, 38; 6, 11; III, 13, 14-37; A. Ritschl, Geschichte des Pietismus II (Bonn, 1884) 61; Rud. Winkel, Mystische Gottsucher der Nachreformationzeit (1925) 31; E. Seeberg, Gottfried Arnold (Meerane, 1923) 343; E. Kochs, "Das Kriegsproblem in der spiritualistischen Gesamtanschauung Chr. Hoburgs" (Ztscht f. Kirchengesch. XLVI, 1927) 246; ML II, 319 f.

Hoch (High), Daniel (1806-78), lived near Vineland, Lincoln Co., Ont. In 1831 he was chosen as minister in the local Mennonite (MC) congregation and in the following years became leader of a prayer-meeting group in his church which emphasized the use of the mourners' bench, immersion, open communion, true repentance, and holiness. A division between his party and the church resulted in 1848. Hoch was ordained by J. H. Oberholtzer (q.v.) as bishop in 1851 and from 1853 on was engaged in itinerant work among scattered congregations. He was active in early union efforts among Mennonites and served as chairman of the second General Conference (GCM), held in Wadsworth, Ohio, in May 1861. After 1869, Hoch and his churches withdrew from the General Conference and apparently were drawn into the "New Mennonite" movement in Ontario which was one of the parties that eventually produced the Mennonite Brethren in Christ. S.F.P.

Religiöser Botschafter, May 16 and July 11, 1853, June 25, 1855; A. Eby, Ansiedlung und Begründung der Mennoniten Gemeinde in Canada (1872); J. H. Oberholtzer, Aufschluss der Verfolgungen gegen Daniel Hoch (1853); H. P. Krehbiel, The History of the General Conference (Canton, 1898).

Hochburg, an Amish Mennonite congregation, named after the village of Hochburg in Baden, Germany, in the Eltz Valley a few miles east of Emmendingen, was founded by families expelled from Alsace in 1712, probably from the congregations near Colmar such as Baldenheim, Ohnenheim, and Jebsheim, and also from Markirch. Hochburg was represented in the conferences held on the west side of the Rhine, such as those at Essingen in 1759 (by Jacob Rupp, who also was part of a delegation to Holland in 1760) and 1777 (by Jacob Muller). Both of these men must have been elders. Bentz Koenig of Nimburg was ordained elder in 1802. The last elder, a Zimmermann, moved from here in 1845 to Ueberlingen on Lake Constance. Some members moved to the neighborhood of Durlach, Baden. The congregation soon thereafter became extinct. (Taken from P. Sommer's "Assemblée de Hochburg," Christ Seul, June 1932, 6.) H.S.B.

Hochfeld, a common Mennonite village name which occurred in the following settlements: Don region, Russia; West Reserve, Man.; Hague, Sask.; Cuauhtemoc and Durango, Mexico; and Menno and Bergthal settlement Villarrica, Paraguay. C.K.

Hochfeld, a village in the province of Ekaterinoslav, Ukraine, South Russia, 12 miles from the station Sofievka, founded by Heinrich Thiessen, a mill owner, who in 1848 bought 5,000 acres of land and settled his children on it. In consequence of the nationalization of all land in 1917 ff., this Mennonite settlement has been dissolved. (ML II, 321.) D.H.E.

Hochfeld (Morozovo) was a village of the Yazekovo Mennonite settlement (q.v.) near Chortitza, Russia, established in 1869. In 1918 it had 92 farms and 5,070 acres of land which was reduced to about half that acreage under the Soviets at the time when the village was farming its land collectively. In 1914 the population was 313 and by 1941 it had increased to 608. In 1919, 19 persons were murdered and in 1929-41, 53 were exiled. At the outbreak of the war with Germany in 1941, 12 persons were evacuated eastward. During the German occupation the community had a church, a choir, and a school with three teachers and 77 pupils. When the Germans withdrew the population was taken along; some were returned to Russia by the Red army, while others reached Canada. C.K.

Hochfeld, a village near the station Akimovka in the district of Melitopol, Ukraine, South Russia, founded in 1832 by Thomas Wiens from the Altonau settlement (Molotschna), who bought 8,000 acres of land here and divided it among four descendants. In consequence of the nationalization of land in 1917 ff., this settlement disintegrated in 1921. (ML II, 321.) D.H.E.

Hochhuth, Karl Wilhelm Hermann (1823-93), a Protestant theologian. In his studies in church history one of his interests concerned the brotherhoods outside the state church at the time of the Reformation. With his "Mitteilungen aus der protestantischen Secten-Geschichte in der hessischen Kirche," which he published in the Ztscht für die hist. Theologie (1858, 538-644; 1859, 167-234; and 1860, 258-84), he made the first attempt to present an account of the Anabaptist movement in a German state based on court records. It was his aim to do justice to the significance of the Anabaptist movement for the Hessian state church. In this study he was able to correct many errors and omissions in former publications. On the other hand various errors crept into his copies of the records, which have in part been rectified by Lenz. Hochhuth's work offers a wealth of material on the history of the Anabaptist movement in the 16th century that has frequently been made use of in the literature on church history. HEGE.

Blaubuch des Corps Teutonia zu Marburg 1825-1925 (Elberfeld, 1925) 69; "Hessenland," Ztscht für hessische Geschichte und Literatur VII (Kassel, 1893) 191; M. Lenz, Briefwechsel Landgraf Philipps des Grossmütigen von Hessen mit Bucer I (Leipzig, 1880); ML II, 321.

Hochmann von Hohenau, Ernst Christoph (1670-1721), grew up in Nürnberg, Germany, as a Lutheran, was awakened while a student at the University of Halle (1662) by August Hermann Francke, in 1697 became associated with Gottfried Arnold, and was thereafter an active Separatist, without however joining a church brotherhood, zealously proclaiming the Gospel when he was not prevented by imprisonment and persecution of all kinds. In his creed of 1702 he said, "Concerning water baptism I believe that Christ instituted it only for adults and not for children, for there is found in all of the Holy Scriptures not an iota of an express command. Faith and baptism belong together." His position on government is also akin to that of the Mennonites; for he acknowledges it as a divine ordinance, but "things which conflict with the Word of God and conscience and against the liberty of Christ . . . it has been granted no authority." When a group of his adherents led by Alexander Mack, yielding to the influence of the English Baptists, regarded immersion as the only true baptism and necessary to salvation, and therefore required a second baptism of those who had been baptized as children, he took a moderate position (Max Goebel comments, "agreeing with Mennonite doctrine"), namely, that the sprinkling performed on children was valid and sufficient, if it was only followed later on by rebirth or the baptism of the Spirit.

It is therefore not surprising to find that Hochmann made contacts with the Mennonites. Goebel states (13) that in his speeches and writings he made many references to Menno Simons. In Crefeld he was given friendly reception by the Mennonite congregation and its three preachers (Gosen Goyen, Leonhard Ewald, Joh. Crous), and preached in their church. In the Palatinate he also frequently visited the Mennonites in Zuzenhausen, Eppstein, Guntersblum, Mutterstadt, and Lambsheim, and preached for them. Though the members of these congregations living now have no knowledge of his visits, his influence must have been deep and lasting. He is said to have preached with such power that "his hearers felt themselves lifted above the earth, as if eternity were dawning." His influence on the religious life of the Rhineland was fraught with extraordinary blessing. This is attested by both Jung-Stilling, who set him a memorial in Theobald oder die Schwärmer, and Gerhard Tersteegen, who wrote the verse found on his tombstone. NEFF.

M. Goebel, Geschichte des christlichen Lebens in der rheinisch-westfälischen evangelischen Kirche II (Coblenz, 1852); HRE VIII, pp. 162 ff.; RGG II; (2nd ed.); D. Cattepoel, "Das religiöse Leben in der Krefelder Mennonitengemeinde des 17. und 18. Jahrhunderts" in Beiträge zur Gesch. der rhein. Mennoniten, 1939; Fr. Auge, "Acht Briefe Ernst Christoph Hochmanns von Hohenau" in Monatsbl. für rhein. Kirchengesch. XIX (1925) 133 ff.; Fr. Nieper, Die ersten deutschen Auswanderer von Krefeld nach Pennsylvanien (Neukirchen, 1940) 126, 151, 201 f., 217 f., 275 f.; H. Renkewitz, Hochmann von Hohenau (Breslau, 1935); ML II, 321.

Hochrütiner, Jakob, the son of Lorenz Hochrütiner (q.v.), came to Bern, Switzerland, with other Anabaptists in the spring of 1527, and was expelled under oath from city and canton. Because he refused the oath he was placed on the pillory and led out (May 1, 1527). Soon he was back in the city. At the petition of his wife his life was spared, "if from prison he leaves the city and canton, or he will be executed without mercy." (Müller, Berner Täufer, 24 f.; ML II, 322.) NEFF.

Hochrütiner, Lorenz, one of the founders of the Zürich Anabaptist brotherhood. He was a weaver of St. Gall, and early joined the Protestant movement. For taking part in destroying the crucifix at Stadelhofen near Zürich he had to leave the city in November 1523, and returned to St. Gall, where Conrad Grebel (q.v.) appealed to his brother-in-law Vadian in Hochrütiner's behalf. In St. Gall he won converts for the Anabaptist movement in 1524. In a Bible class led by Johannes Kessler, when the passage in Romans VI about baptism on the death of Jesus was read, he spoke in opposition to infant baptism. Upon his return to Zürich he was baptized with George Blaurock (q.v.), Jan. 21, 1525. Then he betook himself to Basel. At a meeting in the house of Michel Schürer of Freiburg he was arrested and on Aug. 23, 1525, expelled from the city on penalty of death. The next year he was back in Basel, where his family had probably remained. He was banished anew (July 24, 1526). His wife and children were to be sent after him within a week. At this point all trace of him vanishes. NEFF.

E. Egli, St. Galler Täufer (Zürich, 1887) 17 f.; P. Burckhardt, Die Basler Täufer (Basel, 1898) 131; ML II, 322.

Hochstädt, a common Mennonite village name found in the following settlements: Barnaul, Siberia; East Reserve, Man.; Hague, Sask.; Cuauhtemoc and Durango, Mexico; and Menno, Chaco, Paraguay. C.K.

Hochstett, a former Amish Mennonite congregation in France, became extinct in the 19th century. It was located about 10-15 miles northwest of Strasbourg, near the towns of Brumath and Hochfelden (Almanach Menn. du Cinquantenaire 1901-51, 35). The list of congregations represented at the Essingen Amish Mennonite Conference of 1779 includes a Hochstettler congregation represented by Christian Schenk and Hans Höfle (Menn. Gesch.-Bl., 1938, 54, where Hochstätten near Münster a. Stein, Germany, is suggested as the location of the congregation). The text of the Essingen discipline as published in MQR XI (1937) 167, however, names a Hoffstetter congregation represented by Andreas Imhoff and Christian Schantz. It is not clear whether the two (or three) congregations are identical. H.S.B.

Hochstettler: see Hostettler.

Hochwald, a former Amish Mennonite congregation in Alsace in existence at least as early as 1770, which became extinct about 1837, after most of the members had emigrated to America. Most of those remaining joined the new Protestant congregation, which was organized in that year. (Menn. Bl., 1898, 73, which calls it "Hohwald"; ML I, 561.) H.S.B.

Hoefnagel, Pieter, a Mennonite preacher in the Kruisstraat congregation (conservative Flemish) of Haarlem, Holland, published the following: Zedige

Bedenkingen over het bitter Lyden onses Heeren en Zaligmaakers Jesus Christus, followed by some hymns (Haarlem, 1701, repr. 1714); Ondersoek op't Merkwaardige Getal 666 (Haarlem, 1715); De Schaduw en het Ligchaem der Profeetsyen Vertoond in het boeck der Openbaaringen van Johannes (Haarlem, 1717; an addition to this book appeared in 1732); Melchizedek beschouwt in zyn eeuwig Priesterschap (Haarlem, 1730). Hoefnagel died in 1737; he was married to Hilleke Amelsdonck Leeuw of Nijmegen. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. IV, 66 f.; M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijveren (Amsterdam, 1745) 47.

Hoejewilt, Hendrik Albertsz, b. 1606 at De Rijp, Dutch province of North Holland, d. there Feb. 14, 1667, known as "de Rijper poëet," a Dutch poet, a large number of whose hymns have been inserted in the Rijper Liedtboecxken (q.v.) of 1669 and following editions. He also published Vermaning aen de Jeugt (De Rijp, n.d.) and May-Gift van verscheyde Vogelen (Amsterdam, 1737). vdZ.

Doopsgezinde Lectuur III (1858) 195; van der Aa, Biogr. Wb. der Nederlanden VIII, 2 (Haarlem, 1867) 857; M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijveren (Amsterdam, 1745) 47 f.

Hoek (Hoeck), van, a Dutch Mennonite family living at Amsterdam in the 17th century, members of the Waterlander congregation (deacons Anthonie van Hoek 1639-50, 1657-62, and Leonard van Hoek 1668), and after the union of the Waterlander and the Flemish congregations, members of the United congregation (deacons Adriaen van Hoek Azn 1674-79, 1684-89).

Of importance for Mennonite history are Dirk van Hoek, his son Jan van Hoek and his grandson Jan van Hoek Jr., who moved as merchants and bankers from Amsterdam to Danzig, Prussia, where they became members of the "Vereenigde Vlaemsche Vriesche en Hoogduytsche Gemeynte te Schladal." Dirk van Hoek must have moved to Danzig about 1670. He died shortly after 1680. His son Jan van Hoek, who was married to Elisabeth Rutgers, whose father Isaack Rutgers also had moved from Amsterdam to Danzig, died 1732 at Danzig. He had some troubles in 1726 with Hendrik van Dühren (Duren), elder of the Danzig congregation, because of wearing a periwig. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2634.)

Dirk van Hoek and the two Jan van Hoeks (father and son) served as intermediaries of the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs and the Prussian Mennonites, who in cases of persecution and extortion by their rulers, of removal to other districts, of emigration, of devastation because of wars, of floods, of crop failures, briefly in all kinds of difficulties, were liberally supported by the Dutch Mennonites. Bills of exchange were sent from Amsterdam either to Jan Bruinvisch (q.v.) at Königsberg or to Ludwig Rump (q.v.) at Elbing or to the van Hoeks at Danzig and paid out by them to all who needed money. This caused an ample correspondence both with the Prussian congregations and the Dutch committee at Amsterdam. In the Amsterdam archives are found a large number of letters written by or sent to the van Hoeks. The first document of this kind is an account of the laying out of Dutch money by Dirk van Hoek, dated June 19, 1680. The first letter of Jan van Hoek Sr. is dated Aug. 12, 1711; the last one of Jan van Hoek Jr. June 24, 1746. vdZ.

The most important of these letters are Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1234 f., 1571-89, 1601, 1605 f., 1611 f., 1615, 1618-20, 1622-28, 1632-69, 1676, 1679 f., 1682 f., 1697, 1699; II, 2, Nos. 699, 714, 716, 719, 725, 730, 743, 751, 767, 786, 788, 793-95; concerning the van Hoek family at Danzig and especially their troubles with Hendrik van Dühren, Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2632-43.

Hoek, Kornelis van, belonged to a Rotterdam branch of the foregoing family. He died at Rotterdam in 1722. He was a member of the Rotterdam Waterlander congregation, but seems to have left the congregation in 1695, when the deacons had thwarted the Collegiants (q.v.), who had been holding their meetings in the Waterlander meetinghouse. That Kornelis van Hoek was an ardent Collegiant is proved by a number of books and pamphlets published by him. He especially attacked the conservative Zonist (q.v.) views of Lambert Bidloo (q.v.) and Herman Schijn (q.v.). Of his publications, which were eagerly read by Mennonite liberals, we should mention: Lykreden op J. Oudaen (Rotterdam, 1695); Christelyke bedenking over en tegen . . . de aanmerkingen op het formulier van Benoodiging van H. Schyn (Amsterdam, 1701); De Christelyke verdraagzaamheit verdedigt tegen H. Schyn en Bidloo (Rotterdam, 1701); Ongebonden licentie, de grondslag der Rhynburgsche verdraagzaamheit (Amsterdam, 1702); Nadere verdediging der Christelyke verdraagzaamheit tegen de laatste Wedersprak van H. Schyn en L. Bidloo (Rotterdam, 1703), and a devotional book, De vernederde en verhoogde Christus (Rotterdam, 1716).

A cousin of this Kornelis van Hoek was Jan van Hoek, a member of the Mennonite congregation of Rotterdam and an antagonist of liberal principles. His son Sander van Hoek (b. 1757) left the congregation and became a Reformed minister. vdZ.

K. Vos, De Doopsgez. in Rotterdam (Rotterdam, 1907) 27; Biogr. Wb. IV, 70-71; Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, 664; J. C. van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895) passim, see Index.

Hoek, van der, a Mennonite family living at Broek near Joure, Dutch province of Friesland, many of whose members have served as deacons of the Joure congregation. The ancestor was Homme Jeltes, b. at Irnsum, Friesland, in 1575. In 1813 they adopted the family name of van der Hoek. Two members were preachers: Atze Wybes van der Hoek, d. 1835, untrained minister serving Edam 1791-96 and Twisk-Abbekerk 1796-1835, and his cousin Wybe Hommes van der Hoek, b. 1790, d. Aug. 15, 1875, at Wolvega, appointed ministerial candidate by the church board of Twisk in 1812, serving Aalsmeer as a candidate 1812-14, as a minister 1814-15, Grouw "Kleine Huis" 1815-19, Wieringen 1819-23, and Kromwal Ytens 1823-62. In 1831-38 he also served the Kleinzand congregation of Sneek (DB 1890, 120-23). In 1849 he addressed the Executive Committee of the Conference in Friesland on behalf of provisions to be made for Mennonites living in towns where there was no congregation. (DB 1894, 73.) vdZ.

Hoeksteen, De (Cornerstone), a Dutch Mennonite 8-page (sometimes 6, 10, or 12 pp.) monthly periodical, published by the Youth Association (Doopsgezinde Jongeren Bond, q.v.), first number October 1935. vdZ.

Hoekstra is the name of two Mennonite families in the Netherlands, many members of which have served as preachers. The ancestor of the one family was Sytse Benedictus Hoekstra (1698-1768), whose biography and descendants are given in the article under his name. Important members of the other Hoekstra family were Freerk (q.v., 1760-1837), and his grandson Johannes (1836-1908), preacher at Middelstum (1861-74) and Wolvega (1874-79), where he promoted the restoration of the meetinghouse and dedicated it in 1875. In 1879 he retired to Apeldoorn where he organized a chapter of the Nederlandsch Protestantenbond (q.v.) and shared in the founding of the Mennonite congregation. (N.N.B.Wb. I, 1120 f.; Biogr. Wb. IV, 87.) vdZ.

Hoekstra, Freerk, b. 1760 at Dokkum, studied at the Mennonite Seminary in Amsterdam 1780-85 under Prof. H. Oosterbaan, and on June 18, 1786, became the Mennonite minister at Holwerd. From here he went to Zaandam in 1791 and then to Harlingen in 1792, where he served until his retirement in October 1836. He died March 31, 1837. He was married to Ynske Terpstra. In 1827 he achieved a union between the Witmarsum and Pingjum congregations. He was also one of the founders of the Friesch Weduwenfonds (1805).

He is best known as a writer of children's literature (P. Cool wrote an extensive treatise on F. Hoekstra as a children's author, DB 1869, 56-89). For children he wrote De geschiedenis van Jesus, in gesprekken (Harlingen, 1825, reprinted 1842); De geschiedenis der Apostelen (Harlingen, 1818); De gelijkenissen van Jesus (Haarlem, 1821); and De Wonderwerken van Jesus (Haarlem, 1833). A catechism which he published in 1804, Vragen en antwoorden over den godsdienst (3 editions), was widely accepted. In addition to numerous occasional sermons he also published Kerkelijke redevoeringen (Groningen, 1816, reprinted 1837), Lijkrede op Heere Oosterbaan (Amsterdam, 1807), Verhandeling over de waarheid van den Christelijken godsdienst, and Verhandeling over de voortreffelijkheid der christlijke zedeleer (Haarlem, 1825); also Zedelijke en godsdienstige vertoogen (Arnhem, 1827-31).

His grandson Johannes Hoekstra (1836-1908) served the congregations of Middelstum 1861-74 and Wolvega 1874-79. At Wolvega he promoted the restoration of the meetinghouse and dedicated it in 1875. He retired in 1879 and moved to Apeldoorn, where he was active in founding first a section of the Dutch Protestant Union and in 1896 a Mennonite congregation. J.L.

A. van Steenderen, Iets ter nagedachtenis van Freerk Hoekstra (Franeker, 1839); Biogr. Wb. IV, 76 f.; N.N.B.Wb. II, 1119 f.; DB 1869, 56-89; ML II, 323.

Hoekstra, Johannes Albertus, a Dutch Mennonite preacher, the son of Sjoerd Hoekstra and Maria Jans Valk, b. June 28, 1763, at Emden. He studied theology at the Mennonite seminary "de Zon" in Amsterdam; in 1784 he was called as pastor to the Edam church. He remained here until January 1786, served a year at Westzaan-Nord, then went to Utrecht, and in 1793 to Altona, Germany, where he remained until his death (Dec. 7, 1817). The funeral sermon delivered by J. Goos, and a booklet, Ter nagedachtenis van J. A. S. Hoekstra, by J. Schultz, both appeared in Altona in 1817. He was a member of the directorate of Tot Nut van't Algemeen (q.v.).

A collection of sermons preached by J. A. Hoekstra and his father Sjoerd Hoekstra, Plegtige leerredenen te Emden en Utrecht, was published in Utrecht in 1790. He also wrote Leerredenen en bedestonden (Utrecht, 1787); Twee leeredenen bij den doop, en afscheid van Utrecht (Utrecht, 1793); Iets ter handhaaving en bevordering van waarheid en plicht (Altona, 1794); Iets over Gods grootheid (Altona, 1797); Dichtkundige menglingen (Amsterdam, 1800); Dank- und Ermahnungs-predigt (Altona, 1801); Jubelpredikatie wegens 25 jarige ambtsverrichting in onderscheiden Doopsgezinde gemeenten, gehouden te Altona am 8. October 1809 (Altona, 1809). In addition he published with G. Karsdorp and J. de Jager, Leerredenen. Met een vertoog, dat genade en plicht, de leer van Jesus en zijne apostelen, ook de leer van Menno en de waare Mennoniten is (Altona, 1794), and with G. Karsdorp, Stand- en Gedachtenisrede over Jan de Jager, Prediger zu Hamburg und Altona (1802) and with J. Goos, Ter gedachtenis van Gerrit Karsdorp, a preacher at Hamburg and Altona, who died on Oct. 11, 1811. (Biogr. Wb. IV, 77 f.; N.N.B.Wb. I, 1121; ML II, 323.) J.L.

Hoekstra, Sjoerd, a Dutch Mennonite preacher, the son of Jakob Hoekstra, was born Jan. 20, 1805, at Den Helder, and studied at the University and the Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam. In 1829 he went to Medemblick, and from there in 1835 to Twisk; here he was in active service until his retirement in 1881. He died Aug. 1, 1894. Hoekstra is known best for his investigations on the principles of Anabaptist life. J. H. Scholten, the well-known professor at Leiden, had previously discussed Anabaptist principles in De leer der Hervormde kerk; this book was refuted by D. S. Gorter (q.v.), and more extensively by Hoekstra, under the title Nog iets over het eigenlijk wezen van den Doopsgezinden Christen (Hoorn, 1851). He discussed the oath in Doopsgezinde Lektuur II, in an article titled "Het Doopsgezind gevoelen omtrent den eed, opnieuw ter toetse gebragt." In addition he wrote the following: Leiddraad voor eenvoudigen in het afleggen van belijdenis (Medemblik, 1836); Jesus in Zijne verhevenheid (2 vv., Medemblik, 1838); Het Evangelie. Een onderwijsboek (Amsterdam, 1848); Nieuwe beschouwingen van Jesus' persoon en werk (2 vv., Medemblik, 1852); Feestrede bij 25jarige Evangeliebediening (Amsterdam, 1854), besides various articles in the Jaarboeken voor Wetenschappelijke Theologie. (Biogr. Wb. IV, 78 f.; N.N.B.Wb. I, 1121; DB 1894, 172; ML II, 323.) J.L.

Hoekstra, Bzn, Sytse, professor at the Mennonite Seminary and the University of Amsterdam, one of the outstanding theologians of his day. He was born on Aug. 20, 1822, the son of Benedictus Hoekstra and Aafje Pruit, at Wieringerwaard, where the parsonage of the Oudesluis congregation —now Noord-Zijpe—was located. To his mother (d. 1855) Hoekstra owed much of his education. In 1840 he attended the Athenaeum at Amsterdam, studying with the Orientalist Taco Roorda, and at the same time finished the theological course at the Mennonite Seminary, becoming a ministerial candidate on June 15, 1845. He served the Akkrum congregation as pastor until 1852, and then the Rotterdam congregation until 1857.

On Nov. 26, 1856, he was appointed by the A.D.S. to succeed Samuel Muller (q.v.) as professor in the seminary, at Muller's own suggestion, who had been his teacher. He received an honorary doctor's degree from the University of Leiden on Feb. 3, 1857, and two weeks later he delivered his inaugural address, Oratio de summae veritatis cognoscendae ratione et via (Amsterdam, 1857), translated into Dutch by J. van Gilse, De weg der wetenschap op godgeleerd en wysgeerig gebied (same date and place). From 1877 on, when the Athenaeum was converted into a university, he lectured on Christian doctrine, ethics, and philosophy of religion, and also had charge of Biblical theology. At times he also lectured on logic. He retired in June 1892, and died at Ellecom on June 12, 1898. On July 21, 1873, he married Rebecca Anna van Geuns (d. 1909). He was a member of the Association of Dutch Letters (1857), Teyler's Theological Association (1858), and the Royal Academy of Science (1865); in 1874 the king gave him the rank of knight of the Dutch Lion.

Hoekstra was characterized by Samuel Cramer (q.v.) as "probably the keenest thinker that Holland produced in his field in the 19th century." His spirit is best revealed in three of his works: Het geloof des hartens volgens het Evangelie (Amsterdam, 1856, 2d ed. 1857); Bronnen en grondslagen van het godsdienstig geloof (Amsterdam, 1864); and De Hoop der Onsterfelijkheid (Amsterdam, 1867). In the first of these Hoekstra was a supranaturalist, closely related to the ethicist Chantepie de la Saussaye (professor at the University of Groningen). He accepts the pre-existence, the miraculous birth and the miracles of Jesus, declaring, "Such a person as Jesus must do wonders, if He was not intentionally to conceal the divine life that was in Him." He gradually changed his views and became a theological liberal. He formulated a theory of faith in God, the immortality of the human spirit, and the supersensual character of the moral law. In opposition to the empiricism of Opzoomer he set his ethical idealism; in opposition to Scholten's theocentric theology and definite determinism he defended an anthropocentric theology and a psychological indeterminism. Hoekstra said, "All faith in a supersensual world is based on faith in the truth of our own inner being," so that we cannot base the understanding of our spiritual life alone on sensual perceptions, but especially on spiritual experience. "The ineradicable needs and strivings in man cannot deceive us concerning the deepest reality." In the area of religion, "faith in ourselves" is an infallible rule, and he endorses Pascal's statement, "Le coeur a ses raisons, que la raison ne connait pas." The needs of life awaken faith in a higher world order and faith finds in these needs also its justification. That religion and ethics are interrelated Hoekstra is firmly convinced. "The fear of God is, if not one of the components, at least a necessary condition or the basis of all higher ethics."

His book, De Hoop der Onsterfelijkheid, was called by van der Wyck, the professor of philosophy, "the most beautiful book that Hoekstra has written." Here too hope is rooted subjectively in faith, and is not based on scientific evidence. A healthy human soul must understand that spiritual development is its goal in life, and for the genuine life of the spirit, a belief in immortality is essential. This human life cannot be comprehended if this is the true life rather than the introduction to another life.

As opposed to Scholten's determinism, Hoekstra wrote Vrijheid in verband met zelfbewustzijn en zonde (Amsterdam, 1857). The freedom of the will is for him the deciding "factor of dawning morality." In the period of the formation of the moral character man has the capacity to choose between motives that act upon him. Not even the most powerful motives must of necessity control him; he can choose one and discard the other. The heroes of history he did not consider as products of their time, but as personalities from whom a decisive influence has emanated upon humanity. At the end of his life he published Zedenleer (3 vv., Amsterdam, 1894); then Wijsgeerige godsdienstleer (2 vv., Amsterdam, 1894 f.); Geschiedenis der Zedenleer (2 vv., Amsterdam, 1896); and De Christelyke Geloofsleer (2 vv., Amsterdam, 1898). These books, actually theological lectures, are inferior to his earlier works; while he was working on them he was already struggling with physical ailment.

Hoekstra always remained a Christian philosopher, who did not detach faith from historical Christianity and from Jesus, but he did not want to present a rounded system of the concepts of faith. He illuminates a question from all sides, but does not find it necessary to come to a conclusion. Paradoxes, such as God's foreknowledge and the freedom of our will, God's foreknowledge and answer to prayer he leaves side by side. He did not found a theological school, for he did not want to be a leader of a wing; he was rather a pure scholar, not popular, not even with his students, with whom he associated little.

Nevertheless his influence was profound in circles of many kinds; his clear sermons made a deep impression, his catechetical booklet was widely used for mature students. His first writings, such as Geloof en leven des Christens (Sneek, 1852, republished 1855 and 1862); Levensvragen over den weg des heils in Christus (Sneek, 1853, reprinted); De leer des Evangelies, voor beschaafde en nadenkende christenen ontwikkeld (2 vv., Sneek, 1854 f., reprinted 1858); Het Evangelie der genade in de gelijkenis van den Verloren Zoon (Sneek, 1854, reprinted 1860); Het geloof des harten and Bronnen en grondslagen van het godsdienstig geloof, gave a clearer insight into the Bible, not only to theologians, but to a wide circle of readers. His students also carried his views into many Mennonite congregations. Even the theologians of our day have recognized the high worth of his views. Eerdmans observed that it would not have been to the disadvantage of modern theology if it had moved more in the direction given it by Hoekstra; and Prof. Roessingh laments that the Dutch theologians did not more basically seek to solve the problems of theology along the lines that Hoekstra pointed out.

Even though Hoekstra became known as a philosophical thinker, he was in fact a universal scholar; in every field of theological scholarship he was more or less at home. Born of a genuinely Mennonite family, he was excellently versed in the history and teaching of the fathers, as is shown in his book, Beginselen en leer der oude Doopsgezinden, vergeleken met die van de overige Protestanten (Amsterdam, 1863). He contested their Waldensian origin, considering them rather as the original and faithful representatives of the Reformation of the 16th century in the Netherlands. Their fundamental principle was the building of a spotless church of God, and their other characteristics were accordingly more essential or more accidental. Among the relatively accidental characteristics he counts baptism upon confession of faith, which is by many considered the principal tenet. Their importance he also sees in their tendency to the practical, but they have thereby presented only "one side of the Christian spirit and that only imperfectly." The church can fulfill its task best when it keeps itself free of an exclusive community spirit.

Hoekstra was a good man, sincere, willing to help, and very benevolent. Spiritual pride was foreign to him, sharp criticism did not wound him, he could not hold a grudge. Nor was he calculating, and therefore he frequently uttered all too heedlessly what his sense of humor dictated, and the tone in which he said it at times caused offense. Nor was he a master of language, and was therefore unable to clothe his developing ideas concretely.

Hoekstra wrote an unusual amount, and many articles he wrote for periodicals are well worth reading. He published them in Theologisch Tijdschrift; Licht, Liefde, Leven; Doopsgezinde Lectuur, of which he was for a time an editor; Verslagen en Mededeelingen van de Koninklijke Academie van Wetenschapen; De Gids; Godgeleerde Bijdragen; Nederland; Christelijk Album; De Referent; Christelijke Huisvriend; Evangelisch Tijdschrift; and Taal des Geloofs. Besides these works already mentioned he published the following: with M. A. Amshoff et al., De feestvierende Christen (Amsterdam, 1855); De triumph der liefde in alle beproeving, bezongen in het Lied der liederen (Utrecht, 1856); Inhoud en doel der Evangelieprediking, Leerrede over Titus 3:8 en 9 (Amsterdam, 1857); Waarheid in liefde. Afscheidsrede over 2. Joh. 3 (Rotterdam, 1857); De twee getuigenissen van den lijdenden Jesus aangaande zichzelven. Leerredenen (Amsterdam, 1860); Wedergeboorte. Leerrede over Joh. 3:1-9 (Amsterdam, 1858, reprinted); De weg tot Evangeliekennis. Leerrede over Gal. 1:11 en 12 (Amsterdam, 1859); Grondslag, wezen en openbaring van het godsdienstig geloof volgens de H. Schrift (Rotterdam, 1861); with J. Tideman et al., Zestal leerredenen (Amsterdam, 1861); De Zoon des menschen, de Heiland der wereld (Amsterdam, 1861); De ontwikkeling der zedelijke idee in de geschiedenis with the supplement, De zondeloosheid of volmaakte rechtvaardigheid van Jesus (Amsterdam, 1862); De benaming "de Zoon des menschen," historisch-kritisch onderzocht (Amsterdam, 1866); Des Christens godsvrucht naar de eigne leer van Jesus (Amsterdam, 1866); with van Bell et al., Voorlezingen over bijbelsche berichten aangaande het leven van Jesus (Amsterdam, 1866); De vervloeking van de vijgenboom (Haarlem, 1871); De tegenstelling van Optimisme en Pessimisme. Academische redevoering op 21. Sept. 1880 (Amsterdam, 1880); Het jaarcijfer 81 als getuige van de beteekenis des geloofs (Amsterdam, 1881).† J.L.

J. Molenaar, "Professor Hoekstra," in Mannen van Beteekenis, 1897; Theologisch Tijdschrift, 1898, 448-54; van der Wyck, "Levensbericht van S. Hoekstra," in Jaarboek der Koninkl. Academie van Wetenschappen, 1901; DB 1898, 150-62; 1901, 27; DJ 1903, 25-34 (with portrait); 1943, 61-67; K. H. Roessingh, De Moderne Theologie in Nederland. Hare voorbereiding en eerste periode (1914) 166-82; Gorter's Doopsgezind Lectuur III (1858) 13 f., 33; W. F. Golterman, De Godsdienstwijsbegeerte van S. Hoekstra Bz (Assen, 1942); Biogr. Wb. IV, 79-87; N.N.B.Wb. I, 1122-26; HRE VIII, 195 ff.; DB 1898, 150-62; 1901, 27; DJ 1903, 25-34 (with portrait); 1943, 61-67; ML II, 323-25.

Hoekstra, Sytse Benedictus, b. 1698 at Oudega near Witveen, Dutch province of Friesland, d. July 13, 1768, at Den Burg on the island of Texel. He did not receive a special training for the ministry; before and also during the first years of his ministry he was a farmer. He was the progenitor of a large family of Dutch Mennonites, which has produced many preachers. He was minister at Witveen 1722, Veenwouden 1726, Kollum 1736, Kollum and Buitenpost 1742, Burg op Texel 1753 to his death. He wrote Bespiegelnde en practische onderwijzingen uit Genesis III (expanded and published by his son, Zaandam, 1756), and Beknopte antwoorden op vragen voor den Doop (Zaandam, 1766). (N.N.B.Wb. I, 1126; DB 1868, 90 f.; 1890, 108-10.) He was married to Joukje Egberts, was the father of five daughters and six sons, all of whom became preachers in the strict Zonist Mennonite branch:

1. Benedictus (1722-79), preacher at Buitenpost 1743, den Ilp 1746, and Westzaan (Frisian congregation) 1754-79. He published a funeral address for his father (Zaandam, 1768); Vragen met korte antwoorden over den Doop en het Avondmaal (Zaandam, 1771), and Het antidox character van Justus Benevolens (Zaandam, n.d.). (Biogr. Wb. IV, 75 f.; N.N.B.Wb. I, 1119; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 711).

2. Egbertus (d. 1798), minister at Goedereede 1745 and at Groningen (United Flemish and Waterlander congregation) 1754-98 (N.N.B.Wb. I, 1119; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1056).

3. Sjoerd (d. 1789), preacher at Aalsmeer 1748, Ouddorp 1754, and Emden 1759-89. His son published a collection of sermons delivered by his father and himself, Plegtige leerredenen te Emden en Utrecht. Sjoerd was married to Maria Jans Valk and had a son, Johannes Albertus (q.v.; N.N.B.Wb. I, 121).

4. Wytse, b. about 1728 or 1729 at Veenwouden, d. March 27, 1801, at Rotterdam, was married to Jannetje C. Loos of Blokzijl (N.N.B.Wb. I, 1126; Biogr. Wb. IV, 76). He was preacher at Veenwouden 1751, Blokzijl 1753, where he united the Flemish and Danziger Old Flemish congregations, and Rotterdam 1786. He wrote Leerzame en vertroostende gedachten. His son Sytse Wytses (1757-86), married to Elisabeth van Cleef, was preacher at Den Ilp, June to December 1780; Kampen 1780; West-Zaandam 1782-86. He wrote Over de natuur van onzen Middelaar Jesus Christus, published with the funeral address delivered at his death by H. van Gelder (Amsterdam, 1768). (N.N.B.Wb. I, 1121; Biogr. Wb. IV, 87.)

5. Hidser, b. March 14, 1730, at Veenwouden, d. Sept. 7, 1772, at Sneek, preacher at Burg op Texel 1761, Harlingen 1763, Sneek (Kleinzand Old Flemish congregation) 1764-72 (N.N.B.Wb. I, 1120; DB 1890, 107-10). His son Sytse Hidsers, b. 1757 at Den Burg, d. there on June 7, 1814, married to Neeltje Jacobs Baske, was preacher at Den Helder 1777, and Texel 1790-1814 (N.N.B.Wb. I, 1122; DB 1873, 151-54. Sytse had two sons: (a) Jacob, b. about 1779 at Den Helder, d. May 12, 1850, at Kampen, preacher at Hoorn op Texel 1812, and Den Helder 1815-39. His son was Soerd (1805-94, q.v.); (b) Benedictus, b. March 5, 1793, at Den Burg, d. Jan. 19, 1872, at Barsingerhorn, married to Aafje Pruit. For his theological training he was not sent to the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, because his father did not like the liberal teaching of Prof. Hesselink (q.v.). So Benedictus Hoekstra was trained for the ministry by Preacher H. Veenstra of Texel (DB 1898, 161). He was preacher at Oudesluis 1813, and then 1828-63 at Barsingerhorn (N.N.B.Wb. I, 1119). His son was Prof. Sytse Hoekstra Bzn (1822-98, q.v.).

6. Johannes, b. at Kollum (?) about 1740, d. at Heerenveen in 1776, was preacher at Burg op Texel 1764, and Heerenveen 1765-76. (ML II, 322.)

J.L., vdZ.

Hoen, Cornelius Hendrickz, d. before April 1524, lived at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, lawyer of the Court of Holland at The Hague. At Delft Hoen heard the preaching of a Dominican monk Wouter, known as "the Lutheran monk," who "gave him the sense of truth." This may have happened about 1510, though it is more likely that Hoen became averse to Roman Catholicism shortly after 1517. Reading the writings of Erasmus, Gansfort, and Luther, he more and more rejected the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, no longer believing that the real flesh and blood of Christ were present in the host. Hoen exposed his new views in Epistola Christiana, in which he wrote that communion should not be a sacrament in the Catholic sense, but merely a commemoration of the death of Christ; the bread should be understood as a symbol. The word "is" in Christ's words "this is my body" has not the sense of "this really is," but "this means," as when Christ says, "I am the vine." This letter by Hoen was brought to Luther by Hinne Rode in 1521, but Luther rejected Hoen's symbolical conception, because he wished to maintain the real presence of Christ in the sacrament. Two years later, in January 1523, Rode visited Oecolampad in Basel, who read the letter with much interest and advised Rode to travel to Zürich and present the letter to Zwingli. Zwingli, whose doctrine of the communion at this time was still somewhat uncertain, was very receptive to Hoen's views. "In this letter," he writes, "I found a pearl of great value; is has the sense of means." Zwingli soon adopted Hoen's views, which in this way also became the Anabaptist concept. In the meantime Hoen was arrested (February 1523) for heresy. Before he came to trial he died.

Hoen's Epistola Christiana was published by Zwingli in 1525 and re-edited by W. Eekhof at The Hague in 1917. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. IV, 90-92; J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, Geschiedenis der Kerkhervorming in Nederland . . . (Amsterdam, 1873) passim, see Index; L. Knappert, Het ontstaan en de vestiging van het Protestantisme in de Nederlanden (Utrecht, 1924) passim, see Index; DB 1910, 110 f.; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 57.

Hoeve, Vincent van der, sheriff of the city of Amersfoort, Dutch province of Utrecht, was publicly beheaded at Utrecht (city) on Aug. 25, 1569, because he had favored the Mennonites at Amersfoort, tolerating them and permitting them to hold meetings. This protector of the Mennonites was apparently not a member of the church. (DB 1863, 94; 1918, 123 f.) vdZ.

Hofer, name of a Hutterite family of wide ramifications. The Hofers originated in Carinthia, Austria, where they had been staunch Lutherans, for which reason they were exiled by Empress Maria Theresa to Transylvania in 1755. The founder was a Johannes Hofer of St. Peter, with his wife, five sons, and two daughters. Besides we hear also of two brothers Matthias and Michael Hofer, who left their parents and a brother and joined the transmigrants. These Hofers were strong characters unafraid to oppose the authorities whenever demands were made impinging upon their freedom of conscience. The result was conflict and jail (in Hermannstadt, Transylvania) almost from the beginning in 1756. Michael died there in 1757. Matthias spent a total of 16 years (1756-72) in this jail, composing there 30 hymns and many Biblical tracts. In the meantime the entire brotherhood had migrated to the Ukraine, where Matthias eventually joined his brethren. Unfortunately, he was a man of strange ideas, very headstrong. Although he was highly regarded for his straightforwardness and profound familiarity with the Scriptures, he soon became a thorn in the flesh of the brotherhood, requiring midnight prayers, forbidding singing while at work, not greeting anybody who was not a brother, etc. Eventually he had no choice than to leave his family and the brotherhood. He wandered to Prussia, where he visited the Mennonite Elder Gerhard Wiebe (q.v.) of Ellerwald (Johannes Waldner in the Klein-Geschichtbuch says that in this way the contact with the Prussian Mennonites was established), then went on to Hamburg, perhaps to go to Pennsylvania. But he had no money, and returned again to Prussia, where he died among Mennonites in 1786.

Of the five sons of Johannes, the eldest son, also named Johannes, is described in the Klein-Geschichtbuch likewise as a headstrong man with queer ideas. In 1784, when peace could not be achieved in the colony in Vishenka, Ukraine, he, too, left the brotherhood, and went first to Sobotiste, and then to Silesia. Here he proposed to the authorities the establishment of a new Bruderhof, which was welcomed. But he did not find followers, and the brethren in the Ukraine did not want to have any dealing with him. Thus he failed and soon after disappeared. The brethren heard nothing more from him.

The other Hofer sons, Michael (d. 1793), Christian (d. 1802), Paul (d. 1790), and Jacob (d. 1811), were highly regarded among their brethren. But none of them had a leading position. Of the second generation we hear of one Jacob Hofer, who together with Michael Waldner (q.v.) re-established community of goods in Hutterdorf, Southern Ukraine, in 1859 (the Schmiede Leut). One year later, in 1860, Darius Walter, a preacher, established another Bruderhof in Huttertal, where community of goods was again established anew, after it had been discontinued in Russia for over 40 years (the Darius Leut). The preacher Jörg Hofer was among the first to join this new group. In 1864 more such colonies were established with David and Peter Hofer among the constituents. David died in 1868; Peter came to America with all the other brethren.

Of the family of this Peter the Chronicle has a sad story to tell. Three sons, David, Josef, and Michael, were called to serve as United States soldiers during World War I. They refused to compromise, and, since adequate provisions for CO's did not exist, were sent first to the ill-famed federal prison at Alcatraz, Cal., and then to the not less ill-famed prison at Leavenworth, Kan. Here they were submitted to nearly unbelievably cruel treatment; Josef and Michael died here in 1918, while David survived (Klein-Geschichtbuch, 482-86).

Today Hofers are found on many Bruderhofs in Alberta and Montana, many in leading positions. One preacher David Hofer traveled to Europe with Michael Waldner in 1937-38 to assist the New Hutterites (Arnold Leut) in their exit from Germany, and also to visit the old places of their ancestors. His very interesting travel report exists only in mimeographed form but would deserve publication. One Hofer family separated and started a small brotherhood of their own, called "The Hutterian Fellowship" (Brocket, Alberta). A number of Hofers moved away from the brotherhood altogether and joined the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren, with one mission station in Chicago, of which D. M. Hofer (q.v.) was the pastor for many years. Others joined the General Conference Mennonite Church, in which there were several Hofer preachers in 1954.

It should be mentioned that one Preacher Peter Hofer continued the Klein-Geschichtbuch where Johannes Waldner had left it, that is, for 1802-77. But his work is rather inadequate and merely annalistic. (Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtbuch.)

R.F.

Hofer, David, chosen to the ministry of the Hutterian Brethren for the Rockport Bruderhof, S.D., on June 13, 1897, and confirmed by Michael Stahl, elder of the Darius branch on Nov. 25, 1900.

D.D.

Hofer, David, chosen Hutterian Brethren preacher of the Milltown Bruderhof June 2, 1907, confirmed Oct. 10, 1909. He died April 6, 1941, in the James Valley Bruderhof in Canada at the age of 64, having been in the ministry for 33 years. D.D.

Hofer, David M., K.M.B. evangelist, editor, city missionary, and relief worker, b. July 24, 1869, in Johannesruh, Russia, d. Dec. 31, 1944, in Chicago. In 1879 he emigrated to the United States with his parents, Michael and Mary Gross Hofer, and settled on a farm near Bridgewater, S.D. In 1893 he married Barbara Hofer. In 1902-14 he was engaged in the grain and banking business; 1914 he left the business field and answered the call into the ministry. With Joseph W. Tschetter as associate he founded the Lincoln Avenue Gospel Mission in Chicago in 1915. He edited the Wahrheitsfreund, the organ of the K.M.B. Conference 1917-33. In 1922-23 he served as American relief administrator in Russia. He was the author of Die Hungersnot in Russland und unsere Reise um die Welt (Chicago, 1924). J.S.M.

Hofer, George, chosen preacher of the Hutterian Brethren in Russia (probably in 1857), date of confirmation unknown, died in the Wolf Creek, S.D., Bruderhof Jan. 5, 1882, at the age of 64 years, having served in the ministry for 25 years. D.D.

Hofer, Jakob, a Hutterian Brethren preacher chosen in Russia in 1859. He died in the Milltown Bruderhof in South Dakota in 1900 at the age of 70. He served as preacher for 41 years. D.D.

Hofer, Peter, chosen a preacher of the Hutterian Brethren, March 29, 1857, and confirmed Dec. 22, 1857, at Huttertal in Russia, by Peter Wedel, an elder of the Alexanderwohl congregation. D.D.

Hoffmann, Christoph (1815-85), the founder of the brotherhood of the Deutscher Tempel, grew up in Korntal near Stuttgart, Württemberg, Germany, which his father had founded. He was a delegate to the parliament of Frankfurt, in 1848 founded the Evangelischer Verein, which established a school for evangelists to revive the church, withdrew from it in 1853, served for a short time as inspector at St. Chrischona near Basel, in 1854 called a meeting of the Jerusalemsfreunde (Friends of Jerusalem) at Ludwigsburg, and in 1861, on the Kirschenhardthof near Marbach he founded the Deutscher Tempel zur Ausführung des Gesetzes, des Evangeliums und der Weissagung, which found adherents in Württemberg, Russia, North America, and Palestine. On a trip to Russia he and his friend Christian Paulus (1861-63) gained a following among the Mennonites, giving rise to a Tempel movement. Many of Hoffmann's adherents among the Russian Mennonites, however, left him when in his open letter of 1877-82 he abandoned his Biblical position for a rationalistic one. The periodical of the movement, Süddeutsche Warte, was also read by the Mennonites of Russia.

Gnadenfeld (q.v.), where a movement originated which gave life to the Mennonite Brethren, was also the scene of the origin of the Tempel movement in Russia. Johannes and Friedrich Lange, who had attended the Paulusinstitut of the Templers in South Germany, became teachers in the Gnadenfeld Bruderschule, promoting a pietistic rationalistic chiliasm with a strong emphasis on the significance of education. Parallel with the Mennonite Brethren movement this caused a great disturbance in the Molotschna Mennonite brotherhood. In 1863 the group withdrew from the Mennonite Church under the leadership of Nikolai Schmidt and organized as a separate church, which established the Tempelhof settlement in the Caucasus in 1868. The group also became known as Jerusalemsfreunde, a sort of Mennonite Zionism which caused some of them to emigrate to Palestine. The Alexandrodar Mennonite Church of Jerusalemsfreunde consisted of 148 persons in 1905, with Isaak Fast as elder. NEFF, C.K.

H. Görz, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Steinbach, 1951) 86-90; H. Dirks, Statistik . . . (1905) 69; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 88-91; Chr. Hoffman, Mein Weg nach Jerusalem (2 vv., 1881-84); Fr. Lange, Geschichte des Tempels (1899); E. Rohrer, Die Tempel Gesellschaft (1920); Heinrich Sawatzky, Die Templer mennonitischer Herkunft (Winnipeg, 1955); ML II, 325 f.

Hoffnungsau Mennonite Church near Buhler (q.v.), Kan., was organized on Feb. 22, 1875, after the arrival of a group of immigrants who originally belonged to the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church (q.v.) in Russia. They crossed the Atlantic on the Teutonia under the leadership of Dietrich Gaeddert, arriving in New York on Sept. 2, 1874, settling on some 35 sections of land in Harvey, McPherson, and Reno counties near Buhler. After their arrival the meetings were held in the immigrant house (1874-80), which was destroyed by a tornado. On Oct. 2, 1880, the cornerstone was laid for the first building made of adobe, which was completed on Dec. 19. This building was replaced in 1898 by a wooden structure, which was destroyed by fire in 1948 and replaced by a brick building in 1949. The change from the use of the German to English in worship took place after World War I.

The congregation was the first Mennonite church in the Buhler-Inman area; from it have been organized the Buhler Mennonite Church (q.v.), 1920, and Inman Mennonite Church (q.v.), 1921. Dietrich Gaeddert (q.v.) was elected elder on April 19, 1876, and served the congregation in this capacity until he died Dec. 4, 1900. Since that time the following have served as elders: Abraham Ratzlaff 1901-24, A. J. Dyck 1925-46, and Albert Gaeddert 1946- . The congregation had a membership of 369 in 1954. C.K.

A. J. Dyck, "Hoffnungsau in Kansas," in Menn. Life, October 1949, 18 ff.

Hoffnungsau Mennonite (GCM) Church (Mennonite Fellowship), Cuauhtemoc, Chihuahua, consists of a few GCM families who came to Mexico after World War I. Most of the immigrants have meanwhile moved to the U.S. and Canada. Some Old Colony Mennonites fellowship in the Hoffnungsau Church.

H. P. Krehbiel was invited by the group to organize a church in 1938. For a while J. H. Janzen, who was ordained to the ministry within the group by J. M. Regier, served the congregation. Frank Dyck also served. Since 1950 B. H. Janzen has been serving the church, sponsored by the Mission Board of the General Conference Mennonite Church. During the extreme drought the congregation played a significant role in giving spiritual and material aid to the Old Colony Mennonites (q.v.) of the area. In 1954 there were 37 members with a total of 73 associated with the congregation. C.K.

Hoffnungsau Preparatory School was located in McPherson Co., Kan., near the Hoffnungsau Mennonite Church (GCM). It was organized in 1906 and continued to give instruction until 1929, when it was discontinued. The curriculum was composed of Bible courses and some of the courses commonly taught during the first year of high school. The school was established primarily to offer to the young people of that community instruction in Bible and some of the basic non-Bible courses before public high schools were established in that area. The school enjoyed adequate support from its friends. The average attendance was between 25 and 35 students. The following teachers served it during its existence: J. H. Epp 1907-14, Abraham Albrecht 1914-20, Edward E. Flickinger 1920-22, A. J. Dyck 1922-25, Henry Hege 1925-26, and P. T. Neufeld 1926-29. M.S.H.

Hoffser, Jürg, of Obergallbach, Signau district of Switzerland, an Anabaptist martyr, executed on Aug. 28, 1537, at Bern.

Mart. Mir. E 1129, note; A. Fluri, Beiträge zur Geschichte der bernischen Täufer (Bern, 1912) 14; ML II, 326.

Hofkes, former Mennonite family in the Netherlands, now extinct. Its members were especially found in the congregations of Winterswijk and Almelo.

Hofmann, Melchior, the noted early Anabaptist leader, was born about 1495 at Schwäbisch-Hall. He received a good elementary education and learned the furrier's trade. He was early interested in religious literature, especially the writings of the mystics, Tauler, Deutsche Theologie, etc. He also acquired a thorough knowledge of the Bible. The writings of Martin Luther moved him deeply and he became Luther's zealous follower.

In 1523 business took him to Livland; here he was soon drawn into the religious movement of the Reformation. In the shortage of Protestant preachers, Hofmann entered this service and preached at Wolmar until persecution caused his imprisonment and expulsion from the country. Nevertheless his influence here must have been lasting, for even from Sweden he wrote admonitions to his Wolmar friends. In the fall of 1524 he came to Dorpat where he preached against the use of images. This led to a fateful wave of iconoclasm (Jan. 10, 1525), in which he, however, did not participate (Leendertz, 26). The populace successfully opposed his arrest by the church authorities; this constituted a victory for the Protestant cause.

In the new state of affairs the city council was doubtful about permitting the furrier to continue his preaching, and demanded an approval of his doctrine by recognized theological authorities. He therefore betook himself to Riga where the Protestant preachers Knöpken and Tegetmeier gave him this approval. Hofmann then went on to Wittenberg to get Luther's confirmation of his preaching. He arrived there about the middle of June and was joyfully received by Luther. Luther and Bugenhagen together wrote to the churches in Livland Ein christlich Vermahnung von äusserlichem Gottesdienst und Eintracht an die in Liefland, durch Martinum Luther und Andere (Wittenberg, 1525), to which Hofmann added a letter of June 22 (Krohn, 51-57) with the title, "Jhesus. Der christlichen gemey zu Derpten ynn Lieflandt wunschet Melchior Hofmann gnad und fride, sterkung des Glaubens von Gott dem vater und dem Hern Jhesu Christo. Amen." This is Hofmann's earliest known writing. In addition to a strong emphasis on justification alone through faith, the author already stresses the sanctification of life, which must be shown in all the fruits of the Spirit. He opposes the "fanatical spirits" who make themselves illegal executors of God's judgment; for "he who takes the sword shall perish by the sword." In this letter Hofmann's allegorical interpretation of the Bible and his chiliastic ideas are already evident. (Leendertz considers it unlikely that Hofmann met Schwenckfeld and Andreas Carlstadt in Wittenberg, but believes that he became acquainted with Carlstadt's writings here, pp. 41 ff.)

With Luther's written recommendation Hofmann returned to Dorpat in the late summer of 1525. His self-esteem had risen considerably, making his relations with the Lutheran clergy intolerable. They refused to recognize Luther's authorization, whereas Hofmann accused them of self seeking and of denying by their life the faith they preached. He declared that they did not have the divine call to preach, and that they were incapable of understanding the simple word of Scripture. He considered himself a prophet called to testify to the imminence of the final judgment by a stirring cry for repentance. Again and again he referred to Enoch and Elijah, the two witnesses of Christ's return, and with increasing strength the idea possessed him that he was one or the other of the two. His most violent opponent was Tegetmeier, who published a polemic against him, making his position in Dorpat untenable and compelling him to leave the town again.

From Dorpat Hofmann went to Reval in the fall of 1525. Here the Reformation had been introduced and the preaching offices were filled. "There I was made the servant of the sick," he writes. Unselfishly he devoted himself to the service of the church. For his preaching service in Dorpat he accepted no salary, but supported himself with his own labor (Leendertz, 14 and 53). But before long the Lutheran clergy in Reval accused him of heresy because in addition to faith he insisted on the necessity of holy living. His views on communion also differed from Lutheran doctrine. On the other hand, the absence of the fruits of faith in the Lutheran brotherhood raised doubts in Hofmann's mind as to whether it was the true Christian church; the idea of separation from it seems to have occurred to him at this time. He was expelled from Livland.

The prospect of success in Hofmann's trade took him to Sweden. The German Lutheran Church in Stockholm conferred the office of preaching upon him early in 1526. He married and a son was born to him there. He perhaps hoped that his position would be permanent. But King Gustav Vasa, fearing that the stormy nature of the preacher might embarrass the young government, requested his resignation (letter of Jan. 13, 1527), and Hofmann was compelled to move on.

Melchior Hofmann wrote three booklets in Stockholm. The one on the judgment day is lost. The second has the title, An de gelöfigen vorsambling inn Liflant ein korte formaninghe, van Melcher Hoffman sich tho wachten vor falscher lere de sich nu ertzeighen unde inrithen under der sthemme götliker worde (1526). The first part of this booklet is to reveal the "Hiddenness of God," and deals largely with the declaration of the last things, while the second practical part is an argument with his opponents in Livland. The other book offers an exposition of Daniel XII: Das XII. Capitel des propheten Danielis ausgelegt, und das Evangelion des andern sondages, gefallendt inn Advent, und von den zeychenn des jüngsten gerichtes, auch vom sacrament, beicht und der absolution, eyn schöne unterweisung an die in Lieflandt und eyn yden christen nutzlich zu wissen (1526). This important book falls into six parts; the first contains a complete exposition of Daniel 12, verse by verse; the second explains the Gospel for the second Sunday of advent; the third demonstrates that laymen should also be preachers; the fourth deals with communion, the fifth with the confessional, and the sixth with the office of the keys. Of special interest for us is Hofmann's teaching on communion. For him communion is a memorial of the death of Christ and at the same time a celebration of closest union with Christ, which is the product of faith. Conspicuous is this early agreement with the Anabaptists in their rejection of all force in matters of faith and the oath. The end of the world is to occur in 1533.

From Sweden Hofmann returned to Germany, temporarily to Lübeck. It is possible that his ruthless, passionate defense of the Reformation here drew upon him persecution by the city council. Only by hasty flight was he able to avoid a tragic death. Early in 1527, with his wife and child, he arrived in Holstein territory, which was at that time Danish. At first he was unable to establish himself here. In May he made a second trip to Wittenberg, visiting en route at Magdeburg, Luther's friend Nicolas Amsdorf. He evidently wrote Amsdorf of his intention to visit him, for Amsdorf inquired of Luther how to receive this "prophet" and was advised to give him a cold reception and to advise him to return to his trade. Amsdorf consequently rudely showed him the door. In Wittenberg Hofmann was also rejected. Bitterly disappointed he started back; at Magdeburg en route he was jailed and robbed. He placed the blame for this on Amsdorf who had published a violent polemic against him. In Hamburg his poverty compelled him to accept alms from the pastor Zegenhagen.

But when Hofmann arrived in Holstein, great success awaited him. Frederick X, the Danish king, was pleased by his sermons and had him given a position as preacher at the Nicolaikirche at Kiel along with the pastor Wilhelm Pravest. But he lacked the qualifications needed to conduct a quiet and orderly pastorate. He continued his allegorical exegesis of Scripture, finding in every detail of the Ark of the Covenant profound, divine meaning. His favorite topic was "the last things." Without moderation he attacked the senators of Kiel, calling them rogues and thieves from the pulpit.

With his colleague Pravest, who was not of the highest character, his relations were never entirely friendly. Pravest wrote to Luther for advice on the attitude he should take, and received the reply that M. Hofmann, the furrier, should be silenced, for he was neither competent nor called to preach. When Pravest made dishonorable use of this letter, Luther rebuked him in a second letter and to a certain extent defended Hofmann. In a letter to the mayor of Kiel Luther also remarked that Hofmann's intentions were good, but that his acts were hasty.

But Luther's favorable opinion was of short duration. When Hofmann was engaged in his ink-campaign against Amsdorf, Luther wrote to Duke Christian of Denmark, expressing the wish that Hofmann refrain from preaching until he should be better informed. Even more fraught with disaster for Hofmann was his conflict with the Lutheran clergy of Holstein concerning the communion. The bitterness was so deep that the king agreed to proclaim a public disputation.

This disputation was held in the spring of 1529 at Flensburg. Carlstadt, invited by Hofmann to help him, was unable to do so, for Hofmann was unable to secure a safe conduct for him. A stately audience of 400, including the nobility and clergy, met in the church of the monastery of the Barefoot Friars. On the preceding day Hofmann had handed Luther's Vom Missbrauch der Messe to the duke, as support for his concept of communion. On the same evening the duke pleaded with him to yield; when this proved vain he threatened Hofmann with banishment. Hofmann replied that all the scholars of Christendom could not justly do him any harm; but even if God should permit violence to be done to him, they could take from him only his old robe of flesh, which Christ would replace with a new one at the judgment. The duke expressed some surprise that Hofmann would dare to speak so boldly to him, whereupon Hofmann replied, "If all the emperors, kings, princes, popes, bishops, and cardinals should be together in one place, nevertheless the truth shall and must be known to the glory of God; may my Lord and God grant me this." On the next morning, when the duke asked Hofmann about his adherents, he answered, "I know of no adherents; I stand alone in the Word of God, let each do likewise."

Duke Christian presided. Bugenhagen, who was to function as referee without participating in the debate, spoke the opening prayer while the audience kneeled. On Hofmann's side Jan van Campen, Jakob Hegge of Danzig, and Johann Barse spoke; then the disputation was closed. The next day the king presided as the verdict was read, which was solemnly proclaimed in the Franciscan monastery three days later: Melchior Hofmann and those of like opinion must leave their home towns within two days after arriving there, and leave Danish territory within three additional days. Hofmann complained that he had been expelled with wife and child, his house plundered, and an estate of 100 guilders in books and printed matter taken; "even his life was in danger, but God helped him" (Leendertz, 119-35).

From Holstein Hofmann went to East Friesland. En route he met Carlstadt (q.v.), and the two arrived there in late April or early May. At this time Count Enno II (q.v.) was about to reinstate Lutheranism in the place of the Reformed faith. Carlstadt opposed this plan with passion, agitating against Luther "from fortress to fortress, from parsonage to parsonage." Hofmann was probably staying quietly at the castle of Ulrich von Dornum (Leendertz, 141), engaged in writing his Dialogus on the Flensburg disputation. He was kindly accepted as a colleague by the Reformed preachers. He was, however, unable to oppose Enno's plans actively, for he again found himself in embarrassing circumstances and left the country in haste.

Hofmann now betook himself to Strasbourg, where he was received with open arms at the end of June 1529 as a champion of Zwingli's teaching on the communion (letter by Bucer to Zwingli, July 30, 1529). At first he kept very quiet, staying in the house of Andreas Kleiber and his wife Katharina Leid, a gifted woman, who joined the Anabaptist brotherhood in 1532. He published his account of the Flensburg disputation under the title: Dialogus und grüntliche berichtung gehaltener disputation im land zu Holstein underm künig von Denmarck vom hochwirdigen sacrament oder nachtmal des Herren. In gagenwärtigkeit kü. ma. sun hertzog Kersten sampt kü. räten, vilen vom adel und grosser versamlung der priesterschaft. Jetzt kurtzlich geschehen den andern donderstag nach ostern im Jar Christi als man zalt 1529. He made his first contacts with Kaspar Schwenckfeld, without, however, accepting his ideas. He continued to go his rather solitary way and to construct his own peculiar allegorical-spiritualistic doctrine. The theologically trained reformers of Strasbourg, unimpressed, advised him to return to his furrier's craft and stick to it. But Melchior Hofmann was convinced that the Holy Spirit fully compensated for any lack of education; book learning was a hindrance rather than a help. He therefore devoted himself to the publication of several booklets, which appeared early in 1530: (1) Weissagung auss Heiliger Götlicher geschrift. Von den trübsalen diser letsten zeit. Von der schweren Hand und straff Gottes über alles gottlos wesen. Von der zukunfpt des Türkischen Thirannen und seines gantzen anhangs: Wie er sein reiss thun und vollbringen wird unns zu einer straff und rudten, wie er durch Gottes gevalt sein niderlegung unnd straff empfahen wird . . . (1530); (2) Prophezey oder weissagung uss warer heiliger götlicher schrift. Von allen wundern und zeichen bis zu der zukunft Christi Jesu unsers heilands an dem jüngsten tag und DEr welt end. Diese prophecey wird sich anfahen am end der weissagung (kürtzlich von mir aussgegangen in eime andern büchlin von der schweren straf Gottes über alles gotloss wesen durch den Türkischen tirannen (1530); (3) Auslegung der heimlichen Offenbarung Joannis des heyligen Apostels unnd Evangelisten (1530). This last pamphlet was printed in Strasbourg by Balthassar Beck. (He was an Anabaptist according to zur Linden, p. 191, note 1, and was sentenced to prison for printing Hofmann's works without permission.) One of Hofmann's most significant works, this pamphlet had an especially disastrous effect through its glowing description of the return of the Lord. It was dedicated to the king of Denmark. The title page vignette is interesting, representing, as it does, Christ as judge of the world, with Elijah and Enoch as witnesses, and the sun-clad woman riding on the dragon (Rev. 12). In this book Hofmann divides church history into three periods, the first from apostolic times to the reign of the popes, the second the period of the unlimited power of the popes, and the third, already prepared by Hus, beginning with the Reformation, in which the pope is deprived of all power, and the office of the letter is turned into spirit. Then the two witnesses of the last day appear. To destroy them the adherents of the letter will combine with the papists; the two witnesses will suffer death, and the spiritual Jerusalem will be destroyed by the Turks. Prostration will last three and one-half years. Finally Christ will appear, hold judgment, and renew heaven and earth.

Meanwhile Hofmann had made contacts with the Anabaptist movement, and found what he was seeking. Their earnest piety, their simple Biblical faith, their religious mind, open to mystical and chiliastic ideas, attracted him. He became interested in Lienhard and Ursula Jost (q.v.) of Strasbourg, both of whom boasted of visions and revelations. He published their collected visions in two books; the first of these has the title, Prophetische Gesicht unn offenbarung, der göttlichen würkung zu diser letzten zeit, die . . . einer gottes liebhaberin durch den heiligen Geist geoffenbart seind. . . . (1530). The other, proclaiming the prophecies of Lienhard Jost, has been lost. In spite of their confused ideas, these two books made a deep impression even in Holland (Hulshof, 118).

Hofmann had not actually joined the Anabaptists, when he took the unheard-of step of presenting a petition to the council (April 1530) demanding that a church be assigned to the Anabaptists. He demanded not only toleration for them, but also equal rights with the state church. He was obviously moved to this step by his warm sympathy for the suppressed brotherhood.

In 1530 Hofmann took the formal step of joining the Anabaptist brotherhood by baptism. But his residence in Strasbourg was of short duration. It is not likely that he became closely associated with Kautz (q.v.) and Reublin (q.v.), who were living there at the time, for they were greatly superior to him in theological training. Nor was he the equal of Pilgram Marpeck. In clearness of spirit and depth of understanding of the Scriptures, Marpeck far outranked Hofmann. The city council issued an order of arrest against Hofmann because of his petition and on account of lesé-majesté in his exposition of the Revelation; he left the city hastily on April 23, 1530.

Hofmann now betook himself to East Friesland again, arriving there in May 1530. Luther, hearing of it, sent a letter warning the authorities in very sharp terms: Hofmann had long since been committed to Satan, and was filled solely with fanatical speculations, for the sake of which he let the cause of Christ perish. In June 1530 Hofmann appeared in Emden as a preacher. He gathered the elements dissatisfied with the established churches ("simple souls and the quiet in the land," Leendertz, 217) and through his eloquence acquired a large following. He can be considered the founder of the Anabaptist congregation at Emden (q.v.), which is still in existence. In the city church of Emden, which the clergy had evidently given him, he is said to have baptized 300 persons. This created a great stir, and the council compelled Hofmann to leave the city. Hofmann left Jan Volkertszoon (q.v.) (Trijpmaker) in charge as preacher.

Hofmann now turned again to Strasbourg, impelled by worry concerning his wife and child (as zur Linden assumes). Along his route up the Rhine he won adherents for the new Bundesgemeinde. This term appears first in his most important and best work, the Ordonnanz Gottes, in which he presents his Anabaptist point of view for the first time. The title of this booklet is Die Ordonnantie Godts, De welche hy, door zijnen Soone Christum Jesum, inghestelt ende bevesticht heevt, op die waerachtighe Discipulen des eewigen woort Godts (1530). The term "ordinance of God" means to him Christ's baptismal command, Matt. 28:19. In opposition to justification he stresses sanctification (q.v.), the "imitation of the life of Christ." As Jesus was tempted in the wilderness after His baptism, so all those who "in the end-times" are entrusted to Him in baptism by His true apostles, should follow Him in being led to the spiritual wilderness there to prove their steadfastness in the face of temptations. Here they must spend "forty days and forty nights in spiritual fasting"; not until they are complete in the favor, spirit, and will of Jesus Christ, and have fought to the end and have conquered, and in all the tests have remained faithful and unblamable, "is their justification perfected." Baptism, which should be the symbol of the covenant with God and the Lord Jesus Christ, shall be administered only to adults who can understand the Lord's teaching. But minor children, lifeless bells, churches, or altars shall not receive baptism; for not a single letter of the Old or New Testament can prove that infant baptism is commanded by God or was practiced by the apostles. After the presentation of his concept of communion, as it differed from that of Luther and Zwingli, he discusses the strict requirement of church discipline (BRN V, 127-70).

This time Hofmann remained in complete concealment in Strasbourg. The government was not aware of his presence there. He left the city with his family before the end of 1530.

In the course of 1531 he visited Holland; he stayed some time in Amsterdam, where he is said to have baptized 50 persons, and could move about unmolested. Though there is no information, he may also have visited other towns of Holland. Soon after his departure from Amsterdam conditions became much less favorable for Anabaptism. Volkertszoon and eight other followers of Hofmann (later called Melchiorites) were beheaded in The Hague on Dec. 5, 1531. Nevertheless the brotherhood persisted, at first, of course, very quietly. Melchior Hofmann now decided to postpone baptism for two years and confine himself to preaching and admonishing; the construction of the Old Testament temple had also suffered an interruption of two years on account of resistance by the Samaritans (Ezra 4:24).

This order of delay Hofmann issued from Strasbourg, whither he had gone the third time in 1531. In this Strasbourg period he wrote a series of booklets: (1) Verclaringe van den gevangenen ende vrien wil des menschen, wat ooc die waerachtige gehoorsaemheyt des gheloofs ende warachtighen eeuwighen Evangelions sy . . . (BRN V, 171-98). He takes a different position here from that in his exposition of Dan. VII (1526), and skillfully blends Luther's idea with Denk's, taking a position between them. (Details in Leendertz, 239 ff.) (2) Warhafftige erklerung aus heyliger Biblischer schrifft, das der Satan, Todt, Hell, Sünd, un dy ewige verdamnus im ursprung nit auss gott, sunder auss eygenem will erwachsen sei . . . . (3) Das freudenriche zeucknus vam worren friderichen ewigen evangelion (Rev. 14), welchs da ist ein kraft gottes, die da sallig macht alle die daran glauben, Rom. 1, welchem worren und ewigen evangelion itzt zu disser letzten zeit so vil dausend ketzerischer irriger lugenhaftiger zeucknas gegenstandt. Nim war die postbotten seint draussen und schreien und die fridtbotten wynen bitterlich . . . (zur Linden reprints this pamphlet in his appendix, 429-32). Here is found the passage where Hofmann recognizes nobody as a preacher of the truth: "Alas, what a terrible time is this, that I do not yet see a true evangelist, nor know any writer among all the German people who witnesses to the true faith and the everlasting Gospel." (4) Von der wahren hochprächtlichen einigen Maijestat Gottes, und von der wahrhaftigen Menschwerdung des Weigen worts und Sohns des allerhögsten, ein kurzes Zeugnis. Selig bistu Simon Jonas Sohn, dann Fleisch und Bluth hat dir das nicht offenbahrt, sondern mein Vatter im Himmel . . . . In this booklet Hofmann teaches the Triune God; he can therefore not be reckoned among the anti-Trinitarians (q.v.), as Trechsel states in his Antitrinitarier (I, 34). He did, however, maintain that prayers should not be addressed especially to Christ or the Holy Spirit, but only to God (Leendertz, 142).

A new order of arrest by the city council again compelled Hofmann to leave the city. Whither he went is not definitely known. He traveled through Hesse, where Landgrave Philip heard him preach. He also stayed in the Netherlands in 1532, at least at Leeuwarden, the capital of the province of Friesland, where he had a number of adherents, including Obbe Philips (q.v.).

In addition this man of inexhaustible energy had time for writing. He now published his exposition of the Epistle to the Romans: Die eedele hoghe enn trostlike sendebrief, den die heylige Apostel Paulus to den Romeren gescreven heeft, verclaert enn gans vlitich mit ernste van woort to woorde wtgelecht Tot eener costeliker nutticheyt enn troost allen godt-vruchtigen liefhebebbers er eewighen onentliken waerheyt . . . (1533). In this book, particularly in chapter XIII, Melchior Hofmann reveals himself as an advocate of quiet Anabaptism. He rejects the bearing of arms, and definitely demands unconditional obedience to the government for God's sake. The book concludes with these words: "By the mercies of God it is a small matter to me at this time to become a sacrifice to the All-High when God's work is completed through Christ. My rebukes and accusations are not made in fleshly envy and hate. God is my witness, that in the depths of my heart I hate nobody. And if it were God's will that all be united in the truth, I would gladly serve them day and night as the lowliest servant; for their blindness grieves my heart, and day and night I sigh in my heart about it. In so far as any preacher is in the right I stand by him; but in the wrong no support does any good eternally; much rather would I lose my life a thousand times."

This willingness to die Hofmann was soon to prove in prison. His thoughts were centered on the imminent end of the world. He was firmly convinced that he was called to take a part as Elijah in the return of Christ. He was confirmed in this idea by the prophecy of an old Frisian Anabaptist that he would lie in prison half a year, and would then at the head of his adherents lead Anabaptism to victory over all the world.

In an exalted mood he entered upon his trip to Strasbourg. In the spring of 1533 he arrived there. Now he no longer remained in concealment. To be sure, he avoided appearing in public meetings, and he tried to avert the suspicion that he was fomenting insurrection; but in the house of the goldsmith Valtin Duft where he was staying his adherents streamed together. The city council maintained silence, and tolerated this activity. For two months he was unmolested; then he himself approached the council as if to have himself arrested. In May 1533 he sent a letter to the council, with a booklet, Vom Schwert, which has been lost, explaining that the kingdom of Christ would begin in Strasbourg, but it would be preceded by a terrible slaughter of (unbelieving) men; he awaited the fulfillment of these events here, and until that time would go about with bare head and bare feet, taking only bread and water.

The council met the prophet's desire, and in May 1533 had him arrested. Melchior Hofmann rejoiced. Now the awaited great time was at hand. Upon his imprisonment he thanked God (zur Linden, 322). Now his arrest was truly a mistake and a grave injustice, for insurrection and revolt were not to be feared from Melchior Hofmann. On the contrary, if anyone could have done so, he would have been able to direct the entire movement in Holland and Münster in peaceful paths.

The books Hofmann wrote during this time had in part a fantastic religious character. (1) Der Leuchter des alten Testaments ussgelegt, welcher im heyligen stund der hütten Mose mit seinen siben lampen, blumen, knöpffen. . . . Und alles das such reicht uff die siben versamling des nuewen Testaments. The book on baptism (2): Erklerung des waren und hohen bunds des allerhöchsten has been lost. It was presented to the Strasbourg synod in 1533. (3) Wahrhaftige Zeucknus gegen die Nachttoechter und Sternen das der Gott Mensch Jhesus cristus am Kreuzs und im Grab nit ein angnomen Fleisch und Blut aus Maria sey, sunder allein das vaure und ewige wortt und der unendliche Sun des Allerhöchsten. (4) Eine rechte warhafftige hohe und götliche gruntliche underrichtung von der reinen forchte Gottes ann alle liebhaber der ewiger unentlicher warheit, aus Götlicher Schrifft angezeygt zum Preiss Gottes unnd heyll sines volcks in ewigkeyt . . . (1533).

The severity of Hofmann's position on disorderly conduct is shown by his attitude toward Claus Frey (q.v.), whom he expelled from the brotherhood because of his fanatical conception of marriage which led him into polygamy.

Hofmann's confinement was at first mild. His friends were permitted to visit him and receive from him oral instruction and written information. In May 1533 he had to undergo two hearings. He defended himself successfully against the charge of having seditious plans. His defense was approximately as follows: He did not claim to be a prophet, but a witness of the supreme God and an apostolic teacher. This honorable title did not apply to the regular preachers, for all of them preached themselves rich. He did not oppose the office of preaching as a matter of principle; but pastors should be chosen from the oldest and most honest, and these should be permitted to own a home to shelter poor traveling brethren. But an apostle may own no property; he must always be ready to go wherever God may send him to proclaim the Word; his preaching would contribute only to his poverty; for he would have to leave all his possessions in exchange for a constant prospect of stocks and pillory.

Hofmann was also questioned (June 11-13) on the occasion of the General Synod of Strasbourg in June 1533. He clearly stated his faith. Bucer recorded these proceedings in his booklet, Handlung (1533), which was also translated into Dutch and distributed in the Netherlands, where it roused a storm of disappointment among the Anabaptists. For example, Cornelius Poldermann (q.v.) wrote a letter to the Strasbourg city council, asserting that he could produce 100 letters and books to prove that Bucer was in error in supposing that he had refuted Hofmann. Leendertz is of the opinion that he referred to two books that Hofmann had written in prison, and had sent to him through the warden's maid. These books are in the library of the University of Utrecht. Their titles are: (1) Eine rechte warhaftige hohe und götliche gruntliche-underrichtung von der reinen forcht Gottes an alle liebhaber der ewiger unentlicher warheit, auszz götlicher Schrift angezeigt zum preisz Gottes und seines volcks in ewigkeit. . . . (2) Ein sendbrief an alle gotsförchtigen liebhaber der ewigen warheit, in welchem angezeigt seind die artickel des Melchior Hofmann, derhalben ihn die lerer zu Straszburg als ein ketzer verdampt . . . (1533). The foreword of this book is signed "Caspar Becker," Hofmann's pseudonym.

Bucer's book relates that Melchior Hofmann expected Strasbourg to be besieged about July 1533 before the return of Christ, whom he hoped to meet at the head of the 144,000. When Bucer called this to his attention, Hofmann postponed the date to a later time, but clung to the idea itself. Nor did an illness that struck him cause him to waver. The bitterness of his adherents, who were constantly increasing in number, was deep when they were denied the privilege of visiting and comforting their Elijah in his serious illness (Leendertz, 304).

Why the council did not release this harmless man, or in accord with custom banish him from the city as a foreigner at the close of the examination, is incomprehensible. Only the hope that he might eventually be converted saved him from execution. Even Bucer apparently counseled against releasing him, for a letter from Melanchthon, Oct. 10, expressly approves of the severe measures of the council against Hofmann (zur Linden, 344). Hofmann made the serious charge against the Strasbourg clergy (1536) that they had wanted to deliver him to the executioner. He reminded them that a court trial could be instituted against an elder, which he was in the eyes of God, only on the basis of two or three witnesses, and pointed to the example of Zwingli, who had to pay with his life for the blood of one man, that of the Anabaptist Felix Manz; they should lay aside all carnal hate and as soldiers of Christ fight only with spiritual weapons.

On May 4, 1534, Hofmann presented a petition to the magistrate, that he be cast into the dungeon, where neither sun nor moon could shine, until God would have pity and bring the affair to an end, which would occur in 1534. In July of this year he wrote some pamphlets, which have been lost, under the pseudonyms of Caspar Becker and Michael Wächter; he was cross-examined about them on Sept. 9. His prison conditions were made more severe, but by bribing the wife of a guard he was able to maintain active communication with his group through books and letters.

In the spring of 1535 Hofmann thought there were indications that his redemption was near. On April 15 he requested the authorities to provide the city with food, for it would suffer hunger and want; in the third year of his imprisonment the Lord would come. During the siege the city need have no fear of its Anabaptists; only the masses who lusted for the estates of the priests should be feared. The Anabaptists, who, like him, would not bear a sword, should be assigned to the walls. Great tribulation was to fall upon the imperial cities, and Strasbourg would be a seal for the rest, for it would be the first to unfurl the banner of divine justice.

But this expectation also ended in disappointment. In April 1536 he complained about the severity of his jailers. He was in an unwholesome cell in the top story of the tower of Strasbourg, and had to live on inedible bread and water. He was completely isolated from the outside world. For lack of paper he filled the covers and blank parts of his books with writing. When these were removed he wrote his ideas down on 24 cloths, which were preserved in the Strasbourg archives until they were burned in the siege of the city in 1870. (For particulars about them see zur Linden, 380 ff., and Leendertz, 315 ff.) He requested alleviation of his difficult situation, a conversation with the Strasbourg preachers, some writing paper and ink. Nothing was granted.

On May 5, 1539, he had a talk with Peter Tasch (q.v.) and Johann Eysenburg, Anabaptist leaders who had left the brotherhood. In the spring, when he had suffered an attack of swellings on his face and legs, he had been moved into a more wholesome cell, and here the two men visited him in the hope of converting him; but the six-hour conversation was fruitless. Four additional conversations of five hours each followed. The rumor was spread among his adherents that he had recanted. (Hulshof discovered in Strasbourg a purported recantation by Hofmann in 1539, in which he sacrificed his rejection of infant baptism, and his teaching that sins committed after conversion could not be forgiven. See Hulshof, 180 f.)

Because of this rumor the Anabaptist Konrad v. Beghel or Bühel (q.v.) risked his life to ask him whether he still held to the faith he had confessed eight years before, or had fallen from it as Tasch and Eysenburg claimed. Hofmann assured him that he was faithful to the truth as before, and warned Bühel to seek piety, live a quiet life, keep his marriage pure, and not cause any mobs, for he had no call to do so. Bühel should pass this admonition on to the brethren, warning them against holding secret meetings in the woods contrary to government orders, and holding up the Peasants' War, Zwingli, and the Münster revolt as warning examples. In general he should insist that they respect the government, especially in Strasbourg, for it was a pious government.

In June of 1539 the four Strasbourg preachers (Bucer, Capito, Hedio, and Zell) conferred with Melchior Hofmann, as they thought with success. But in November the prisoner informed the Ammeister of the city, on bits of paper cut from books, that the city should provide itself with food and munitions, for there would be great suffering in the coming siege; he had received high revelations, which he could give the council if they would furnish him paper and ink. These were refused, and his remaining books taken from him.

For two years (1540-42) there is almost complete silence on Melchior Hofmann. He was said to have annoyed Hans Kunlin, a messenger of the council, by singing and shouting. Once again his hope for the future flickered up when, through bribery of the guards, his friends visited him and brought him good news of the Anabaptist movement. He thought his release was at hand; but the reverse happened. In January 1543 the council made his confinement still stricter. His cell was to be locked, the key kept in the chancery, and the door opened only in the presence of a member of the council. Food should be let down through the ceiling in a basket. Those who had accepted the bribe should be suitably punished.

On April 16, 1543, Hofmann asked the council to let him out into the air once more, and this request was granted. He also had temporary relief in June while repairs were made in his cell. In the autumn of 1543 he became so seriously ill that he was unable to receive his food. The council therefore had him transferred to the higher, better room, which the patient gratefully accepted. But Hofmann's health was broken and continued to deteriorate. On Nov. 19 the council ordered that he be given the linens necessary to his care. Before the end of 1543 the sufferer died, a martyr to his faith.

Melchior Hofmann was an unusual person, a man of extraordinary gifts, of a consuming selfless zeal for the cause of the Lord Jesus, of a rare eloquence, combined with moral earnestness and a genuinely truthful character. This accounts for his mighty influence and great success with the masses. The amount of writing he could do in his unsettled life is amazing. Aside from his unbridled fantasy, his arbitrary interpretation of Scripture, and his fanatical view of the end-times, his writings also contain a wealth of sound Christian ideas and sober thoughts (see Cramer's article in BRN V, 127 ff.). His favorite ideas, (1) the hope of the imminent return of Christ and (2) his view of the Incarnation (q.v.), that Jesus took His flesh not from Mary but out of her, were not generally accepted by the Anabaptists, although Menno Simons did adopt his view of the Incarnation. On the other hand, his determined insistence on freedom of religion, on evidence of the fruit of the Spirit, on sanctification of life, on believers' baptism, and on nonresistance, made essential contributions to the strengthening of Anabaptism. His teaching on the communion is still prevalent among the Mennonites of the Palatinate. The oath he at first rejected unconditionally, but later permitted it under certain circumstances, or even made use of it himself (zur Linden, 220). (If, however, Obbe Philips is the only authority for this statement, it is still open to question.) For the Münster affair Hofmann is no more responsible than Luther is for the Peasants' War. Granted that some of his teachings, such as the Incarnation and the imminent return of Christ, were carried into Münster by the "Wassenberg preachers" (Rembert, 299, 360 f.), nevertheless the fact remains that the social and moral aberrations in Münster find no source nor echo in either the life or teaching of Melchior Hofmann. His lasting significance lies in the fact that he transplanted the Anabaptist movement from the South to the North. Cramer calls him the father of Dutch Anabaptism.

Melchior Hofmann, even before his recantation, spoke of the Swiss Brethren in terms of disapproval and reproach. He sided with their opponents by holding them responsible for the well-known fratricide of Thomas Schugger in St. Gall, a man who was not an Anabaptist at all. Hofmann made the assertion that before the beginning of his labors no one had proclaimed the true Gospel. From his prison he sent word to the Swiss Brethren in Strasbourg, admonishing them to "stand still," and not to come together for worship without the consent of the authorities. As for the attitude of the Swiss Brethren toward Hofmann, they declared in the debate held in Bern in 1538 not only that he was not of their brotherhood but that his teaching was resisted by them "with all earnestness." Neff.

W. L. Leendertz, Melchior Hofmann (Haarlem, 1883); F. O. zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann, ein Prophet der Wiedertäufer (Haarlem, 1885); Cramer in BRN V; A. Hulshof, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg van 1525 tot 1557 (Amsterdam, 1905); Rembert, Wiedertäufer; DB 1919, 124 ff.; B. N. Krohn, Gesch. der fan. u. enthus. Wiedertäufer vornehmlich in Norddeutschland (Leipzig, 1785); H. J. Schoeps, Vom himmlischen Fleisch Christi (Tübingen, 1951) 37 ff.; E. B. Bax, Rise and Fall of the Anabaptists (London, 1903) 95 ff.; C. A. Cornelius, Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs II (Leipzig, 1860) 75 ff., 282 ff.; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 52-77; Biogr. Wb. IV, 121-34; Peter Kawerau, Melchior Hoffman als religiöser Denker (Haarlem, 1954); ML II, 326-35.

Hofmeister, Sebastian, b. 1476 in Schaffhausen, Switzerland, a Barefoot Friar, took his doctor's degree in Paris, and early advocated and promoted the Reformation in Schaffhausen. He took part in both of the Zürich disputations in 1523, in the second as chairman. Like Zwingli he wavered on the question of baptism in early 1525. Conrad Grebel tried to win both Hofmeister and his colleague Dr. Sebastian Meyer, pastor in Schaffhausen, to Anabaptism by personal discussion in Hofmeister's home in late January or early February 1525, when he spent the two months of February and March in the city (Bender, 39 f.). Johannes Brötli tells in a letter of March 1525 to the brethren in Zollikon how he, Reublin, and Grebel were guests of the two doctors one evening, and declared that "Doctor Sebastian agrees with us in the matter of baptism." Felix Manz also visited Hofmeister in Schaffhausen. The attempts were, however, not ultimately successful. Hubmaier states in his book (1526), Der alten und neuen Lehrer Urteil . . . that Hofmeister had written him, "We were not ashamed to testify openly before the council of Schaffhausen, that our brother Zwingli strays from the goal and does not walk in accordance with the truth of the Gospel if he wants the infants to be baptized" (Bächtold, 87). In his testimony as a witness in the Anabaptist trial of 1525 Hofmeister said that he rebuked Grebel and showed him by proofs from the Scripture that he erred and was mistaken (Egli, 309). In Schaffhausen the Catholic party won the upper hand in the peasant revolts of 1524-25. Hofmeister was considered a fomenter of disturbances. In August 1525 the council sent him to the University of Basel to be examined on his (Catholic) orthodoxy. On Aug. 10, 1525, the council wrote to the university that Hofmeister had often preached from the pulpit that the Mass was an invention of the devil, and that infant baptism was not valid (Bächtold, 93).

Hofmeister was not questioned in Basel and was not permitted to return to his home town. He found reception in Zürich. There he conducted the disputation with the Anabaptists of Nov. 6-8, 1525. He was considered an exceptional debater. In 1528 he was called to Bern, and given the assignment to introduce the Reformation in Zofingen. On April 19, 1531, he was again in Bern as a debater in the disputation with Hans Pfistermeyer (q.v.) of Aarau, probably having been appointed by the council. He and the other preachers succeeded in bringing about Pfistermeyer's recantation. Hofmeister's influence at the disputation of Zofingen (q.v.), July 1-9, 1532, was no doubt also outstanding. Since the records of this debate merely name the preachers and Anabaptists, the personal position of individuals cannot be ascertained (see Kaspar Grossmann). Hofmeister died in Zofingen, Sept. 26, 1533. L.v.M.

M. Kirchhofer, Seb. Wagner genannt Hofmeister (Zürich, 1808); J. Wipf, "Sebastian Hofmeister, der Reformator Schaffhausens," in Beiträge zur vaterländischen Geschichte (1918); article by Bloesch in HRE VIII, 241 f.; C. A. Bächtold, "Die Schaffhauser Wiedertäufer," in Beiträge zur vaterländischen Geschichte, No. 7, 1900; H. S. Bender, Conrad Grebel (Goshen, 1950); ML II, 335.

Hofstede, Petrus (1716-1803), a Dutch Reformed minister at Anjum 1739, Steenwijk 1743, Oost-Zaandam 1745, and Rotterdam 1749-70, an intolerant and fanatical man, one of the last Calvinists in the Netherlands to attack the Mennonites in his writings, particularly Johannes Stinstra (q.v.), preacher of Harlingen, Friesland, in his poem (1742), De Waarheid in Friesland tegen de aanslagen der ketterij verdedigt. In 1781 in a booklet against F. G. C. Rütz, the Lutheran minister of The Hague, he again attacked Stinstra. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. IV, 138-52; N.N.B.Wb. IV, 762-65; Chr. Sepp, Johannes Stinstra en zijn tijd II (Amsterdam, 1866) 86-89.

Hofstetter (Hoffstetter), a Mennonite family name originating in Langnau, canton of Bern, Switzerland. It means "caretaker of orchard or farm." The family found its way from the Emmental to the Bernese Jura in the early part of the 18th century with many of their coreligionists. Members of the family lived near Bevillard and Delsberg in 1824. The first mention of a member of the family as an Anabaptist was in 1672, when a person with this name was imprisoned for returning to Switzerland after having been deported for belonging to this forbidden religion. The brothers Nicolas, Peter, and Christian Hofstetter came with their families from the Bernese Jura to the Sonnenberg settlement in Wayne County, Ohio, in 1824, and became one of the leading families of the community. Reuben Hofstetter is the present bishop of the Kidron Mennonite Church near Kidron, Ohio. The names Hofstetter and Hostettler (q.v.) did not originally come from the same name. D.L.G.

Högerli (Hägerly), an Anabaptist martyr, was arrested in 1532 in Aarau with a fellow believer called "the tailor," was kept in prison 13 days and then taken to Bern, where he was executed for his faith. The Martyrs' Mirror on page 1129 erroneously gives 1529 as the date of his death, and calls him Haegerley of the Alburg district. His name Högerli is that of a farm near Aarburg, which was favorably located for Anabaptist meetings. NEFF.

J. Heiz, Täufer im Aargau (Aarau, 1902); Mart. Mir. E 1129; ML II, 335.

Hohenberg, formerly an Austrian dependency or territory in southwest Germany, since 1806 a part of Württemberg. The main cities are Horb (q.v.) and Rottenburg am Neckar (q.v.); the latter was also the seat of the regent or governor who ruled in the name of the (Austrian) Hapsburgs. During the first half of the 16th century the counts of Zollern held this office (Joachim 1525-37, Jos Nikolaus 1538-58), yet they were rather passive in their duties if not downright negligent. Much more zealous was King Ferdinand (q.v.) and the provincial government of Innsbruck (Tirol) which at that period administered also the county of Hohenberg (part of Vorderösterreich). They insisted upon the suppression of all non-Catholic movements, both Lutheran and Anabaptist, and sent out stiff mandates to allow no leniency.

The most outstanding victim of these orders was Michael Sattler (q.v.), the former prior of the monastery of St. Peter, who was the saintly leader of the new Anabaptist movement around Horb and Rottenburg. The trial of Sattler and his co-workers is a memorable event in Anabaptist history, mainly for Sattler's noble defense. In 1528 these brethren were executed in a most cruel manner in the city of Rottenburg. The great stir which this event provoked (a pamphlet with the story of Sattler soon spread all over Germany) made the government somewhat more cautious in its endeavor to suppress the new Anabaptist movement. Eventually, however, the Counter-Reformation (q.v.) succeeded in bringing the entire population back to their former Catholic faith. It is remarkable that in the southern part of the county of Hohenberg, which is adjacent to Switzerland, no centers of Anabaptism are known, while in the northern part, around Horb and Rottenburg, numerous such centers thrived until the middle of the 16th century, apparently as a result of Sattler's activities and testimony. (ML II, 336.) G.Bo., R.F.

Hohenlohe, a principality (32 sq. mi.) in northeast Württemberg, Germany, to which it has belonged since the beginning of the 19th century. In 1555 it was divided between the brothers Ludwig Kasimir and Eberhard into the gravures of Hohenlohe-Neuenstein and Hohenlohe-Waldenburg. Whereas nothing is heard of the stirrings of the Reformation in the district until 1540, and it was not actually instituted there until 1556, there are indications that as early as 1530 the Anabaptist movement from Heilbronn had acquired some influence in the town of Künzelsau and on the near-by farms and hamlets. The first official mention of them occurs in an order of Count Albrecht to all officials, May 25, 1533, to warn their subjects against receiving into their homes Anabaptists expelled from other places, against tolerating any meetings or "corner sermons," providing them with food and drink, or listening to their sermons (Wibel, 299 ff.). Magistrate Bonifatius Wernizer of Kirchberg, which had been pawned to Dinkelsbühl, Hall, and Rothenburg, reported on March 17, 1534, to the mayor and council of Rothenburg, after an inquiry in Hall and Dinkelsbühl, that many Anabaptists had crossed through the land in groups of 20 or 30 with wagons and carts, women and children, without being molested. They were permitted to eat, for they paid. Their goal was Moravia, where 5,000 or more were together, having been expelled by the bishop of Gran, which was, of course, an error. Anabaptists could be identified in that they did not give the customary greetings, or wish one a good morning or a good evening (state archives of Nürnberg, Kirchberger Akten II).

The next bit of information is given by an inquiry of Count Albrecht to an unnamed jurist in Rothenburg o.d. Tauber, April 6, 1534. He wrote that wicked persons of the new sect (Anabaptists) were breaking into the area, requesting a night's lodging of the poor people on farms and in the villages. If it was granted, they were orderly and humble; they read books, taught that evil should be abstained from, and misled their hearers under the guise of the teaching of these treacherous preachers that the people should leave the church and call the church a temple of idols; for the temple of God was in the heart. They rejected the Mass, considered infant baptism invalid; some refused to swear an oath and use weapons. Some of the people moved away with wife, child, and servants, leaving much food behind, which the barons then claimed as being forfeit; the count tells of an instance of this and requests the lawyer's speedy judgment (Nürnberg Staatsarchiv, Konsistorialakten I). The reply is not known. The case in point must have referred to the farm and other goods of Georg Lang of Etzlenweiler, which Count George confiscated, but which his brother Johann induced him to give to Lang's son-in-law, Balthasar Weiss, in Ingelfingen (Wibel, I, 749).

In 1534 a number of Anabaptists were found in Künzelsau and punished by the authorities; they were to abandon their faith and pay a pledge of 100 florins. They left Künzelsau and did not request readmission until 1539. After numerous requests by the nobility and the community they were admitted on the following conditions: (1) on a day previously announced, at a signal given by the pastor, they must acknowledge their error before all the people and ask forgiveness; (2) they must adhere to Christian order, as it was observed in Künzelsau; (3) they must hold no secret meetings or prayers, and adhere to no Anabaptist sect; (4) in their life and conduct they must avoid any suggestion that they were still spotted with this error (Weikersheim Archives, Künzelsauer Ganerben Verträge).

In 1535 King Ferdinand expelled the Anabaptists from Moravia. They tried to return to their homes or to enter Württemberg, which had recently become Protestant, but were intercepted in three groups in Passau. Almost all of them were natives of the Künzelsau region, most of them from small farms and hamlets. Most of them had been baptized, en route to Moravia, in Donauwörth by Adam Schlegel, and some in Auspitz by Philip Plener (q.v.) or Blasius Kuhn (q.v.). There they had settled in compact groups. In Passau an attempt was made to make them recant, but all clung to their convictions. Only Hans Höfner and his wife, of Reublingen, recanted at the end of 1540 or in early 1541 and were released.

At the church inspection of 1571 it was stated that the farmer of the Dörrhof had with his wife gone to the Anabaptists five years previously, as had also some others from Jungholzhausen. Anabaptists continued to cross the country, stopping in Nesselbach, where the innkeeper's wife entered into conversation with them, thus arousing the suspicion that she was about to go with them. After her death the innkeeper was ordered to receive the Anabaptists only to give them food or a night's lodging, but not to discuss their doctrine with them. In Ingelfingen the carpenter Brentz had been with the Anabaptists a while, but had returned without having gone to their communion.

There is no further information on the Anabaptists in Hohenlohe. G.Bo.

J. C. Wibel, Hohenlohische Kirchen- und Ref.-Historie III (4 vv., Ansbach, 1752-54); ML II, 336 f.

Hohenwart, a parish in Lower Austria on the boundary between Krems and Meissau. The Anabaptists of Tirol, on their trips to Moravia from Stein, where they left the ships, frequently stopped here. In 1534 Bastl (Sebastian) Glaser, who was leading a company from Tirol to Moravia, was seized with his party. Jakob Hutter wrote a letter of consolation to them (Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 105). The prisoners were transferred from Hohenwart to Eggenburg; here they had their cheeks burned and were then released. The same fate befell Hans Peck of Gredins, who was also halted in Hohenwart. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 116; ML II, 337.) LOSERTH.

Hohenwittlingen, a castle in the Urach district of Württemberg, 2,259 ft. above sea level, on a cliff that projects like a promontory into the Ermstal, 25 minutes from the village of Wittlingen. The castle was built about 1100. When Joh. Brenz (q.v.) was compelled to flee from the emperor's wrath in 1548, Duke Ulrich concealed him in Hohenwittlingen. There under the pseudonym of Joh. Wittlingius he wrote his exposition of Psalms 94 and 130, and the treatise, An magistratus iure possit occidere Anabaptistas aut alios haereticos (Whether a magistrate has the legal right to execute Anabaptists or other heretics) (Koehler, Nos. 163 and 261, p. 69 and p. 117).

Under Duke Christoph Hohenwittlingen was made a prison for poachers, who instead of being blinded were now given a life sentence, and for Anabaptists who refused to be converted. Thus in November 1555 Barbara Löffler, an Anabaptist from Stuttgart, was imprisoned in the castle but released when she recanted; and after Easter 1557 Adam Hornikel, a baker of Heiningen, Göppingen district, was held there. With him Paul Glock (q.v.), who had probably been taken to Hohenwittlingen before this, wrote a Rechenschaft of their faith in 1562 (TA Württemberg, p. 1049) and also two songs, "Gott haltet steif was er verheisst," and "Herr Jesu Christ in deinem Reich" (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 714 and 718). On Feb. 11, 1564, Hornikel was taken to Stuttgart for a new cross-examination and was then expelled from the country; he went to Moravia. In 1574 Matthias Binder of Frickenhausen, a tailor and preacher, was taken to Hohenwittlingen. He had previously been held a long time in the dungeon at Maulbronn, where Blasius Greiner (q.v.) had also been. In 1573 and several following years the prison also held Leonhard Sommer of Necklinsberg, Jakob Gantz of Ossweil, and Martin Klopfer.

When in the late fall of 1576 a fire broke out in the castle, Glock and Binder took an active part in extinguishing the flames, and were released by order of the duke, to go to Moravia. The castle was repaired and the prison continued to be used. The following were imprisoned there: Simon Kress (q.v.) of Gündelbach 1582-96; Michael Hasel (q.v.) of Gudersberg, 1588-92; and in 1590 Franz Feyerabend of Oppelsbom. From 1574 to 1594 the pastor of the adjacent village of Hengen was Stephan Geer, the father of the Anabaptist leader Georg Geer. It is possible that youthful impressions of Hohenwittlingen contributed to his decision to join the Anabaptists. Hans Dauber of Illingen, who had been imprisoned six years on Hohenurach and released in 1588, and who had merely attended the preaching in Illingen, not the communion, was in Hohenwittlingen in 1596. In that year he and Kress were permitted to attend church services. They sang with the audience, indicated their approval by nodding their heads, and their disapproval by averting their faces. This conduct caused the congregation to doubt the Scripturalness of the pastor's teaching; their attendance at church was discontinued. The castle superintendent, Claudius Robert, thought they should turn the wasteland before the castle into meadowland, for they would be more easily won by the pick and hoe than by the Bible. Hoes and spades were also recommended in 1612 by the church authorities for the treatment of Dauber, who is mentioned as late as 1617 as an obstinate Anabaptist (TA Württemberg).

The castle governors Hans and Jakob von Talheim, and Robert and Glas Miller treated the Anabaptists kindly. Glock had absolute freedom of movement and was used as a messenger. Likewise Kress moved freely in 1582 and worked in front of the castle. Under Duke Christoph in 1559 they had been permitted to move several hours, fastened only to foot-irons. Glock was satisfied with the food; the court chaplain Lukas Osiander in 1584 thought it was as good as that of a benefice. Exceedingly laudatory is the testimony the castle governor gave the deceased Michael Hasel (q.v.). In 1608 the castle governor Miller was even under suspicion of Anabaptist leanings because of quiet conduct (TA Württemberg 308).

After the beginning of the Thirty Years' War there were no more Anabaptists in Hohenwittlingen. G.Bo.

W. Koehler, Bibliographia Brentiana (Berlin, 1904); G. Bossert, TA I: Württemberg; Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914); Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML II, 337 f.

Hohenzollern. The reign of the rulers of this Prussian royal house (1701-1918) was of essential significance to the development of Mennonitism in East and West Prussia in the 18th and 19th centuries. In general, the Mennonites enjoyed toleration under them, particularly on the principle of nonresistance and the appreciation of their agricultural capability.

This friendly attitude found expression in the intervention in 1710 of the first Prussian king, Frederick I (1701-13, q.v.), with the Swiss government in behalf of the persecuted Swiss Mennonites and in settling a number of them in Lithuania, together with some Mennonites from the Elbing and Culm marshes. The achievements of the Mennonites in cultivating and draining the land, in cattle raising and cheese manufacturing were, in return, of benefit to the state. If the Mennonites suffered under Frederick William I (q.v.) for their maintenance of nonresistance, they were so much the more benefited by the religious tolerance of the reign of Frederick the Great (q.v.). Of greatest value to the Mennonitism of East and West Prussia was the Gnadenprivilegium (charter of favor) of March 29, 1780, with the assurance of freedom of religion and conscience and of protection in the exercise of their former crafts. Under his successor, Frederick William II (q.v.), to be sure, the Mennonites were limited in their acquisition of land to that which had already been in Mennonite hands or was not subject to military duty. This limitation of land ownership was the chief cause of the emigration of a number of West Prussian Mennonite families to South Russia from 1789 on.

In spite of the fact that Frederick William III (q.v.) and IV (q.v.) renewed the charter of privileges, since they wished to keep these economically capable citizens in the country, the principle of complete religious freedom collapsed in Prussia in the middle of the 19th century. It was no longer tenable when universal military service was introduced in the interest of nationalism, and the absolute power of the king was restricted by popular representation. In 1868 the Mennonites living in the jurisdiction of the North German League were obliged to accept some form of military service (see Prussia). Since this fact also eliminated the basis for the restriction of civil rights for the Mennonites, the law of June 12, 1874, regulating the legal status of the Mennonites removed these restrictions and opened to the Mennonites the possibility of acquiring corporation rights. (ML II, 338.) E.G.

Höhne (Heune), Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, by trade a maker of strawhats, native of Seehausen near Frankenhausen, Thuringia, Germany, moved with his wife Grete Reusse to Halberstadt, where they were seized in September 1535. His wife recanted; but he remained constant, and was drowned on Oct. 8 in the Bode with Adrian Richter (q.v.) and Petronella (q.v.). His two trials, Sept. 14 and 21, 1535 (Jacobs, 512 and 520), are not unimportant for the understanding of the Anabaptists in Thuringia. NEFF.

P. Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen von 1526-1584 (Jena, 1913) 117; E. Jacobs, "Die Wiedertäufer am Harz," in Ztscht des Harz-Vereins f. Gesch. u. Altertumskunde, 1899; ML II, 338.

Holdeman (Haldeman, Holdiman, Holderman, Halteman, Halterman, Haldiman, Haldenmann), an old Swiss Mennonite family, now no longer found among the Mennonites of Switzerland or Germany, but widely represented in the United States. The names first appeared in Anabaptist records in Switzerland in 1538 at Eggiwil, canton of Bern, when Thuring Haldemann was ordered deported. In 1670 a Hans Haldemann was banished from Hotchikon, Bern, and in 1671 a Katharina Haldemann of Hochstetten, Bern, migrated to Holland. Nicholas Haldeman of the canton of Bern immigrated to Montgomery Co., Pa., in 1727 locating in Salford Township. His brothers Hans and Michael, who came the same year, located in Coventry Twp., Chester Co., whither Nicholas later moved also. Nicholas was a trustee in the Salford Mennonite (MC) Church, and had many descendants in the Franconia Conference (MC) district, including Abraham Haldeman, bishop 1830-65 first in Chester County, then in Juniata County, Christian Haldeman, preacher at Salford 1791-1833, John M. Haldeman, preacher at Line Lexington 1869-76. Christian Haldeman (and other Holdemans) moved from Bucks Co., Pa., to Wayne Co., Ohio, near New Pittsburgh in 1827. His widow, with ten sons, moved to Elkhart Co., Ind., in 1849, at about the time when other Holdeman families came. The Holdeman (MC) meetinghouse near Wakarusa was built in 1857 on land given by one of these families John Holdeman (q.v.) founder of the Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church in 1859, was of the Wayne County branch; he began the new church at New Pittsburgh. David S. Holdeman moved from Medina Co., Ohio, to McPherson Co., Kan., in 1873, where many of his descendants are still living. He was treasurer of the Kansas Relief Committee and a vigorous supporter of the work for the incoming Russian Mennonites in 1874 ff. The only ministers bearing the name in 1956 were George W. Holderman of Eldorado Springs, Mo., and Paul Holdeman of Denver, Col., both of the Mennonite Church (MC). H.S.B.

E. L. Weaver, Holdeman Descendants . . . of Christian Holdeman 1788-1846 (Nappanee, 1937); Obed Johnson, Record of the Descendants of David S. Holdeman (N. Newton, 1951).

Holdeman, John (1832-1900), founder and elder of the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, a son of Amos and Nancy (Yoder) Holdeman, was born Jan. 31, 1832, at New Pittsburg, Wayne Co., Ohio. He was married in June 1852 to Elizabeth Ritter. Six children were born to them, of whom three grew to maturity. At the age of 12 he was converted, at 21 he reconsecrated his life, and in October 1853 he was baptized by Bishop Abraham Rohrer of Wayne Co., Ohio. At this same time he felt that God was definitely calling him to the ministry. In reply to this conviction Rohrer is said to have remarked, "It may well be that from your birth you were called into the ministry as was Paul." Not being ordained to preach by the old church, he started out on his own to preach in 1859. This may be taken as the beginning of the denomination which he founded.

Though without academic opportunities Holdeman was self-educated. He devoted himself to the study of German and English, and also gave some attention to Dutch and Greek. Following his conversion and baptism he felt strongly constrained to study the Scriptures. He also studied the writings of the Church Fathers, including those of Menno Simons and Dirk Philips, and was thoroughly acquainted with the Martyrs' Mirror. Through his studies he became convinced that the Mennonite Church had greatly deviated from the truths and precepts as given by Christ and the apostles, and as upheld by the forefathers. With deep concern he sought co-operation of the leaders in order to re-establish the fundamental doctrines which he held to be the true foundation upon which salvation is attainable, but met little response. Therefore he found it necessary to build anew on an evangelical basis, and to exercise discipline according to the Scriptures as had Menno Simons and many of the forefathers, in order that the faith and the true lineage of the church might be maintained. All efforts to bring about a reconciliation with the mother church (MC) having failed, yet with the assurance that he was called of God to preach the Gospel, he applied himself to the ministry with much earnestness. It was his desire to bring to his hearers the truth and the whole truth. He placed special emphasis on the necessity of the new birth and separation from the world. Many were awakened, and accepted Christ. He organized churches in the United States and in Canada (Manitoba), where he won over the bishop of the "Kleine Gemeinde" and half of the group of members there. He won over some of the Russian Mennonites in Kansas (Marion Co.), including Tobias A. Unruh of the General Conference group. He served the church, which he named the "Church of God in Christ, Mennonite," as pastor, evangelist, elder, moderator of general conferences, and first editor of its official periodical Botschafter der Wahrheit from June 1897 until his death in 1900.

He was an extensive writer, writing the following books and treatises: The Old Ground and Foundation, in both German (1862) and English (1863); A Reply to the Criticisms of John Roseborough (1864); Eine Vertheidigung gegen die Verfälscher unserer Schriften (1865); A History of the Church of God, German (1875) and English (1876); A Treatise on Redemption, Baptism, and the Passover and the Lord's Supper (1890); A Treatise on Magistracy and War, Millennium, Holiness, and the Manifestation of Spirits (1891); Eine gründliche Abhandlung von dem schriftwidrigen Entstehen der Siebenten Tag Adventisten und ihrer unevangelischen Lehre (1892); Ein Aufsatz von Unmöglichkeiten (1893); and the extensive work, Ein Spiegel der Wahrheit (1878; English, 1956).

He lived on farms in various states, including Jasper Co., Mo., but gave most of his time to the ministry. He died on March 10, 1900, near Galva, McPherson Co., Kan. (ML II, 338 f.) F.H.W.

Holdeman Mennonite Church (MC), located one and one-fourth miles northwest of Wakarusa in Olive Twp., Elkhart Co., Ind., is a member of the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference. The first meetinghouse, a log building, was built in 1851 and was replaced in 1875 by the present frame structure, which was remodeled in 1913 and again in 1951. During the early years all the Mennonites in the western part of the county were considered members of the Yellow Creek Church (q.v.); regular Sunday services alternated between Yellow Creek and Holdeman. By 1875, however, the separation into two distinct congregational organizations had been well established. The congregation was host to the first regular session of the Mennonite General Conference in 1899. Ministers who have given longer periods of service to the congregation include Jacob Freed, Jacob A. Beutler, Henry Weldy, and Silas Weldy. The membership in 1955 was 234; Simon Gingerich was pastor. L.V.C.

Centennial History of the Holdeman Mennonite Church (Wakarusa, Ind., 1951); MHB, January 1952.

Holidays and Anniversaries. European Mennonites and those American Mennonites who have kept closer to their European background pay more attention to the holidays of the church year than the American Mennonite groups with a longer American history. However, most American Mennonite groups have no consciousness of a "church year."

Among the older Mennonite churches in America, Good Friday, Ascension, and Pentecost are no longer observed (except for possibly using the day for special programs unrelated to the real meaning of the day), and seldom is Christmas Day observed with church services. In Ontario there is more observance of such days, except by the Old Order Amish. Recently the observance of all or part of Passion Week by special church services has been growing among Mennonites.

The Old Order Amish, having retained more of the older traditions, manifest a different pattern. They celebrate a "second Christmas" Jan. 6 in addition to Dec. 25, known in their German as "Alt Christtag" (Old Christmas). They celebrate this day, as well as Good Friday, Ascension, and Pentecost, with fasting, i.e., omitting breakfast, but without church services, and follow by visiting relatives and friends on these days. Pentecost Monday and Easter Monday are also observed as holidays, but with visiting only and not fasting.

Because of the somewhat military character of the observance of Independence Day (July 4) and Memorial Day (May 30) most Mennonites dislike to join in the common observance of these civil holidays. A considerable number of congregations have at one time or another deliberately placed special church meetings on one or both of these days to counteract the influence of the common type of celebrations. Sunday-school or congregational picnics are often held on July 4.

The use of the Christmas tree in connection with the Christmas season is seriously objected to by the more conservative groups, as was formerly the case among practically all the American Mennonites, as a pagan survival which has no place among Christians.

Most European German, Swiss, and French Mennonites customarily observe the following holidays, usually with a church service in the morning: Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, Ascension, Pentecost, "Buss- und Bettag" (Day of Repentance and Prayer). At Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost, the day following is also celebrated as a holiday, but without services.

In the Dutch Mennonite congregations services were formerly held on Good Friday evening, at which communion was usually observed. On Ascension Day church services are held only in a few congregations. Days of Repentance and Prayer are unusual among the Dutch Mennonites. On the day following Christmas there is often a Christmas celebration for children in the churches. On New Year's Eve services are held in all the churches; services on New Year's Day are very rare.

Anniversaries are not celebrated in America nearly as frequently, nor with as much emphasis, as in Europe. Particularly in Germany anniversaries (25th, etc.) of pastoral service, weddings, birthdays, ordinations, dedications, etc., have often been observed with much ceremony, and even by ministers with special sermons and publications, and by gifts or medals from the congregations.

The Mennonites of Prussian background in Prussia, Poland, Russia, and America have as a rule observed the Christian holidays of Protestantism, viz., Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, and Pentecost. The Mennonites broke completely with the Catholic tradition of observing the festivities connected with the saints and other occasions of the Catholic church calendar. In Russia they never adjusted themselves to the observance of the holidays of the Greek Catholic Church in as far as they differ from Protestant holidays, although they used the Julian calendar. As a rule Mennonites observed the customary number of holidays of the country in which they lived. In Prussia, Poland, and Russia they celebrated Christmas and Easter for three days. Gradually the third day was not strictly observed. After the immigration to America the number was reduced to two days. At present only rarely is a second day observed. Some churches still have worship services on the second holiday, sometimes in the German language. As a rule the worship centers around the event of the holiday. In the afternoon and evening relatives visit each other, often traveling long distances for this occasion. H.S.B.

Holiness Movement. The logical tension between recognizing the Christian believer as a regenerated and cleansed child of God, and at the same time as sinful and unworthy of God and His grace, has driven some Christian teachers to one or other of two extremes: (1) to hold strongly to justification through the imputed righteousness of Christ, with an inadequate emphasis on becoming a new creature in Christ, sometimes even to the radical extreme of a form of antinomianism which does not regard as sin those wrong acts committed "in the flesh"; and (2) to teach that it is possible by the grace of God and the renewal of the Holy Spirit to attain such a degree of holiness as to no longer have any struggle with the flesh or the carnal nature. This state is often thought of as being attained instantaneously by an act of faith, subsequent to conversion and receiving the gift of salvation. This second definite experience is called the "second work of grace" or "holiness" or "Christian perfection" by its adherents. This theory of holiness is really Wesleyan, but it gained acceptance in some groups of Mennonites within the past hundred years. This is best illustrated in the United Missionary Church, formerly known as the Mennonite Brethren in Christ (which name is still retained in the Pennsylvania Conference of the group), and in the Brethren in Christ, commonly called "River Brethren." It is the teaching of these bodies that salvation is received in two steps—first, the new birth and the gift of salvation through repentance and faith, but which ordinarily leaves the new convert less than a fully victorious child of God; and second, the second work of grace, or holiness, in which the Holy Spirit miraculously gives full deliverance from the power of sin. The believer is then regarded as "relatively perfect" in life. He is still tempted by Satan, and by the evil forces of the world, but he no longer has to suffer from the sharp inner struggles with his own carnal nature which formerly plagued him.

There have been a few ministers in other Mennonite bodies such as the Mennonite Church (MC) who have more or less adopted the Wesleyan doctrine of holiness, and in some cases minor secessions have resulted; as in Harvey Co., Kan., 40 years ago, when J. M. R. Weaver and others withdrew from the Mennonite Church (Weaver returned).

One of the results of the Holiness movement in Kansas, which affected various Mennonite leaders (MC), was the teaching that nonconformed Christian men ought not to wear neckties. Prior to this time, black bow ties (earlier, the old neckcloth or Halstuch) had been universally worn in the Mennonite Church, ministry and laity alike. In spite of the opposition of such leaders as John F. Funk (q.v.), editor of the Herald of Truth, who openly and in print opposed the anti-necktie sentiment, this view gained ground until many ministers and some lay members (MC) ceased to wear ties. In recent years, however, this attitude has faded.

In recent years there appears to be a moderating of the more extreme views of holiness in the United Missionary Church and in the Brethren in Christ. Although some ministers teach the old-fashioned doctrine of a "second work of grace" in just the same fashion as did the leaders of a generation or two ago, other ministers are becoming less vocal on the point, and in many cases have begun to stress "Christian growth" rather than the more distinctive doctrine of "holiness."

Among European Mennonites Perfectionism (q.v.), or the doctrine of "total eradication" has had little influence, although the Anabaptists were often accused of holding this position because of their staunch insistence on holy living. J.C.W.

Holitsch (Holic), a town in Slovakia (formerly in Hungary) not far from the Moravian border, where a Hutterite Bruderhof was established in 1547 on the estate of a nobleman Peter Bakich de Lak. The brethren had sought refuge here from the unusually heavy persecutions in Moravia, and at first the manorial lord was well disposed to accept these brethren who were generally known as excellent farmers. But soon he changed his mind, mainly under the influence of the harsh mandates of King Ferdinand (q.v.) who would not tolerate "heretics" either in Moravia or in Hungary. Thus Bakich undertook severe and drastic measures against the brethren who were quite at a loss where to turn to. The Chronicle reports these events with these words, "They were driven from Moravia to Hungary, from Hungary to Moravia, from there to Austria, and again back to Moravia. In short, there was no place at all for the God-fearing people" (Chronik, 337). These persecutions lasted for five years (1548-53). Afterwards the situation changed to the better, and from then on the brethren could enjoy relative peace in their Slovakian colonies. LOSERTH, R.F.

Details of the persecutions around Holitsch are recorded in the Geschicht-Buch (Wolkan) 241-50, or in Zieglschmid, Chronik, 319-39; ML II, 339.

Holl, Folpmer Jacob de, b. 1869 at Utrecht, d. Dec. 19, 1934, at Baarn, Dutch Mennonite pastor and theologian. After studying at the University and Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam, he served as pastor at Mensingeweer 1897-1900, Hindeloopen and Koudum 1900-3, Den Ilp 1903-5, Medemblik 1905-13, Borne 1913-26, Purmerend 1926-29, and Leermens-Loppersum 1929-34. In 1933 he was appointed lector of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, to teach ethics to the theological students, but his teaching was only for a short period, ending by his sudden death in 1934.

De Holl was a very learned man. He was a disciple of de Bussy (q.v.), his teacher at the Seminary, who estimated him highly. De Holl published only one book, De Kennis van goed en kwaad; een gedachtewisseling met de professoren Heymans en Kranenburg (Amsterdam, 1928). Besides this he wrote a number of critical reviews of books on ethics in a number of Dutch periodicals. His historical study on Jan de Liefde (q.v.) was published in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen 1901.

De Holl was an amiable man, who was loved by many and whose influence reached much further than the small congregations he served. VDZ.

De Zondagsbode, Jan. 6 and 13, 1935; DJ 1936, 17-28 with portrait.

Holland, the popular name for The Netherlands (q.v.). Two provinces also carry the name, North Holland (q.v.) and South Holland (q.v.). The language of the country is called Dutch, occasionally in America called "Holland Dutch."

Hollandsch Doopsgezind Emigranten Bureau (Dutch Mennonite Emigration Office), a committee founded in June 1924 on the initiative of the Mennonite Church Board of Rotterdam, and supported by the Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs (see Fonds voor Buitenlandsche Nooden), sponsored by the A.D.S. (Dutch Mennonite General Conference). The first trustees were S. H. N. Gorter, president-secretary; J. Th. de Monchy, treasurer; J. Thiessen, M. P. Schütte, J. N. de Jong, all of Rotterdam, and Pastor A. Binnerts Szn and J. W. van der Vlugt of Haarlem. Soon Z. Kamerling became secretary, followed by C. S. Altmann of Rotterdam, who both as secretary and treasurer 1927-37 (together with Pastor Gorter) did much for the Mennonite refugees. The services rendered by the committee were fivefold: (a) collecting money, clothing, and medicines in the Netherlands; (b) (especially during the first three years) sending food rations to Russia; (c) boarding the Russian Mennonites passing through Rotterdam, who had to wait there even for months; (d) shipping the refugees to North and South America; (e) aftercare of those who immigrated to South America (this care was given on a large scale to the Mennonite settlements in Brazil after 1930).

The refugee rush reached its peak in 1928-30. By 1930 more than 1,000 Mennonite refugees from Russia had passed Rotterdam. After 1930 the number soon decreased and the committee could give full attention to the needs and problems of the Mennonites in Brazil. By 1936 the activities of the committee had practically stopped. More than 220,000 guilders have been collected and spent on this work of Christian and brotherly charity. VDZ.

Archives of the Hollandsch Doopsgezind Emigranten Bureau, found in the Mennonite Archives of Rotterdam; De Zondagsbode from July 1924 on; DJ 1926, 53-62; 1931, 67; 1935, 69-76; Mennonitische Welt-Hilfskonferenz, Danzig 1930 (Karlsruhe n.d.) 28, 65 f., 90-94; Der Allgemeine Kongress der Mennoniten, gehalten in Amsterdam, . . . 1936 (Karlsruhe, n.d.) 143-46.

Hollatz, David (d. 1771), a Protestant theologian of Pomerania, Germany, and author of devotional literature, pastor in Güntersberg from 1730 on. His books, some of which are still read, were also used by pietistically inclined Mennonites in the Palatinate, chiefly Evangelische Gnadenordnung (Basel, 1894); Gebahnte Pilgerstrasse nach dem Berge Zion (Basel, 1866); and Verherrlichung Christi in seinem theuren und unschätzbaren Blute (Basel, 1894). The Gnadenordnung (with Pilgerstrasse) was reprinted a number of times in the United States, first in Philadelphia in 1810. The second edition was reprinted by the Mennonite printer Heinrich Eby at Berlin, Canada, in 1844 under the title Heils und Gnaden Ordnung. (ML II, 339.) NEFF, H.S.B.

Hollum, a village on the Dutch island of Ameland in the province of Friesland, the seat of the largest of the three Mennonite congregations (Hollum, Ballum, and Nes) on the island. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) visited Ameland a number of times on his journeys in 1551-82 and baptized at Hollum and Ballum a total of 99 persons; hence it is likely that there was a congregation here in those early days. The several congregations on the island are due to divisions in the 16th century; there were two at Hollum: the "Blue Barn" or Waterlander, and the "Jan Jacobsgezinden" (q.v.) or Old Flemish.

Both congregations were served until into the 19th century by unsalaried preachers. In the Waterlander congregation, which was much the smaller and had been receiving support from Amsterdam since 1709, the first known preacher was Douwe Abes Tichelaer, 1709-46, and the last preacher was J. H. Costers (retired in 1854). The Jan Jacobsgezinden group was very strict regarding the ban and avoidance; the government finally intervened and in 1608 passed such severe regulations that the congregation spoke of being persecuted. Their first elders (1650) were Jacob Janssen and Cornelis Jannsen, who were permitted to conduct baptism and communion; they were assisted by two trial preachers (proefdienaars), from whose ranks the succeeding elders were chosen. Noted elders were Jacob Jobs 1769-1804, and Cornelis Sorgdrager 1793-1826, the latter of whom was the first to give religious instruction to the children.

In the middle of the 19th century a desire to have a trained minister became evident here; the two elders were aged, and none of the members was willing to be chosen to the office. The A.D.S. at Amsterdam sent proponents (q.v.) to help them in 1850-52; then the congregation called K. S. Gorter as its minister, who served 1862-95. In 1854, when J. H. Costers of the Waterlander congregation retired, all the Mennonites on Ameland were united for a time in a single congregation, which at this time numbered 175 members. In 1870 the congregation divided into three separate congregations, served by two preachers, one serving at Nes and one at Hollum and Ballum. Gorter was followed by the preachers A. Stiel 1898-1905, J. M. Erkelens 1906-8, J. Loosjes 1909-14, J. E. van Brakel 1914-28, W. Schopenhauer 1928-32, W. Broer 1933-41, H. D. Woelinga since 1947. Since 1933 there has been only one minister on the island; he lives at Hollum and serves the three congregations. In 1857, 16 members left the church to join the followers of the pietistic Jan de Liefde (q.v.), who had founded a Free Evangelical Church on the island of Ameland.

A new meetinghouse was built in 1867. The members are partly farmers, partly navigators. The membership, 175 in 1854, was still 175 in 1900; since then it has steadily decreased to 113 in 1954. Church activities include a Bible circle, ladies' circle, and girls' club. vdZ.

DB 1861, 145 f.; 1868, 167; 1889, 1-50 passim; 1890, 1-38 passim; ML II, 340 f.

Holly Grove Mennonite Church (MC), located near Westover, Somerset Co., Md., a member of the Ohio Mennonite Conference, was organized as a congregation of 27 members in April 1919 by Bishop John S. Mast of Elverson, Pa., in the home of I. M. Kauffman. In 1909 the D. P. Yoder family had settled here with others following from Michigan, North Dakota, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Missouri. The first Sunday school, held in a schoolhouse, was organized by Amos C. Ogburn in 1916. The present structure, enlarged and remodeled in 1951, was erected in 1920. Those who have served the congregation as bishops are John S. Mast and Geo. M. Hostetler; as ministers, Aaron Mast, Geo. M. Hostetler, A. Roy Payne; as deacon, Amos C. Ogburn. Now serving are Ira A. Kurtz, Amos C. King, and Harold Hostetler. Present membership (1956) is 86. A.C.K.

Holmes County in east central Ohio, the location of early Amish and Mennonite settlements, was formed from Wayne, Coshocton, Tuscarawas counties in 1824, and was organized the next year. The section is very hilly with few railroads and most of the highways follow the winding course of some stream. Amish families named Troyer, Hochstetler, Weaver, and Gerber moved into the Walnut Creek and Sugar Creek valleys with the first settlers in 1809. Following the better farming areas they have now spread north into Wayne County and east and northeast into Tuscarawas and Stark. The first Mennonite settlers came from Bucks Co., Pa., settled near Wilmot in 1812 and erected two small meetinghouses—Kolb's (q.v., of logs, erected 1833; pronounced Kulps), and Longenecker's (q.v., hewn logs erected 1834). After an early period of great interest and growth during which two frame meetinghouses were erected the congregation declined. The Shoups and Mumaws moved to Wayne Co., Ohio, and Elkhart Co., Ind. Attempts by nearby Amish Mennonites to revive the work have met with only spasmodic success. Members of the Amish Church in the Walnut Creek Valley organized or participated in Sunday schools held in schoolhouses as early as 1859. Holmes County with Wayne was one of the centers of controversy between the more progressive Amish who were ready to allow a few cultural changes, to erect meetinghouses, and to make slight changes in the worship service and those who insisted on the strict old order. In the ministers' conference held during the early 1860's certain progressive leaders tried to introduce a less conservative interpretation of the Scriptures. The others made a strict adherence to the old rules and regulations—die alten Regel und Ordnungen—an absolute requirement of fellowship. Out of the controversy arose the Amish Mennonite and the "Old Order" Amish. Leaders of the opposing groups in Holmes County were "Big" Mose Miller and "Little" Mose Miller, the former insisting on progressive measures. Amish Mennonites established their first congregations at Walnut Creek and Martin's Creek. These have now grown into four regular congregations and a mission, and with Longenecker's had a combined membership of 1,414 in 1953, and three mission stations with 25 members. The congregations are Walnut Creek, Farmerstown, Martin's Creek, and Berlin, Longenecker's, and the mission Gray Ridge near Millersburg. All these belong to the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite (MC) Conference. A 1923-25 schism in the Walnut Creek congregation resulted in the organization of a General Conference congregation in Sugarcreek just across the border in Tuscarawas County. The Old Order Amish membership in Holmes County and contiguous areas in Tuscarawas, Stark, and Wayne counties is over 4,000, with 43 "districts" or congregations. This is the largest Old Order Amish settlement in North America.

In recent years two Conservative A.M. congregations have been organized in the county, Pleasant View and Maysville, with a total membership of 340 in 1953. Thus the total Mennonite and Amish baptized membership in Holmes County and its immediately adjacent territory, all of whom, except Longenecker's, are the descendants of the original 1809 settlers and their later associates, equals in 1956 approximately 6,000.

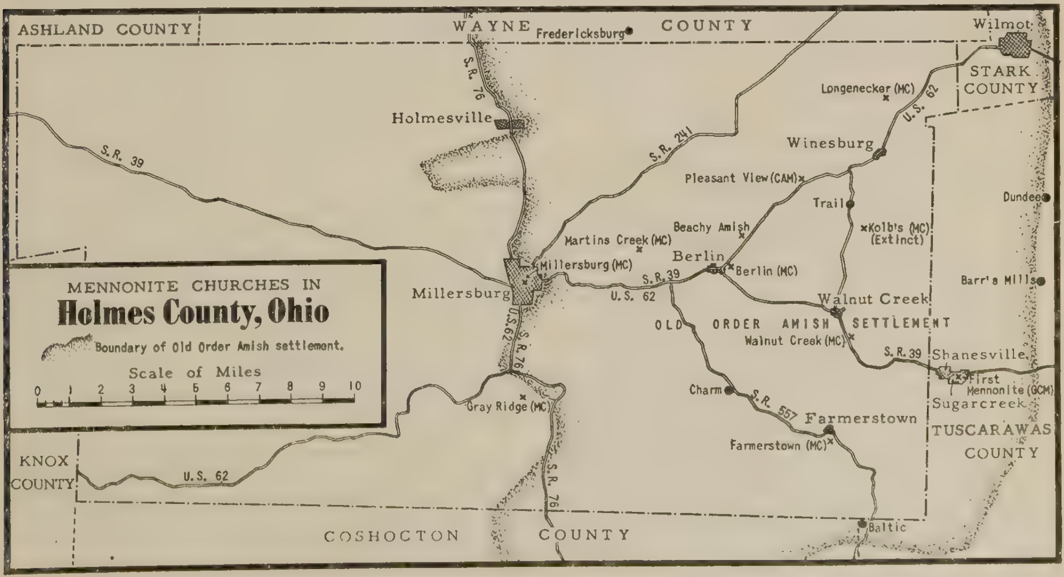
A Beachy Amish mission and a Church of God in Christ mission have recently been established.
J.S.U.

Holmes County (Ohio) Old Order Amish settlement is the largest Old Order Amish community in the United States. Founded in 1809 by settlers coming from Somerset County, Pa., in 1955 it has 43 congregations with 4,354 baptized members and approximately 1,600 families. In addition there were in the community one Beachy Amish congregation with 28 members, two Conservative Amish congregations with 428 members, six Mennonite (M.C. Ohio Conference) congregations with 1,312 members, and one General Conference congregation with 235 members, all of whom with few exceptions descend from the original Amish constituency in this area. The Amish community, which is in the eastern half of the county, roughly east of Route 76 and the county seat of Millersburg, has "spilled over" into Coshocton County on the south and Wayne County on the north. It always has also covered the western part of Tuscarawas County lying immediately east of Holmes County. In the heart of the settlement the land is almost solidly occupied by Amish or Mennonite farmers. From east to west the Amish shopping centers are Sugarcreek (Tuscarawas Co.), Walnut Creek, Berlin, and Millersburg.

The Old Order Amish of Holmes County are no longer fully unified. A stricter group of congregations, which practices shunning sharply against members transferring to other Amish or Mennonite congregations, has no communion fellowship with the other Amish congregations. This includes several subgroups: the "Swartzendruber" or "Sam Yoder" group of five congregations, and the "Stutzman" group of two congregations. Some of these strict congregations are not in communion with each other.

The first division in the community, that between the Old Order and the progressive group (Walnut Creek congregation) which joined the Mennonite (MC) Conference, occurred in 1862. The Conservative division occurred about 1915. The small Beachy congregation was started in 1941. A Church of God in Christ mission, called the Rock of Ages Mission, which was established recently among the Amish near Maysville, had won a small number of Old Order Amish and a few more Old Order Mennonites and others.

Parochial schools have developed more widely in the Holmes County Amish community than anywhere else among the Old Order Amish. For the school year 1955-56 there were ten such schools, with a total enrollment of 344, each operated by its own Amish school board, the first established in 1945. Two of these offer nine grades, thus including the first year of high school.



The typical congregational organization of the Holmes County Amish consists of one bishop, two preachers, and one deacon. There were in 1955 in the 43 congregations 39 bishops, 80 preachers, and 36 deacons, or a total of 155 ordained men. There is no church activity in the congregations except a Sunday morning church service every two weeks. Some of the members support the work of the Mission Interests Committee (q.v.). J. A. Raber of Baltic, Ohio, has operated a small bookstore at his home, and has occasionally issued publications, including even an edition of Menno Simons' Works in German (1926). He has published the Neuer Amerikanischer Calender annually since 1930. This Calender contains an Amish "ministers' list" with years of birth and ordination indicated for each one.

The Holmes County Amish settlement is a typical close-knit Amish community, somewhat less tradition-bound than the more conservative Lancaster County settlement, and very similar in spiritual and cultural level to the Elkhart-Lagrange County settlement in northern Indiana. In recent years the Brunk Brothers' revival campaign and similar campaigns by other Mennonite evangelists held in the vicinity have had some influence, although the most common result has been the transfer of awakened members to a Conservative congregation or to an Ohio Mennonite congregation.

Beginning with 1953, Ervin Gingerich, an Old Order Amish deacon, has been publishing annually an Ohio Amish Directory, since 1956 in two volumes, the first of which gives complete ministerial and membership statistics and names for all Amish congregations in the Holmes County settlement, including also parochial school statistics. Vol. II does the same for all other Amish congregations in Ohio. The Budget, a weekly newspaper published at Sugarcreek, Ohio, since 1920, has long been "the Amish newspaper," not only for Holmes County but also for the entire United States with a circulation of well over 8,000. It contains a remarkable amount of Amish local news "correspondence" from many Amish communities, as well as special articles of interest to the Old Order and Conservative groups. For over 30 years (1890-1920) the paper was edited and published by S. H. Miller and J. C. Miller, the former an Amish Mennonite minister of Shanesville.

In spite of the long history and size of the Holmes County Amish settlement practically nothing has been published about it. Two unpublished M.A. theses on this region have been recorded by John A. Hostetler in his Annotated Bibliography on the Amish (Scottdale, 1951): Lyle Fletcher, "The Amish People of Holmes County, Ohio: A Study in Human Geography" (Ohio State University, 1932, pp. 98) and Velma Leeper, "The History, Customs, and Social Life of the Amish of Ohio with Special Reference to Holmes County" (Kent State University, Kent, Ohio, 1936, pp. 180). H.S.B.

A. P. Karch, "The Amish of Holmes County, Ohio," in The Standard Atlas of Holmes County, Ohio (Cincinnati, 1907); S. H. Miller, "The Amish in Holmes County, Ohio," in Mennonite Yearbook and Directory (Scottdale, 1918) 31 f.; John H. Yoder, "Caesar and the Meidung," MQR XXIII (1949) 79-98, treats a case of a lawsuit regarding "shunning" in the Holmes-Wayne County settlement.

Holmfield and Lena Mennonite Brethren Church, a congregation having two meetinghouses, one in the village of Holmfield, the other near Lena, Man., a member of the Northern District Conference of the M.B. Church, was organized under the leadership of H. Unger on March 11, 1928, with a membership of 24. The membership in 1949 was 63, all of whom are rural people. Both churches were built in 1944, each with a seating capacity of 250. In 1949 P. Schultz was the leader of the group at Holmfield, and J. F. Poetker at Lena. H. Derksen also served as minister. In 1951 the two groups separated, each becoming an independent congregation, Holmfield being organized with 26 members and P. F. Sawatsky as pastor. In 1954 Holmfield had 27 members, with Peter P. Schulz as pastor. The Lena group had 40 members at the time of separation. In 1955 it had 58, with J. F. Poetker as pastor. J.F.P.

Hollsopple, Somerset Co., Pa., a mining village of 1,000 inhabitants, located about 10 miles south of Johnstown, is the post-office address for a very large part of the Johnstown district Mennonite (MC) settlement, particularly the four older congregations, viz., the Stahl (1 mile distant), Kaufman, Blough, and Thomas congregations, with a total of about 650 members (1956), and is therefore a very familiar address. It is, however, on the south edge of the settlement and is not the shopping center for the Mennonite community. H.S.B.

Holstein. The duchies of Holstein and Schleswig were divided under Christian III (d. 1559) in such a way that the Duke of Gottorp and the king had sole jurisdiction over a part of each, while some districts remained under joint jurisdiction. The difficulties resulting from this arrangement were of benefit to the spread of Mennonitism.

With dukes Hans and Adolf, the king issued severe edicts against the Mennonites who had settled in Oldesloe (q.v.) and in the east at Steckelsdorf as powder manufacturers, linen weavers, and cover makers. In the cemetery "thor Krempe" (today Altenkrempe) there was a great number of "such false rabble," including women and girls, who "live well and some among them go with golden chains." At the "lower mill" near Lütjenburg a meeting of 900 had taken place at night. This is the complaint of the Statthalter Bertram von Anevelde (Ahlefeldt) in 1554 to the king, whom he besought to expel them not only from this district, but also from Lübeck. The memory of events in Münster in 1535 was still fresh. Duke Adolf proposed to his brother that they issue an edict against dangerous heretics to be posted on all church doors. They were thinking in particular of Bartolomäus of Ahlefeldt (q.v.), who was their common subject, and upon whose estates at Fresenburg (q.v.) near Oldesloe Mennonites were living. In 1533 and in September 1555 an edict was issued by Christian III warning that Anabaptists, because they caused insurrection, should not be employed (see Denmark).

On their account Adolf ordered a church inspection in 1557 and had a pastor deposed who was suspected of Anabaptist leanings. These measures were not unsuccessful. Nothing more is heard of Mennonites in East Holstein. Nevertheless Menno Simons could spend the last years of his life, 1554-61, quietly in Wüstenfelde.

In the south of Holstein there were a few Mennonites in the towns of Pinneberg and Wandsbek, who were not subject to any marked hostility. In the next century Fresenburg is again on the scene. Very suddenly in July 1656 the order was issued by both rulers to Joh. von der Decken, the owner, to remove "the ungodly rabble" from his jurisdiction within a week, on penalty of a fine of 3,000 talers; for "as soon as they get enough air and opportunity, they will rebel against the God-ordained government, revolt, and draw entire nations into insurrection and ruin, as the examples of the previous century show." Three families felt this blow; Jan de Buyser (q.v.), the "Huiskoper" (q.v.) preacher of Hamburg, drew up a petition for them, pointing out the toleration the ancestors of these families had enjoyed. They were very likely permitted to remain.

In the southwest of the duchy, many Mennonites immigrated in the 16th century to the marshes of Krempe and Wilster, and were of no little importance to the country. Actual places of freedom, where they were granted special privileges, were set up in 1623 in Glückstadt (q.v.) and in 1601 in Altona (q.v.) where they were valued for their industry in the crafts. In the north the marsh borders on Dithmarschen. The assumption that Anabaptists had also gone there is supported by the "Landrecht" of 1567, article 2 of which opposes the Anabaptists. In addition a royal decree of 1637 forbade secret conventicles in the south of Dithmarschen.

Mennonitism in Holstein gradually declined. The descendants of the immigrants joined the state church; e.g., Jacob Lammerts, the only Mennonite living in Rendsburg after 1800. In 1834 distinctions in active and passive franchise on the basis of creed were removed. A regulation of 1863 permitted Mennonites to settle anywhere in the duchies.

A large number of refugees from the Danzig area settled in the Schleswig-Holstein area in 1945-46. The Kiel (q.v.) congregation was organized in 1949. R.Do.

B. C. Roosen, Gesch. der Menn.-Gem. zu Hamburg-Altona (2 vv., Hamburg, 1886-87); Ernst F. Goverts, "Das adelige Gut Fresenburg und die Mennoniten," in Ztscht der Zentralstelle für Niedersächsische Familiengesch., No. 3-5, 1923; Ludwig Harboes, Det Siellandske Clerisie Eller Eiteretning Om De Bisko . . . (Copenhagen, 1754); R. Dollinger, Gesch. der Menn. in Schleswig-Holstein, Hamburg und Lübeck (Neumünster, 1930); Menn. Bl., 1904, 29 ff., 76; ML II, 341.

Holt Hutterite Bruderhof, established in 1949 near Yarrow, Alberta. It had a population of 57 in 1950.

Holwerd, Dutch province of Friesland, seat of the congregation of Holwerd-Blija, formerly called Holwerd, de Vischbuurt, and Blija; de Vischbuurt in 1850 became the independent congregation of Ternaard (q.v.). Until 1935 church services were also held in Blija (q.v.); now only in Holwerd. Holwerd is a town of about 2,000 inhabitants. Its Mennonite congregation must have been established about 1563; Leenaert Bouwens baptized a total of 234 persons here (67 in 1563-65; 167 in 1568-82). Of the history of this congregation not much is known. A meetinghouse was built in 1629 (this old meetinghouse was still in use in 1930 as a non-Mennonite kindergarten); the membership then numbered about 180; 241 in 1861, 260 in 1900, only 85 in 1954. A new meetinghouse was built in 1850, rebuilt in 1927. An organ was installed in 1906.

Holwerd was one of the first rural congregations to call a minister trained at the Amsterdam Seminary, viz., Pieter Feenstra, who served here 1792-97. Since this time the congregation has always been served by a trained minister. Ministers of the last decades were A. H. van Drooge 1897-1901, H. C. Barthel 1902-13, G. A. Hulshoff 1913-16, W. Hilverda 1916-50, A. J. van der Linden 1950-54.

Church activities include a ladies' circle since 1920; Sunday school for children since 1902; youth group, Menniste Bouwers group. W.H., vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, see Index; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1942 f., II, 2, No. 100; DB 1861, 136 f.; 1906, 195; ML II, 342.

Holwierde, in the Dutch province of Groningen, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized ten persons in 1563-65. Since there was no congregation here, the newly baptized must have joined neighboring congregations, either Appingedam or Bierum. vdZ.

Holy Spirit. Main-stream Anabaptists as orthodox Trinitarians confessed both the personality and the deity of the Holy Spirit, avoiding both unitarianism and tritheism. Grebel in his letters and defenses assumed the accepted doctrine of the Holy Spirit as the third Person of the Trinity (Bender, 287). Sattler began the Schleitheim Confession in true Trinitarian fashion, speaking of the Spirit as the One "who is sent from the Father to all believers for their strength and comfort and for their perseverance in all tribulation until the end" (Wenger, Doctrines, 69). Menno Simons wrote, "We believe and confess the Holy Ghost to be a true, real, or personal Holy Ghost, and that in a divine way—even as the Father is a true father, and the Son a true son; which Holy Ghost is a mystery to all mankind, incomprehensible, inexpressible, and indescribable, . . . divine with His divine attributes, going forth from the Father through the being of the Father and the Son" (Works II, 186). Riedemann said of the Holy Spirit, "Thus we acknowledge Him, with the Father and the Son, to be God," and emphasized the unity of the Godhead, using the illustration of "fire, heat, and light" to show that the three persons of the Trinity are inseparable, so that "where one is, there are all three, and when one is lacking, none is present" (Confession, 37).

Marpeck like Menno Simons and Riedemann emphasized the importance of the Holy Spirit in the Christian life. The Holy Spirit in His relation to the believer effects regeneration, assures of salvation, guides into truth, activates the conscience, purifies the heart, comforts, produces love, and gives power and joy in service (Wenger, Marpeck, 214). The Anabaptists never identified the Holy Spirit with reason, or with emotion, or with the conscience, resisting the positions of rationalism and mysticism, but declared the Holy Spirit to be objective reality, revealing Himself to the believer in the Gospel (Friedmann, 82). In His relation to the Scriptures, the Holy Spirit was not considered to be a separate and independent "inner light" or "inner Word" whose authority might contradict and supersede the "written Word" as spiritualists taught. Anabaptists held that the Holy Spirit as the true author of Scripture is also the true interpreter of Scripture who does not contradict Himself. Concerning this Marpeck wrote, "We say again that there are not two, but there is only one Word of God, and the word of divine evangelical preaching . . . is truly the Word of the Holy Spirit and of God, for the Holy Spirit, who is God, has spoken through and out of the heart and mouth of the apostles" (Horsch, 351 f.).

While neither the Dordrecht nor the Ris Confession has a separate article on the Holy Spirit, both stress the importance of the Trinity and of the place of the Holy Spirit in Christian faith and experience. Ris declares, "The Holy Spirit belongs, as a divine entity, to the essence of God. He is as well the Spirit of the Father as of the Son and proceeds from the Father and from the Son as the mighty worker of all divine and spiritual things" (Ris, 4 f.). Acknowledging the equality of the persons of the Trinity he adds that "equal honor and equal service are due them."

The Shorter Catechism briefly affirms faith in the Trinity and in the Holy Spirit, while the Waldeck Catechism gives a more detailed description of the operation of the Holy Spirit, noting that "He testifies of Jesus; He comforts believers; He sanctifies them, and leads them into all truth; and through the Holy Ghost, the love of God is shed abroad in the hearts of believers" (Wenger, Doctrines, 104). The Roosen Catechism discusses more extensively the nature of God, stressing the unity of the Godhead to the extent that it appears anti-Trinitarian. Commenting on Matt. 28:19 Roosen says, "From this it must not be understood that there are three beings, or three persons, much less that there are three Gods in heaven. But these names are thus differently expressed in consideration of the work of redemption and the salvation of the human race; as the Father, the origin; the Son, the means of redemption; and the Holy Ghost, sanctification and confirmation in salvation" (Wenger, Doctrines, 125 f.). In the light of its historical context and the writer's lack of theological training this statement may be accepted as Trinitarian in spirit though it lacks the precision of a trained theologian (Wenger, Doctrines, 125 f.).

American Mennonite groups, generally accepting the historic position, are largely agreed on the doctrine of the nature of the Holy Spirit as personal and divine but they reflect some differences in the relative emphasis given to the work of the Holy Spirit in Christian experience. Distinctive emphases may be noted in the following groups. The Brethren in Christ Church has "for many years made much of the influence and operation of the Holy Spirit," including an emphasis on the doctrine of sanctification (Climenhaga, 296 f.). While this group is not unanimous in its interpretation of sanctification, it seems to be agreed on its importance as a separate work of the Spirit. The Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (now the United Missionary Church) officially affirms the doctrine of "entire sanctification," which is "an instantaneous act of God, through the Holy Ghost, by faith in the atoning merits of Christ's blood, and constitutes the believer holy" (Huffman, 163). The Defenseless Mennonite Church (now the Evangelical Mennonite Church) includes in its statement of faith a separate article, "The Baptism of the Holy Ghost," which it calls "a distinct operation of the Holy Ghost, separate from His regenerating work, . . . an experience always connected with . . . equipment for testimony or service" (Manual, 27).

Distinctive emphases in the doctrine of the Holy Spirit also occur among the French Mennonites. The Mennonites of Holland reflect various views on the Holy Spirit, some of which reject traditional Trinitarianism and represent a revival of spiritualistic tendencies of earlier centuries (Meihuizen, 259-304).

E.W.

H. S. Bender, Conrad Grebel (Goshen, 1950) 287; J. C. Wenger, The Doctrines of the Mennonites (Scottdale, 1950) 69, 104, 125 f.; idem, "The Theology of Pilgram Marpeck," MQR XII, 4 (October 1938) 214; Menno Simons, Complete Works II, 186; Peter Rideman, Confession of Faith (London, 1950) 37; R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949) 82; J. Horsch, Mennonites in Europe (Scottdale, 1942) 351 f.; Cornelis Ris, Mennonite Articles of Faith (Berne, 1918) 4 f.; A. W. Climenhaga, History of the Brethren in Christ Church (Nappanee, 1942) 296 f.; J. A. Huffman, History of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (New Carlisle, 1920) 27; H. W. Meihuizen, "Spiritualistic Tendencies and Movements Among the Dutch Mennonites of the 16th and 17th Centuries," MQR XXVII (1953) 259-304.

Holzkamp, an estate near Lübeck, which about 1555 was leased by members of the Mennonite Roosen (q.v.) family, especially by Geerlinck, a refugee from Jülich. They were apparently not only farmers, but also tanners at a time when they were everywhere exposed to fines and expulsion.

B. C. Roosen, Gesch. der Menn.-Gem. zu Hamburg und Altona (Hamburg, 1886-87); C. H. Starck, Lübecker Kirchen-Historie I (1724); ML II, 342.

Home and Church, a 12-page monthly organ of four General Conference Mennonite congregations in eastern Pennsylvania, viz., Deep Run, Perkasie (Bethel), Springfield, and Bowmansville, edited by the pastor Allen M. Fretz, beginning in 1920 and continuing at least to 1929.

Home and Foreign Relief Commission was originated under the auspices of the Mennonite Evangelizing and Benevolent Board (q.v.), the mission board of the Mennonite Church (MC), by John F. Funk, G. L. Bender, George Lambert, C. K. Hostetler, and seven others (most of them associated with the Mennonite Publishing Company, q.v.) at Elkhart, Ind., March 2, 1897, for the immediate purpose of famine relief in India. Funds were gathered and grain was purchased, the latter being shipped to India as parts of cargoes sent by various relief agencies. In April 1897 George Lambert (q.v.) was sent to India to supervise the distribution of the HFRC funds and the grain for which it was responsible. Lambert returned in November 1897, reporting the presence of 20,000 famine orphans in mission orphanages requiring continued support. By the close of 1897 the HFRC had collected more than $20,000 for India relief.

For a time the HFRC assumed a quasi inter-Mennonite character. While it was initiated under M.C. auspices, and while this group made the largest financial contribution to the work, practically all Mennonite groups shared in the contributions. From the beginning D. F. Jantzen, representing the "Russian" Mennonites of the prairie states and residing in Elkhart as editor of the Mennonitische Rundschau, was associated with the movement. Jantzen was a member of the publicity committee and for one year served as secretary of the HFRC. The generous support of the Mennonites of the prairie states was largely due to his influence through the Rundschau (and other periodicals).

In November 1897 the HFRC withdrew from the auspices of the MEBB, although continuing to work closely with it. For a time consideration was given to a constitutional provision that all branches of Mennonites supporting the work of the HFRC be represented on its board of directors. In August 1898 a group of 23 persons, including 9 from other Mennonite groups, met at the call of the HFRC to give further consideration to the constitution and also to consider the possibility of an inter-Mennonite foreign mission program, several of the General Conference Mennonite Church representatives being interested in this proposal. The meeting concluded, however, that to take this action would not be advisable at this time. At the annual meeting in November 1898 the various groups were again well represented, David Goerz (q.v.) of Kansas, representative of the General Conference Mennonites, being elected vice-president of the HFRC, and H. H. Regier of Mountain Lake, Minn., a member of its executive committee. The announcements of the HFRC published in the various Mennonite periodicals continued to say that all branches of Mennonites had contributed to its relief funds and that as soon as Mennonite missions were established in India the HFRC would support the orphanage and relief work of all such missions.

By the close of 1898 the MEBB had appointed its first missionaries to India, who then opened the work at Dhamtari (q.v.) in November 1899. In 1899 also the G.C.M. group organized its own Emergency Relief Commission (q.v.), which sent David Goerz to India in 1900 as a relief commissioner and to take the first steps in locating a mission. Later that year the first General Conference missionaries sailed, establishing their mission at Champa in 1901.

The HFRC continued to collect funds for another five years, supporting various benevolent and mission projects including orphanage work in India. By 1902 these funds had reached a total of more than $45,000. With two Mennonite missions in India, however, as well as two relief agencies at home, the inter-Mennonite character of the HFRC declined. Beginning with the annual meeting of 1901, all officers of the HFRC were representatives of the M.C. group, although that year G. G. Wiens was re-elected to the board of directors. From this time the Commission served more as a companion organization of the MEBB, and with the merging of that organization with the Mennonite Board of Charitable Homes (q.v.) to form the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (q.v.) in 1906, the HFRC ceased to exist. In 1917 the Mennonite Commission for War Sufferers (q.v.) was created as a companion organization of the MBMC, and can be thought of as a kind of successor of the HFRC. In 1926 the MCWS was absorbed by the MBMC and eventually came to be known as the Mennonite Relief and Service Committee (q.v.) of that board. Renewal of an inter-Mennonite relief program came with the organization of the Mennonite Central Committee (q.v.) in 1920.

The HFRC published a monthly 4-page periodical for a short time in 1901 (nine issues apparently), first issue April 1901, under the title The Mennonite Missionary Messenger, "Devoted to the interests of Home and Foreign Missionary Work in General and especially to the care and support of orphans." It was edited by the HFRC secretary A. C. Kolb, who was a leading spirit throughout HFRC history.
G.F.H.

Home for the Aged, located in Inman, Kan., was founded in 1946, when Mrs. Maria Vogt, a 72-year-old resident of the Inman community, offered her ten-room residence to the churches of the community as a home for aged people. An organization was formed and plans were made to remodel and enlarge the house, to make room for 15 residents and about 5 workers. The home is controlled by a board of nine members, who appoint a management committee of three to supervise the work. Most of the contributions and the larger number of residents have come from seven of the Mennonite churches of this area, representing three conferences.

The home was dedicated on June 15, 1947. Residents pay for their rooms and care, so that the home is largely self-supporting. However a gift day is observed annually and smaller gifts come in quite often. P.T.N.

Home for the Aged of the Mennonite Brethren Pacific District Conference, located at Reedley, Cal., was established in 1942 after a committee had been working on the project since 1938. Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Jost were the house parents. A committee of five, elected by the Conference, supervises the institution. In 1948 a new and larger home was built. In 1952 there were 48 guests. (Annual Reports in Handbook of the Pacific District Conference of the M.B. Church.) C.K.

Homes for the Aged, the designation for institutions operated for the care of older people unable to care for themselves and yet not requiring hospital attention. In May 1954 there were 38 such institutions sponsored by Mennonites of the United States and Canada, 3 in Germany, 1 in France, and about 20 in Holland. There had earlier been at least two in West Prussia and one in Russia.

The primary purpose of these homes is to provide care for the older members of the churches—generally over 70 years of age—in a Christian, homelike atmosphere. It is recognized that in modern society there are many older people who are not able to care for themselves and who do not have relatives or friends who can assume the responsibility. While the state has provided emergency care, the feeling has been that the church has a responsibility of Christian sharing.

There was probably less need for homes for the aged in the colonial period of Mennonite history. In the establishment of Mennonite homesteads, provision was made for the care of the aged. Some groups of Mennonites still take care of the aged, primarily through the family. The Old Order Amish, for instance, still maintain the practice of building a small apartment onto the main house, or a separate but closely connected small house, in which the parents or grandparents retire when the time comes. This is called the "grossdoddy" house. However, increases in population and the infiltration of a more urban culture made a consideration for the aged necessary. The first home for the aged sponsored by American Mennonites was the Salem Home at Hillsboro, Kan., established in 1894 by the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren. The second was the General Conference home at Frederick, Pa., established in 1896. The third was the Welsh Mountain Samaritan Home established by the Lancaster Conference (MC) in 1898, and the fourth the Bethesda Home (GCM) at Goessel, Kan., in 1899.

The slow growth of an awareness of the need for institutional care for the aged was reflected by the fact that in the first two decades of the 20th century only three homes were established. In the next two decades six more were opened, making the total in operation in 1940 twelve.

The sharp upturn in opening homes for the aged came in the 1940's, during which decade eleven were established. During the present fifth decade eight have already been opened, and several more are under consideration. Some are being expanded.

Possibly primary among the factors accounting for this increase in homes for the aged is the growing awareness of the need for a church-wide sharing in meeting the unique problems of the aged. One significant factor has been a change from the large farmhouse to a smaller one in or near a town or city. Space became an issue. Of course, the sheer fact of more older people has brought the problems of the aged to the forefront.

Another trend which has stimulated the increase in institutions for the aged has been a larger share of financial responsibility assumed by governments. In some sections, homes for the aged can be operated by payments from the guests received through old-age pensions. Also, some governments have been willing to assume part of the cost of construction. The provincial government of Ontario, for instance, contributes $1,000 per bed.

In May 1954 there were 38 (statistics are available for only 34) homes for the aged operated by Mennonites in eleven states in the United States and in four provinces in Canada. Five different Mennonite conferences operated homes for the aged. The total capacity of the homes was 977, and 247 workers were employed. The total property valuation was $1,756,000.

There are four major types of Mennonite-operated homes for the aged. First is that under direct conference supervision, in which the board of directors is elected by the conference and the conference assumes ultimate financial responsibility. The second type is the private corporation where a legal group is formed for the purpose of operating the home and the corporation has direct responsibility in all things. The third type is the privately owned type home. Here the individual Mennonite assumes full responsibility for the operation of the home as a vocation. The fourth is the community type where a community operates the institution and the community is made up predominantly of Mennonites.

Having had almost 60 years' experience, American Mennonites have been evaluating their efforts regarding homes for the aged. Five trends can be discerned. First, there is the rapid movement toward self-supporting operation. In the earlier years homes were supported by freewill gifts from churches. More homes now fix charges with a view of covering costs; individuals who need subsidizing are aided separately. However, with old-age pensions and county grants an institution can usually be self-supporting. Second, the need is felt to do more for the guests in our homes. Often the work has been to provide only the basic necessities until death. A new emphasis on spiritual ministry and meaningful activity is in evidence. Third is a movement toward more adequate personnel. Workers are studying their tasks and leaders who have special training and talents are sought. Fourth, the present trend is away from the large institutional type of care. One beginning has been made in a cottage type. Here couples (or single individuals) live in cottages on the grounds as long as they are able; later they are moved to the central building. Fifth, in some areas communities are finding they can solve the problem by wide cooperation. It appears that the number of community homes will grow in the future.

Following is the list of the 38 Mennonite homes for the aged in operation in 1954, with date of founding where known:

Mennonite (MC): 14

- Welsh Mountain Samaritan Home, New Holland, Pa. (1898)
- Home for the Aged, Rittman, Ohio (1901, 1939)
- Mennonite Home, Lancaster, Pa. (1903)
- Home for the Aged, Eureka, Ill. (1922)
- Mennonite Old People's Home, Maugansville, Md. (1923)
- Braeside Home, Preston, Ont. (1942)
- Eastern Mennonite Home, Hatfield, Pa. (1942)
- Eastern Mennonite Convalescent Home, Hatfield, Pa. (1942)

Mennonite Home for the Aged, Albany, Ore. (1946)
Rest Haven, Gassville, Ark. (1950)
Sunset Home for the Aged, Geneva, Neb. (1951)
Froh Brothers Homestead, Sturgis, Mich. (1952)
Rockome, Arcola, Ill. (1952)
Virginia Mennonite Home, Harrisonburg, Va. (1954)
General Conference Mennonite: 9
Mennonite Home for the Aged, Frederick, Pa. (1896)
Altenheim der Bergthaler Menn.-Gemeinde in Manitoba, Gretna, Man. (1918-38)
The Mennonite Home, Meadows, Ill. (1923)
Rosenort Home for the Aged, Rosthern, Sask. (1945)
Bethania Home for the Aged and Infirm, Winnipeg, Man. (1946)
Home for the Aged, Inman, Kan. (1947)
The Tieszen Home, Inc., Marion, S.D. (1947)
Home for the Aged, St. Catherines, Ont.
Mennonite Memorial Home, Bluffton, Ohio
Mennonite Brethren: 7
Tabor Home for the Aged, Morden, Man. (1921)
Mennonite Home for the Aged, Reedley, Cal. (1944)
Sunshine Mission Home, Buhler, Kan. (1945)
Corn Home for the Aged, Corn, Okla. (1947)
Altenheim, Winkler, Man.
Home for the Aged, Coaldale, Alberta Mission Home, Yarrow, B.C.
Church of God in Christ, Mennonite: 1
Bethel Home for the Aged, Montezuma, Kan. (1948)
Reformed Mennonites: 1
Reformed Mennonite Home, Waynesboro, Pa.
Mennonite Community Homes: 4
Bethesda Home for the Aged (GCM), Goessel, Kan. (1899)
Bethel Home for the Aged (GCM), Mountain Lake, Minn. (1921)
Bethel Home for the Aged (GCM), Newton, Kan. (1926)
Salem Mennonite Home for the Aged (GCM), Freeman, S.D. (1949)
General Community Homes: 2
Salem Home (KMB), Hillsboro, Kan. (1894)
Mission Home, Hillsboro, Kan. (1942)

A recent development has been the establishment of "Convalescent Homes." (The name is a euphemism since the inmates are largely bedfast old people who come to the home to die.) Most of these homes are privately operated for profit, but there is at least one conference home, the Franconia Mennonite Convalescent Home near Souderton, Pa. (MC). A.R.S.

A. R. Shelly, "An Evaluation of Mennonite Social Welfare Institutions," Proceedings . . . Ninth Conference on Mennonite . . . Cultural Problems (North Newton), 1953.

Homes for the Aged in Europe. The care for the aged, indigent, ill, and orphaned has always been an integral part of the religious and social life of the Mennonites, although the forms have changed with circumstances. In the early days of persecution it was impossible to establish special homes for the needy; later on, since most of them were rural people, parents were generally taken care of in the homes of their children. Often they would live in a small house especially built for them on the home place. If necessary, the congregation would help to care for them. In Switzerland homes for the aged have never been established among the Mennonites, and in South Germany and France, only since World War II. The city congregations of North and East Germany had in some cases established homes for the aged and needy. The founding and early history of most of these is obscure and has never been investigated.

The Crefeld Mennonite Church originally had an orphanage next to the church on Königstrasse. Later the orphanage was changed into a home for the aged. The home was financed by small contributions from the inmates and the income from the von der Leyen endowment. The church custodian also lived in this building. During World War II the numerous buildings of the congregation, including the church and the home for the aged, were destroyed.

The Crefeld Mennonite Church built an old people's home in 1906. Since provision had been made for the poor of all creeds by the Cornelius Foundation given by Cornelius de Greiff (q.v.), the Crefeld old people's home was intended for unattached women who had some money (married couples were not necessarily excluded), for whom rent, light, and heat were furnished free. Each apartment was made as private as possible.

The Mennonite congregations of Emden and Norden each had an Armenhaus (home for the needy), in which old and needy people were cared for. However, as early as the 19th century these homes lost their original character and significance. The house in Emden was destroyed during World War II, but the one in Norden is still in existence. Although the Mennonite Church of Hamburg-Altona has always had a sense of responsibility toward the needy in the congregation, a home for the aged was never established.

The congregation of the Gross-Werder, West Prussia, had a home for the aged about which H. G. Mannhardt reported in Mennonitische Blätter (1896, p. 87). The Mennonites of Danzig had institutions called "Hospital" which cared for the aged and needy for a period of more than 300 years. The Frisian congregation had an Armenhaus next to its meetinghouse since 1638, and the Flemish congregation established one large enough to house 30 aged persons ten years later. During the Russian occupation of Danzig in 1734 it was destroyed, but was later rebuilt. In 1795 the congregation with a membership of 700, including children, supported 95 aged and poor. A collection for this purpose was usually held in connection with the observance of the Lord's Supper, which on July 7, 1765, amounted to 16,660 guilders. Again in 1813 during the occupation of Danzig, church and hospital were destroyed. A new home for twenty-four poor and aged persons was built in 1816 even before the church was erected. In 1902 it was replaced by a new building with eight small apartments, the home of the church custodian, and an auditorium (Gemeindesaal), which was severely damaged during World War II. The Königsberg Mennonite Church had two almshouses, which also cared for the aged, next to its church building since 1769, in which there was room for six families.

The first home for the aged in Russia was established in Rückenau, Molotschna, by the Mennonite Brethren in 1895, when P. M. Friesen donated a house for this purpose which provided room for 15 people. A larger project was started in 1903 by the Molotschna Mennonites in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the settlement. This home was erected on 90 acres of community land on the Kurushan River at a cost of 41,000 rubles raised through collections and taxes. The home was opened in 1906, had 50 inmates in 1908, and was to be enlarged to accommodate 100. The cost of maintenance for 50 inhabitants amounted to 6,000 rubles per year.

As a result of World War II, two thirds of the German Mennonites became homeless and lost much of their possessions. In order to help the aged among them an organization called "Mennonite Homes for the Aged" (Mennonitisches Altersheim) was founded June 17, 1949. Successively the following homes for the aged were opened: Dec. 28, 1949, "Marienburg" at Leutesdorf near Neuwied on the Rhine; Oct. 20, 1950, "Friedenshort" at Enkenbach, Palatinate; and on Dec. 6, 1952, "Abendfrieden" at Pinneberg, near Hamburg, with 101, 72, and 22 inmates respectively in 1952. Contributions for maintenance of the homes in 1952 were DM 19,630 from the Mennonite Central Committee, DM 3,049 from the German Mennonites, and DM 14,018 from their own production. Each of the homes has one or two trained nurses. Only a few of the inmates are in a position to pay for their maintenance. Most of them depend upon government support and an additional allowance from the homes, which is raised within the Mennonite constituency. On Dec. 31, 1952, the organization had a membership of 1,047, which had contributed DM 34,282 in money and DM 20,430 in gifts-in-kind. The executive committee of the organization consisted at that time of Fritz Hege, Josef Gingerich, Richard Hertzler, Gertrud Schowalter, and Paul Kliewer.

In Burgweinting (q.v.) near Regensburg, Bavaria, there is a home for the aged owned by "Mennonitisches Hilfswerk Christenpflicht," established in 1922, managed by Sister Elise Hochstettler. Most of the occupants are non-Mennonites.

The French Mennonites established a home for the aged at Valdoie near Belfort in 1953, operated by the Association Fraternelle Mennonite. C.K.

In the Netherlands there are two types of homes for the aged, those founded in the 17th and 18th centuries, and those established in recent times. The former, usually called "Hofje," were homes for the poor members of the church; most of them were founded by wealthy members of the church, sometimes named for their founders, and managed by a board in which both the founders or their descendants and the church board appointed their representatives. Now most of these homes are managed directly by the church boards. There are still a number of these homes: at Haarlem the Blokshofje, Bruiningshofje, Wijnbergshofje, and Zuiderhofje; at Leiden the Bethlehemhofje; at Amsterdam the Rijpenhofje, Zonshofje, De Lelie, and De Vogel; at Leeuwarden the Marcelis-Goverts Gasthuis, at Koog aan de Zaan the Johanna Elisabeth-stichting. Formerly there were more, but they have either been closed or merged with others.

In the 20th century a number of new Mennonite homes for the aged have been founded in the Netherlands; these were not in the first place meant for poor members, but for those for whom it was difficult, particularly after World War II, to obtain a proper residence. These new homes are Mooi-land at Doorwerth, near Arnhem, Doopsgezind Rusthuis at Bolsward, Doopsgezind Gasthuis en Hesselink-stichting, Doopsgezind Tehuis voor Ouderen, Doopsgezind Rusthuis, all three at Groningen; Johanna at Heerenveen, Spaar en Hout at Haarlem, Huize Salland, Colmschate near Deventer, and De Olyftack at Haarlem. Schaerweyde near Zeist, Avondzon at Velp near Arnhem and the Klokkenbelt at Almelo are operated in co-operation with other churches. In the near future other homes for the aged will be opened in the Netherlands, one near The Hague; others are planned. vdZ.

Menn. Bl., 1896, 87; 1902, 12; H. Görz, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Steinbach, 1950) 150; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 661-63; Um den Abend wird es licht (Neustadt); R. Hertzler and Fritz Hege, 3 Jahre Altersheim (Ludwigshafen, 1953); ML I, 38 f.

Home Mission Board of the General Conference Mennonite Church. One of the first acts of the small group that founded the G.C.M. Church in 1860 was to adopt a resolution: "That hereafter Home and Foreign Missions shall be carried on according to ability by our denomination." It took some time for the movement to gain momentum and strength. A foreign mission field was planned among the American Indians. In 1872 L. O. Schimmel of Pennsylvania, Ephraim Hunsberger of Ohio, and Christian Krehbiel of Kansas were appointed by Conference to look after the scattered churches and groups of Mennonites that needed shepherding. There was no united planning and so each one worked independently in his own region. The conference seemed to be satisfied with the start that was made. Perhaps because they were burdened by problems in other fields, the Home Mission Committee was permitted to lapse.

In 1878 conference considered it necessary to elect a new Home Mission Committee and engaged as a permanent worker in 1887 J. B. Baer, trained in Union Theological Seminary, New York. At the very next conference session Baer presented various concrete needs to the home congregations. His work in Manitoba, where he visited the hard-pressed immigrants, was indeed encouraging in that a new spirit of determination, evangelism, and devotion became apparent. Next Baer followed churches in Minnesota and the Dakotas, and on to the Pacific. In the strictest sense of the term, this was church extension work, rather than the conventional type of Home Mission work. Many churches in the Northern District and in the Pacific District (all the older churches) owe their start to Baer's wise and energetic direction. In order to share the joy of the fruits with the home churches, and to enlist their aid in prayers and gifts, Baer spent considerable time visiting all the older congregations.

During the past two decades the Board of Home Missions has carried on church extension work in rural and urban centers in the United States. Workers in addition to Baer were engaged from time to time. In some of the rural areas, congregations required aid for only a rather short time until they became self-supporting. City mission work was started in Chicago and Los Angeles and later in Hutchinson, Kan., and other places. It is a source of satisfaction that the congregations in the last two cities have become strong enough to stand alone and in turn help others through their gifts. A few rural stations were abandoned when the families moved elsewhere.

Canada. The northward and westward movements of Mennonites were also manifested in the Canadian Prairie Provinces. Some of the new settlements were formed by farmers from Manitoba and from the United States who were looking for cheaper land and more room. Because of the background of the German and Russian immigrants, congregations frequently had two or three ministers, the Board of Home Missions inaugurated the itinerant type of work since extra preachers were available. Most preachers in Canada were farmers and it was found to be comparatively easy for them to spend part time in visiting smaller scattered settlements. In the earlier days economic conditions were uncertain; so in order to help needy ministers the Board of Home Missions engaged men and paid them the equivalent of three months' full pay, divided into 12 monthly payments. Many congregations in the large Canadian District are indebted to the Board of Home Missions for aiding them in getting established.

In Canada city mission work took a unique course. Mission churches and girls' homes developed hand in hand in Winnipeg, Man.; Saskatoon, Sask.; Calgary, Alberta; and Vancouver, B.C. The long winters and the need to earn money to repay obligations forced many families to move to these cities. Canadian Mennonite families are usually large, and in many homes girls could work out to earn money to help with the family needs or repay the travel debt. Jobs are located through the matrons of the homes. From the time a girl arrives in the city and comes to the girls' home, the matron plays the part of mother. Thursday evenings the girls usually spend socially in the home, with an hour of Bible study conducted by the pastor of the local mission church. The missions and the girls' homes are a blessing to each other and the result is a faster growing city congregation and many a Christian home is established through the channels of these girls' homes.

During the large Canadian immigration 1923-30, when 20,201 came, every phase of Home Mission work had to be intensified and some new phases of work had to be opened. The Board of Home Missions sent special workers into Canada to assist in church music and young people's work for a number of years. Canadian Mennonites responded quickly to the musical training, and in 1952 a Canadian music leader paid a return visit to some United States communities. The young people responded well through their Provincial Retreats. A goodly number of decisions for mission work and full-time Christian service have been made the last five years. Today the first of these are already on their way into our Foreign Mission fields and others are filling pulpits and other places of leadership.

The Board of Home Missions has felt deeply convinced that the best investment is to help small and young groups to grow in grace, faith, and numbers, so that in due time they might in turn be the ones to help furnish their portion in the prayer and finance support for our whole conference program. A strong home base makes a far outreach for Christ possible.

South America. Mennonites in South America, except the Old Colony groups from Canada, are all refugees from Russia or the Danzig areas, either from World War I or II. Approximately 40 per cent of these Mennonites lean toward or already belong to the General Conference. Being refugees, they are naturally short in funds, and it is most essential to aid them in their economic as well as spiritual life. The Mennonite Central Committee is definitely committed to extending economic aid, while the different conferences help with the establishing and maintaining of schools, Bible schools, and general church work. Pioneering is always difficult in each of the countries where our Mennonites have settled, but since Paraguay has been held back by stronger neighbor-nations, it is most difficult here. Testimonies have come to the Board again and again that, if it had not been for the spiritual aid given in the form of German literature, along devotional lines, visits from leaders in North America, they would have felt like giving up. A warm and vibrant faith in Christ strengthens and steadies in any circumstance of life. Much has been done in the past years, but much still remains to be done. Our aim in giving aid has always been to help them to help themselves in their spiritual and economic conquest. Ministers are given part salary for their service so that they can hire help to tend their farms, when they do church work. Without this undergirding, many would be unable to give the needed time or effort to do the spiritual work the Lord called them to render. Students are aided to get theological training. Aid is also given when a new church is to be built.

New Phases of Work. For a number of years, members of the Home Mission Board felt that the conference should do its part in endeavoring to ease tension conditions in certain areas of our country. We have entered the southern mountain area to bring the Gospel to the neglected people in this region by establishing some mission stations and doing Bible story and memory work with children in the public schools. A special phase of the children's work is the annual camp held in the summer months. Large numbers of children take part in these camps and it is encouraging to know that many decisions for Christ have been made and others indicate a desire to become full-time Christian workers. City work, where problems are innumerable, was undergirded by sending summer volunteer workers to help in conducting summer Bible schools and in directing recreational work. We have also been helping in the "larger city parish plan," where many workers join hands in making a united onslaught against the forces of evil. In a large city a single worker is often almost swallowed up, even though he may be doing an excellent piece of work. An effort has also been made in certain cities to form Mennonite fellowships, by bringing Mennonites from different branches together for worship and getting acquainted. Fellowships are often made up of students, individual Mennonite workers in these cities, and also some families who have come to the city to pursue some specialized line of work. In recent years one of these Mennonite fellowships has developed into a congregation. The dire need of our large migrant population was another call, which was answered by securing two trailers and workers to labor among the cotton workers in Arizona. In 1950 the new General Conference constitution was adopted and all General Conference mission work was put under the Board of Missions. The men who served on the Board of Home Missions in the past 25 years, 1925-50, are, W. S. Gottshall, A. S. Shelly, J. E. Amstutz, David Toews, S. S. Baumgartner, J. M. Regier added in 1925, H. A. Fast in 1932, A. J. Neuenschwander in 1935, John J. Plenert in 1938, W. Harley King in 1941, C. E. Krehbiel in 1945, G. G. Epp in 1947, Ben Esch in 1947. A.J.N.

Home Missions Board of the General Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America (officially Board of Home Missions) serves as an advisory and co-ordinating body. The conference statistical work is assigned to this Board. For more effective work in the field of home missions the conference is divided into four district areas and all the home missions activities are assigned to the district conferences. All of the churches in Canada compose one district and the United States is divided into three district areas.

The organization for home missions in the four districts is very similar and the activities are the same in all: (1) co-ordinating of the program for the traveling evangelists in the member churches; (2) establishment and maintenance of city missions in larger cities of our land; (3) extension service by conducting Sunday schools, vacation Bible schools, etc., in the immediate neighborhood of our churches. This latter has resulted in the establishment of a number of mission chapels in the various districts, which are expected eventually to become self-supporting member churches.

Some of the districts have a three-member board; others have three-member committees for each major activity, which together comprise the District Board for Home Missions. The total budget for home missions of the four districts is (1953) approximately $100,000 annually. A.A.Sch.

Homestead Mennonite Church (MC) 1911-14, in Benzie Co., Mich., now extinct, was organized by Bishop J. P. Miller of Kent Co., Mich., who placed Deacon Harvey Sarver in charge of the congregation. The membership was 15, mostly from Middlebury, Ind., and Kenmare, N.D. Sarver served a year, 1912-13; and was succeeded by John M. Yoder who served in 1913-14 as minister and then also moved away. The Homestead congregation participated in union Sunday-school and church services and had no building of its own, although organized as a congregation. The year 1918 marked the departure of the last Mennonite family from the area. J.C.W.

Homeville Mennonite Mission meets in a formerly unused church near Cochranville, Chester Co., Pa., where in 1945 the Millwood District of Lancaster Conference opened a mission outpost. The membership (1953) is 37, the Sunday-school enrollment 85 with an average attendance of 69, and a summer Bible school of 114. The minister is Ephraim Nafziger, and John A. Kennel and LeRoy Stoltzfus are the bishops. Kennett Square is now an outpost of Homeville. I.D.L.

Homma, Wilhelm Jacobs, a preacher of the "Lam en Toren" Mennonite congregation at Amsterdam in 1681-d.1705; particulars about this man were not available. Long's assertion that Homma translated the New Testament from the Greek into the Dutch language has been proved to be an error. Homma was the editor of two translations from the Greek into the Dutch, of A. Boreel's translation of Matthew and Romans (Amsterdam, 1693) and of R. Rooleeuw's translation of the New Testament (Amsterdam, 1694). vdZ.

Izaac le Long, Boekzaal der Nederlandsche Bybels (1732) 843; Biogr. Wb. IV, 197 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1682.

Hondscho(o)te, a town (pop. 2,800) in Flanders, during the 16th century belonging to the Southern Netherlands, now in France. In the 16th century its population was much larger than now, and the town was an important center of wool weaving. There was once a Mennonite congregation here, which supplied a number of martyrs. In 1558 a young man named Wouter was burned at the stake. Four years later seven were seized, apparently when a religious meeting was surprised. Five of them were burned; two married women were secretly drowned in 1562. Their names were Karel van den Velde of Gent and his wife Proentgen, Frans de Swarte of Bailleul and his wife Klaesken, Jasper de Schoenmaker, Charlo de Wael, unmarried, and Martijntgen Amare (Mart. Mir. D 297, E 663). The last was without doubt the Martijntgen Aelmeers (q.v.) whom van Braght mentions as a martyr. In Veelderhande Liedekens is found a song on her death, "Genade ende vrede moet godvreezende zijn." Her brother Nicasen was also burned at Brugge in 1562. In 1587 the preacher Christiaen de Rycke was seized. He had previously been active in Leiden. A booklet of 15 letters written by his hand is reprinted in part in the Martyrs' Mirror (D 757 ff., E 1063 ff.). He was burned at the stake April 7, 1558.

Jacob de Rore (q.v.) addressed his fifth letter to the congregation of Hondschote. Of this congregation not much is known. It may have existed about 1540-87. A letter of Adriaen van Kortrijk, deacon or preacher of Gent, addressed to the congregation of Antwerp about 1545, is also signed by the congregation of Hondschote. This letter says that the congregations are "young" and want visits of an elder.

In 1561, when the congregation of Ypres (Ieper) had been destroyed by the drastic measures of the inquisitor Titelman (q.v.), its members fled partly to Armentières, partly to Hondschote. As has been said, Christiaen de Rycke was for some time its preacher. After his arrest the congregation may have been destroyed or its members moved to other towns. In the Frisian-Flemish troubles the congregation of Hondschote took the side of the Flemish and was very rigorous as to banning and shunning. K.V., vdZ.

Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 439; A. L. E. Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.; ML II, 342.

Hondt, Vincent de, an elder of the Mennonite Church at Haarlem, Netherlands, who in 1620 by his implacable attitude caused a division among the Old Flemish or "Huiskopers" (q.v.), who had already been weakened by the secession of the "Bankroetiers" (q.v.). Vincent de Hondt put out of the church a young man who had illicit relations with his fiancee. His copreacher Lucas Filips did not agree with de Hondt's act. This led to a division. Part of the congregation remained loyal to de Hondt. Attempts at reconciliation made by Claes Claesz (q.v.), a true apostle of peace, failed (Propositie of Voorstelling dat de eens geloofsgezinde Christenen niet behooren gescheiden te blijven, Haarlem, 1634). Equally unsuccessful was a letter, Vredesbode . . . , sent by numerous delegates from the churches assembled at Utrecht in 1633 and presented with the Propositie. Among Vincent de Hondt's writings were Korte Bekentenisse des Geloofs (1626, n.p.; 2d ed. Haarlem, 1630) and Een korte en grondige Verklaring van de vrede Godts (Haarlem, 1732). A treatise by de Hondt on the Trinity, the office of the ministers, baptism, the church, the Lord's Supper, marriage, the magistracy, shunning, etc., is found in Christelyck Huys-boeck (1643) by J. de Buyser (q.v.).

Vincent de Hondt's group at Haarlem, at first usually called "Vincent de Hondt-volk," merged with the Danzig Old Flemish about 1760. vdZ.

BRN VII, passim; DB 1863, 58, 135, 156; Biogr. Wb. IV, 225 f.; 1876, 35; 1898, 6; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 319; idem, Groningen I, 63; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 571; ML II, 342.

Honert, Jan van den (1693-1758) (son of Taco Hajo van den Honert, who was a Reformed preacher and a professor of theology at the University of Leiden), was a Dutch Reformed clergyman 1719-27 at Katwijk, Enkhuizen, and Haarlem, then professor of theology at the University of Utrecht 1727-34 and the University of Leiden 1734-58, achieved some importance for the Mennonites of Holland through the pen war he carried on (1740-42) with Johannes Stinstra against Stinstra's defense of religious freedom. Van den Honert charged Stinstra with Socinianism (q.v.), and Stinstra repudiated the charge. It was certainly the work of van den Honert that the government of Friesland on Jan. 13, 1742, suspended Stinstra from service and suppressed his book, Natuur en gesteldheid van Christus koningrijk. With all respect for the scholarship of men like Hoornbeek and van den Honert, the impression remains that witch-hunting and tracking down unorthodox Socinian views among Mennonites became second nature to them. vdZ.

DB 1868, 62, 64 f.; N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 816; Biogr. Wb. IV, 226-32; 233-46; Glasius, Biographisch Woordenboek II, 144 f. Chr. Sepp, Johannes Stinstra en zijn Tijd (2 vv., Amsterdam, 1865, 1866); W. J. Kühler, Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1912) 264-67; ML II, 342.

Honich, Tymen Claesz, b. about 1550, d. between 1605 and 1612, was a follower of Robert Robbertsz (q.v.). He may have been a sailor. He apparently lived at Amsterdam as a member of the Frisian congregation, from which he was banned because of marrying a nonmember of the group. He published some pamphlets: Eene grondelijcke verklaringhe van den echtelijcken staet (about 1591), in which he defended intermarriage; in his Gedeeltheyt der Tongen int leeren vant Ampt der Overheyt (1596) he defends his view that no church is the true Christian church; his Christalijnen Bril (1602, repr. 1612) sharply attacks the Calvinist ministers Geldorp and Bogerman, who had insisted that the government persecute the Mennonites. vdZ.

Honig (formerly also Honigh and Honingh) is the name of one of the oldest and best-known Mennonite merchant families of the Zaan district of the Dutch province of North Holland. The earlier members were principally engaged in the manufacture of paper and oil pressing. In Koog a.d. Zaan there is still a large Honig plant for the manufacture of starch, flour, soups, and other products.

Jan Symons Honigh is named in the 17th century as a paper manufacturer at Koog aan de Zaan. His grandson Jacob Cornelisz Honigh at Zaandijk was likewise a manufacturer of paper and at the same time a shipowner in the whaling industry. With three older members of the united Waterland and Flemish Mennonites at Koog and Zaandijk he formed a committee to take charge of the erection of a new church, which is still used. In 1692 he was chosen deacon, an office which many of his descendants have filled, down to the present. One of his descendants, Jan Jacobsz Honigh (1792-1863), deacon and secretary of the consistory, did valuable work in the church archives.

Klaas Jansz Honig, b. July 6, 1769, at Zaandijk, was made substitute preacher of the Koog and Zaandijk congregation, Oct. 18, 1792. To commemorate this event a silver coin was struck with the inscription, "De ware wijsheid is de kennis van God; De beste wegen zijn, o Jeugd, die van wijsheid en van deugd, 1792." On June 23, 1793, he was called to preach for the congregation at Oude Sluis (Noord Zijpe). On June 15, 1794, he accepted a call from the church at Purmerend, where he died, March 10, 1832. By his competence and his virtuous character he won general respect and affection. He was a zealous member of the organization, Tot Nut van't Algemeen. In addition to the sermon he preached on the occasion of the thirtieth anniversary of the settlement of Purmerend in honor of this charitable association on May 2, 1814, he published Redevoering over het Nut van Heuchlijke gebeurtenissen plegtiglyk te herdenken (N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 821; Biogr. Wb. IV, 247).

Jan Jansz Honig, Jr., b. May 27, 1847, at Koog aan de Zaan, attended the Mennonite seminary in Amsterdam (1866-71), was made preacher of the church at Poppingawier in 1871, in Baard in 1873, and in Balk in 1875. From 1899 to his death he was a member of the directorate of the A.D.S. as the representative of the Friesche Sociëteit. He died at Balk on March 17, 1902. J. J. Honig wrote in the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen the articles, "Het Gezangboek der Gemeente te Balk voor 1854" (1887); "Een Zondagmiddag onder de fijne Mennisten te Balk" (1892); "Reizen naar de Eeuwigheid" (1896); "Bij het Portret van Mej. T. R. Haitjema" (1902).

Meindert Honigh, a member of a younger branch of the family, the son of a farmer near Purmerend, studied at the Mennonite seminary in Amsterdam (1892-96), in 1897 was made preacher of the congregation at Uithuizen, and in 1900 went to Franeker, where he served until his death. He published the following: Leerboek der Formeele Logica, bewerkt naar de dictaten van wijlen Prof. Dr. C. Bellaar Spruyt (Haarlem, 1903); Feestrede ter gelegenheid van het 100jarig Bestaan van het Departement Franeker der Mij. Tot Nut van't Algemeen, 1809-1909; "De oudere en de jongere generatie," Tijdschr. Teekenen des Tijds, 1909; "De Toekomstige Eeuw de Psychologie," Tijdschr. Teekenen des Tijds, 1911; "De jongste proeve van idealistische philosophie in ons vaderland," Teylers Theolog. Tijdschr., 1911.

Gerrit Jan Honig (b. 1864), lived at Zaandijk, a deacon of the congregation of Koog-Zaandijk and representative of this congregation in the A.D.S. (Dutch General Conference) for 30 years, had published a large number of articles on the history of the Zaan district and also on the Mennonites in this region. Gerrit Honig of Zaandam was the first secretary (appointed in 1926) of the Doopsgezinde Jongeren Bond (Dutch Youth Association) and a founder of the Elfregi (q.v.) Youth group at Zaandam in 1929. He is also a deacon of West Zaandam and a member of the A.D.S. (ML II, 343.) G.J.H., vdZ.

Honnoré, Jan, a Dutch Mennonite of Amsterdam, was a son of Abraham Honnoré and like his father a deacon of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation. Abraham Honnoré (d. 1680) served 1676-80 and Jan 1695-1700, 1707-13, and 1719-25. Jan Honnoré was a member of the Dutch Committee of Foreign Needs, in which he took an important place as treasurer; the Amsterdam Mennonite archives contain a number of documents bearing witness to his activities on behalf of the suppressed brethren in the Palatinate, Switzerland, Prussia, and Lithuania. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1211, 1360.) vdZ.

Honorius (384-423), Emperor of Rome, became the first emperor of the Western Roman Empire at the age of eleven, upon the death of his father, Theodosius I (d. 395). He was educated monastically and was later completely controlled by his surroundings. During his childhood the church acquired its great influence on legislation. Only two months after he assumed the reign the bishops were given jurisdiction over ecclesiastical affairs and heresy (q.v.) was declared a civil crime. Severe measures were undertaken to suppress the Manichaeans and Pelagians (Buchberger, 2016).

A law passed in 413 in the reign of Theodosius II of the Eastern Roman Empire, who succeeded his father on May 1, 408, as a seven-year-old, forbidding rebaptism, was used by the Protestant theologians of the 16th century to suppress the Anabaptists. In their official opinions to the rulers the German reformers advocated punishing Anabaptists with death; this was done by Luther, Melanchthon, Bugenhagen, and Cruciger in their opinion of Landgrave Philip of Hesse, on June 5, 1536 (Hochhuth, 563), and Urban Rhegius on the same occasion (Hochhuth, 575); also Dr. Eisermann at the diet at Cassel, Aug. 7, 1536.

The decree of the two emperors specifies, "If anyone is denounced or seized in baptizing again any of the servants of the Christian Church, he shall be punished with death together with the one who has carried out this criminal act, in so far as the one who was persuaded is by his age capable of crime." Thus there was no consideration of a universal punishment of a repetition of baptism. Johannes Brenz had as early as 1528 in his Unterricht Philips Melanchthon widder die leere der Widderteuffer stressed that this imperial decree did not have reference to all Christians who were baptized a second time, but only to servants of the church; the regulation was merely intended to prevent a repetition of baptism in those cases where the baptism already administered was beyond doubt. This was assumed as certain in the case of church officials. That many members of the church at that time were uncertain whether or not they had actually been baptized in infancy is seen in the discussions of the fifth council of Carthage in 401. It was decided here that all who did not definitely know that they had been baptized should be baptized again (Sachsse, 37).

A regulation similar to that of Honorius and Theodosius had already been issued by the emperors Valentinianus (d. 375) and Gratianus (d. 383), which specified, "We hold as unworthy of the priestly office the bishop who has improperly rebaptized" (Brenz). But the terrorizing method of capital punishment was not yet employed. HEGE.

Buchberger, Kirchliches Handlexicon, 1907; J. Hartmann, Joh. Brenz (Hamburg, 1840) 304; K. W. H. Hochhuth, "Mitteilungen aus der protestantischen Secten-Geschichte in der hessischen Kirche," in Ztscht für die hist. Theol., 1858; Carl Sachsse, D. Balthasar Hubmaier als Theologe (Berlin, 1914); W. Sohm, Territorium und Reformation in der hessischen Geschichte 1526-1555 (Marburg, 1915); Codex Theodosianus, Book 16, chap. 6 (Ne sanctum baptismaiteretur); ML II, 343 f.

Hont, Vincent de: see Hondt, Vincent de.

Hoofddorp: see Haarlemmermeer.

Hoofman, a Dutch Mennonite family, formerly found at Haarlem, where they were businessmen and members of the Mennonite Church, both Flemish and Waterlanders. Many of them served as deacons or were trustees of the Mennonite orphanages and old people's homes (Hofjes). Cornelis Hoofman (b. 1672 at Haarlem) studied law at the University of Leiden and founded a trading post and a banking house at Königsberg, East Prussia. He also wrote some Dutch plays. His sister Elisabeth Hoofman (b. 1664 at Haarlem), married to Pieter Koolart, published a number of poems in the Dutch language. She died at Kassel, Germany, in 1734, where her husband had established a bank. (Church records of Haarlem; N.N.B.Wb. IV, 770 f., 857 f.) vdZ.

Hoog, Isaac Marius Jacob (1860-1928), was a Dutch Reformed minister. He was the author of De Martelaren der Hervorming in Nederland tot 1566 (Schiedam, 1885) and "Onze Martelaren," in Ned. Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis I (1902) 82-116. Both publications are of high value for the history of Anabaptist martyrology. vdZ.

Hoogduitse Doopsgezinden, or Hoogduitschers: see High German Mennonites.

Hoogeveen, Dutch province of Drenthe, where a Mennonite fellowship group (Kring) was founded in 1946; in 1954 it numbered eleven members and was served by the pastor of Meppel. Services are held in the Remonstrant church four times a year. vdZ.

Hoogezand, a town in the Dutch province of Groningen, which, together with the adjoining town of Sappemeer (q.v.), is the seat of a Mennonite congregation. (The history of this congregation will be found under Sappemeer.) In the town of Hoogezand and vicinity Mennonite farmers settled early in the 17th century. In 1711 a number of Swiss Mennonite immigrant families settled at Hoogezand, at near-by Kalkwijk and about 1721 nine Mennonite families moved from Deventer to Hoogezand. (DB 1919, 74-76, 96-109.) vdZ.

Hooghe, Romein de (1645-1708), a Dutch artist who made a portrait of Menno Simons, which is found in a Dutch edition of Gottfried Arnold, Historie der Kerken en Ketteren (Amsterdam, 1701; Vol. II, page 533). This engraving by de Hooghe seems to have followed a portrait by an unknown artist, made after 1650. (DB 1890, 71; 1916, 99.) vdZ.

Hooghveldt (Hoogvelt), Robbert van, was a preacher of the Flemish Mennonite congregation of Utrecht in the Netherlands 1646-63. He held stern views concerning banning and intermarriage and in 1659 disagreed with his copreachers Willem van Maurik, Goris van Aldendorp, Arent van Heuven, Johan (Jan) Andries van Aken, and a number of deacons, who took a more moderate view. The troubles led to the excommunication of van Maurik and the other moderate preachers and to a division in the congregation, which was not healed until 1675. In these quarrels van Hooghveldt played an important but not very fair part. He denounced his antagonists to the city government, accusing them of Socinianism, and invoked the help of the Reformed pastors against them.

During this conflict van Hooghveldt published the following writings: Korte doch Noodighe Waerschouwinghe . . . (n.p., 1659); Copye van de Beschulding . . . (n.p., n.d.); Kort verhael van 'tgene verhandelt is . . . (Utrecht, 1661); Kort bericht . . . (Leeuwarden, 1669).

The Hoogvelt family is also found in Amsterdam; some of them served as deacons in the Lamist Mennonite congregation in the 17th and 18th centuries. (DB 1916, 152-88, passim; Biogr. Wb. IV, 266 f.) vdZ.

Hoogkarspel, a town in the Dutch province of North Holland, where Leenaert Bouwens baptized 35 persons in 1563-65. This large number indicates the existence of a Mennonite congregation in this town, of which, however, nothing is known and in any case dissolved before 1650. vdZ.

Hoogkerk, a town in the Dutch province of Groningen, five miles west of the city of Groningen. Here and in surrounding villages of Leegkerk, Dorkwerd, and Adorp the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs bought and rented some farms in 1711 for Swiss immigrants. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 1097; J. Huizinga, Stamboek . . . van Samuel Peter en Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890) 43 f., 57, 77 f., 105 f.

Hoogmade, van, a Dutch Mennonite family belonging to the Waterlander congregation at Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland. Gerrit Frankensz van Hoogmade, a merchant, in 1630 founded Bethlehem, a home for the aged, which he gave to the Waterlander congregation. His son Salomon Gerritsz van Hoogmade was a deacon of this congregation, as were some of his descendants. vdZ.

L. G. le Poole, Bijdrage tot de kennis van . . . de Doopsgezinden . . . te Leiden (Leiden, 1905) 50 et passim.

Hoogsaet (Hooghsaet), a Dutch Mennonite family of Amsterdam in the 17th century. Cornelis Claesz, at first a sailor and later a wood-dealer at Amsterdam, assumed the family name of his mother, who was a daughter of the Mennonite preacher Dirck Pietersz van Nierop (q.v.). His son Jan Cornelisz Hoogsaet, b. 1654 at Amsterdam, d. there about December 1733, was a painter and though he is not much known, he was very popular during his lifetime and received important assignments, e.g., he worked in the Amsterdam town hall (now Royal Palace). Catharina Hoogsaet, another grandchild of Dirck Pietersz van Nierop (daughter of Jan Dircksz Hoogsaet, who was a maker of compasses), married to Hendrik Jacobsz Rooleeuw, preacher of the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation 1626 until his death in 1656, was painted by Rembrandt in 1657.

Jan Ysbrandtsz Hoogsaet, a well-known shipbuilder, who was baptized in the Waterland congregation of Amsterdam in 1743, was likely also a grandson of Dirck Pietersz van Nierop. (N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 829 f.) vdZ.

Hoogstraten, Anthony Lalaing, Duke of (1480-1540), one of the confidential agents and co-operators of Charles V, was in 1522 appointed stadholder of the provinces of Holland and Zeeland, in 1528 also of Utrecht. Being an orthodox Catholic he was a violent opponent of heresies; he especially took severe measures to extirpate the Anabaptist movement at Amsterdam in 1534-35. vdZ.

J. S. Theissen, De regeering van Karel V in de Nederlanden (1912) passim; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 90, 134-36.

Hoogstraten, Dirk van (1596-1640) and his brother Samuel, two Dutch painters. Dirk was a grandson of François van Hoogstraten, who emigrated from Antwerp, Belgium, on account of his Mennonitism and settled in Dordrecht, Dutch province of South Holland, where Dirk was born. Dirk was one of the few painters who joined the Anabaptists. He was at first a silversmith, but after a journey through Germany he felt drawn to painting and engraving. Of his works only a few have been preserved. One of his pictures, "Mary and her Mother and the Christ child," is in the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam. Dirk van Hoogstraten was the father and teacher of the better-known painter Samuel van Hoogstraten (born in 1627 at Dordrecht, d. there 1678), who was also a disciple of Rembrandt. On a long voyage in 1651-54 he visited Rome and also Vienna. In 1662-66 he was often in London. Dutch and foreign picture galleries possess pictures painted by him. He was the author of Inleyding tot de hooge Schoole der Schilderkonst, anders de zichtbare werelt (Rotterdam, 1678). He also was the author of a songbook and two tragedies. He was a member of the Dordrecht Mennonite congregation until he was banned for marrying outside the brotherhood. He then joined the Reformed Church. Frans van Hoogstraten, a son of Samuel, was a bookdealer in Rotterdam; he too left the Mennonites about 1660 to become a Roman Catholic. Jan and David van Hoogstraten, sons of Frans, who were respectively a bookdealer at Gouda and a medical doctor and senior master of a Latin school at Amsterdam, are known as poets. vdZ.

W. Martin, De Hollandsche Schilderkunst in de 17e Eeuw II (3rd ed., Amsterdam, 1944) 299 f., et passim; G. Kalff, Gesch. der Nederl. Letterkunde (Groningen, 1910) IV, 483, 568, 570; ML I, 467 f.; II, 344; N.N.B.Wb. IV, 779; VIII, 831 f., 833, 836-38.

Hooley (Hoelly, Holly), a Swiss family name occurring among the Mennonites of America. Among the immigrants bearing this name were two brothers, Michael and Andreas Hooley, the latter having with him a son John, who arrived in Pennsylvania (Philadelphia) Nov. 3, 1750. Andreas was an Amish Mennonite, and located in what is now Lebanon County, Pa. His son John (1739-1805) married Catherine Blank, and lived for a time in Berks County, Pa., later in Mifflin County, Pa. He was an Amish Mennonite preacher. Some of his descendants later (1844) settled at West Liberty, Ohio. The Hooley family is now found in many states, chiefly Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Missouri, and Oregon. Among the ordained members of the family may be mentioned Joseph Y. Hooley, a deacon ordained in the Forks, Ind., congregation (MC) in 1906, and Orvin H. Hooley, minister ordained in the Locust Grove, Mich., congregation (MC) in 1945. A German immigrant named Holly, who came from Hesse, served as one of the early ministers in the Tiskilwa, Ill., congregation (MC), possibly in the 1840's. J.C.W.

Hoop, de, a Dutch Mennonite family, originally from Workum, province of Friesland, where they were lumber merchants and owners of a lumber mill called "de Hoop" (the hope), from which they took their family name. Jan Douwes de Hoop played a role in the "Patriot" disturbances about 1785 and later moved to Harlingen. He had been a deacon at Workum. His son Douwe (1800-30), was an artist of promise. Taedse Jakles de Hoop, b. at Workum 1753, also was a member of this family. He studied at the University of Franeker and the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and then served the congregation of West Zaandam Oude Huis for nearly 62 years, 1777- d. 1838. vdZ.

DB 1905, 24 ff., 38, 41; S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 162; Biogr. Wb. IV, 269 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 1749 f.; Hulde aan T. J. de Hoop, bij gelegenheid van het 50-jarig jubelfeest van deszelfs predikdienst (Zaandam, 1827); a funeral sermon by B. van Geuns, Herinneringen aan T. J. de Hoop (Amsterdam, 1838).

Hoop Scheffer, Jacob Gijsbert de, b. Sept. 28, 1819, at the Hague, d. Dec. 31, 1894, at Amsterdam. His parents were not Mennonites, though his grandmother was Aagje Houttuyn (of Hoorn) of the well-known Mennonite Houttuyn (q.v.) family. From his fourth year, after his father had died, he was educated by a relative, Jacob de Hoop, whose family name was added to that of young Jacob Gijsbert, his father only bearing the name Johannes Scheffer. He studied theology at the universities of Leiden and Utrecht and the Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam. In 1843 he was appointed ministerial candidate and soon answered a call of the Mennonite congregation of Hoorn to be its minister. He served at Hoorn 1843-46, Groningen 1846-49, and Amsterdam 1849-60. In this year he became a professor of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, teaching exegesis of the Old and New Testaments, Mennonite history and homiletics. In 1877, when the Athenaeum (Latin School) of Amsterdam became a university, de Hoop Scheffer was also appointed professor of this university and called to teach church history. He resigned in 1890.

In his youth de Hoop Scheffer was much interested in Dutch mdieval literature and published a number of literary papers. In 1860 he took up his professorship with an address in Latin: De providentia divina Teleiobaptistas Neerlandicos ab exitio vindicante (The Divine Providence Protecting the Dutch Mennonites from Extinction), a revised translation of which was published in Dutch in 1861: De Doopsgezinde broederschap in Nederland voor vervloeiing en ondergang bewaard. His most important publication was a book published at Amsterdam in 1873, Geschiedenis der Kerkhervorming in Nederland van Haar ontstaan tot 1531, of which a German translation (by P. Gerlach) appeared in 1886: Geschichte der Reformation in den Niederlanden von ihrem Beginn bis zum Jahre 1531. De Hoop Scheffer's paper of 1881 on the Brownists (q.v.) at Amsterdam: De Brownisten te Amsterdam gedurende de eerste tijd na hunne vestiging, in verband met het ontstaan van de Broederschap der Baptisten, is still of outstanding significance. This study, edited by W. E. Griffis, appeared in 1922 at Ithaca, N.Y., under the title History of the Free Churches, called the Brownists, Pilgrim Fathers and Baptists in the Dutch Republic 1581-1701. But the most important field of de Hoop Scheffer's study was the history of the Mennonites, especially of the early period of Dutch Anabaptism and Mennonitism, on which he published a large number of papers in the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen; the most extensive of these papers is the study on "'t Verbond der vier Steden" in DB 1893.

De Hoop Scheffer, who also was director of the Amsterdam Mennonite Library, compiled in two volumes a catalog of this library, which appeared in Amsterdam in 1885 and 1888. He also worked on the Mennonite archives and compiled a catalog, Inventaris van Archiefstukken, berustende bij de Vereenigde Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Amsterdam (2 volumes, Amsterdam, 1883-84).

In 1870-93 he was editor of the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen. In 1852-94 he was a member of the board of the A.D.S. He was a member of a number of learned associations, such as the Society of Dutch Literature and the Royal Dutch Academy of Science. His learning was recognized by the University of Leiden, which honored him with the degree of Doctor Theologiae honoris causa in 1870.

His grandson J. G. de Hoop Scheffer (b. 1884), a lawyer and bank manager at Amsterdam, was a member of the A.D.S. 1929-55; in 1929-51 he was its treasurer, and 1946-51 a member of the board of the Mennonite Seminary. vdZ.

De Zondagsbode, Jan. 7, 14, 21, 1894; P. Feenstra Jr., Wettig gekroond, a memorial sermon preached in the Amsterdam Singel Church on Jan. 7, 1894; A. Winkler Prins, Levensbericht van J. G. de Hoop Scheffer (Leiden, 1894); H. C. Rogge, Levensbericht van Jacob Gijsbert de Hoop Scheffer (Amsterdam, 1895); N.N.B.Wb. III, 1129 f.; DB 1894, 1-10; 1901, 34 f.; DJ 1904, 21-29.

Hoorn, a Dutch city (1947 pop., 13,420, with 209 Mennonites) on the former Zuiderzee in the province of North Holland, is the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Little is known of its early history. No church records were kept until 1706, when the Waterlander congregation began one. Presumably there were advocates of adult baptism in Hoorn before 1550. The chronicler of Hoorn recorded that on June 7, 1535, five Anabaptists, including some women, were put to death on account of their faith. In 1542-43 the Anabaptists of Hoorn organized a congregation, which was visited by Menno Simons on his journey through North Holland. The noted elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 25 persons in 1551-56. The congregation grew rapidly from the influx of refugees from the rest of Holland and Zeeland, among them many shippers and merchants. Leenaert Bouwens is said to have stopped here 12 times in 1556-67 and to have baptized a total of 165 young people.

In 1566, when the wave of iconoclasm broke out, the Catholic authorities passed very severe measures and limited the freedom of the Anabaptists in holding services. Unfortunately divisions were taking place here as elsewhere in the country. Tradition says that there were 13 different groups of Anabaptists in Hoorn. A deacon who was born in 1677 relates that at his time there were only six left. They had the following names: Frisian; Old Frisians or Jan Jacobsgezinden (after their founder Jan Jacobsz); Waterlanders (practiced footwashing); Flemish; High Germans; and "Plempschen" (probably so called because their church stood on a canal that had been filled [geplempst]; these "Plempschen" were also called the "Pieter Jansz Twisck gezinden" after their elder, P. J. Twisck, q.v.); the Rijnsburger Collegiants (who had much in common with the Anabaptists and whose meetings were also attended by many Mennonites); the name "Robbertgezinde" also occurs, whose founder in 1590 was a teacher of sailing and a printer of books in Hoorn.

Attempts to bring about a union had of course been made, at least by a few groups. In 1566 such an attempt was made by Jan Willemsz and Lubbert Gerritsz, elders of the Frisian and Flemish congregations. It failed and was repeated in 1576, again in vain. Union was not achieved until 1692.

In 1724 the Pieter Jansz Twisck group or Old Frisians united with the Frisians. From then on, there were only two congregations—a Waterlander and a Frisian—whose relations were friendly. In 1698 the Waterlanders invited the Frisians to cooperate in merging their services, so that the members of both groups could attend services in both churches. This suggestion was rejected, but was successfully repeated in 1706. In 1723 a Frisian elder had charge of the worship of the Waterlander congregation. An attempt made in 1727 to unite the congregations failed, although the elders of both congregations were holding baptismal and communion services in both churches. On Dec. 17, 1747, the two congregations were merged, with Jacob Fortuyn as preacher and Cornelis Ris as elder. Beginning in 1700 the membership had greatly receded, partly because the city was declining, and partly on account of indifference.

Although the Frisian and Waterlander congregations had united, they kept their own churches until 1800, when there was danger that the less used of the two would be used for military training purposes. The nonresistant Mennonites would have nothing to do with such a cause, and tore down their church. The remaining church, which belonged to the Frisians, stood until 1865, when it was replaced. The membership in 1931 was 200.

Formerly Hoorn was an important center of Mennonitism, both by its large membership and its influential leaders. Jan Willemsz and Lubbert Gerritsz of Hoorn were called to Harlingen (q.v.) in 1567 in a futile attempt to settle the conflict between the Frisian and the Flemish Mennonites; a large conference of North Holland leaders was held in Hoorn 1568, where the conduct of Dirk Philips, who had banned Willemsz and Gerritsz, was censured; in 1576 a number of elders and preachers of the Waterlanders met at Hoorn to make peace with the Frisians—a fruitless effort; a meeting of the principal leader of the Old Frisians, Pieter Jansz Twisck, elder at Hoorn, and some conservative Flemish leaders took place here in 1622.

The Waterlander congregation of Hoorn was more conservative than Waterlander congregations usually were. It laid much stress upon the confession and took measures to keep out of the pulpit the preachers from outside who sympathized with Collegiantism. After the congregation had united with the Frisians, its preachers published a booklet for the catechumens Vraagen over de Grondwaarheden des Christelijken Geloofs, . . . (Hoorn, 1768). Shortly before (1766) the elder of Hoorn, Cornelis Ris (q.v.), had produced a Confession, approved by the Zonist (q.v.) Mennonite Conference.

In the 18th century after the union of Waterlanders and Frisians the congregation was a member both of the Frisian Conference of North Holland and the Zonist Conference. Important preachers in that century were Pieter Beets, Peter Houttuyn, Willem Houttuyn, Adriaen Houttuyn, Jan Beets, Jacob Houttuyn, Cornelis Ris, and Jacob Spits, who was the last unsalaried minister of Hoorn. He died in 1810, at the age of 90 years.

Notwithstanding these prominent preachers the membership declined considerably, both because of the decline of Hoorn as a trade and navigation center and also because of the indifference of the Mennonites to their brotherhood in the 18th century; during this century many Mennonites transferred their membership to the Reformed Church.

About 1700 (figures of an earlier period were not available) the total number of (baptized) Mennonites in Hoorn was 500, in 1747, when the Frisians and Waterlanders united, it had decreased to 212 members, about 119 in 1840, 142 in 1900, 165 in 1954.

The ministers during these 150 years were Jacob van Zaanen 1805-13, Jacob Pol 1814-43, J. G. de Hoop Scheffer 1843-46, J. Kerbert 1846-67, J. H. Uiterwijk 1867-70, A. W. Wybrands 1870-82, J. W. van der Linden 1883-84, K. Gorter 1885-89, J. Pottinga 1890-93, M. Uiterdijk 1894-1932, B. P. de Vries 1933-48, W. Broer 1949- . Since 1933 the pastor of Hoorn has also served at Enkhuisen (q.v.).

In 1952 a group left the main body of the congregation because of the rigorous orthodoxy of Pastor Broer. This group, now 45 members, has made contacts with the Beemster congregation; it holds separate meetings and has a ladies' circle of its own. The Hoorn congregation, which was very wealthy in the 18th century, has since lost most of its means. Church activities now (1954) include a Sunday school for children since 1896, a ladies' circle, and a Bible group. M.U., vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 131, 396, 480, 502, 531, 558, 708, 781, 868-72, 888, 1154, 1180, 1408, 1415; II, Nos. 1944-46; II, 2, Nos. 101-218; Blaupot t. C., Holland I and 11, passim; DB 1861, 161; 1867, 58, 66, 77-90; 1873, 52 f.; 1879, 94; 1882, 116 f.; 1883, 72; 1892, 103 note 1; 1893, 37 f., 58 f., 61 f., 78, 81; J. C. van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1896) 188-94; ML II, 344 f.

Hoorn, Den, a village of 550 inhabitants in the southern part of the island Texel in the Dutch province of North Holland. On the island the Anabaptist movement found early entry (ca. 1534). Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) visited the island twice (1560). The martyr Jan Gerritsz (q.v.) and Elder Simon Fijts (q.v.) are also known.

In 1709 the congregation at Hoorn dissolved its union with Burg, Waal, and Oosterend. It has a church record, begun in 1753 by the preacher Johannes Cuperus (q.v.). From 1709 to 1922 it existed as an independent congregation. In the latter year it joined the Helder (q.v.) congregation in the engagement of a minister. This union lasted until 1941. Then the congregation of den Hoorn united with that of Burg on the island of Texel, all Mennonites of this island now belonging to one congregation, called that of Texel (q.v.).

In the 16-17th century the congregation of den Hoorn belonged to the Waterlander branch of the Mennonites. Den Hoorn has a meetinghouse of 1850; an organ was acquired in 1896. The membership was always small: 42 baptized members in 1861; 42 in 1900; 43 in 1940.

The last minister of the independent congregation was R. Kuperus (1919-20). From 1922 to 1941 it was served by the pastor of den Helder. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1947-76; DB 1873, 140-58 passim; ML II, 345.) J.Y., vdZ.

Hoorn, Den, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation of the Flemish branch. Of the origin and history of this congregation there is little information. In 1717 the congregation was badly hit by a flood of the North Sea, in which many were drowned in this part of the province, and many farms were destroyed, as well as the meetinghouse of Den Hoorn.

About 1770 the congregation numbered 100 souls, about 50 baptized members, meeting in a plain meetinghouse erected in 1718. In 1792 its last preacher died, its membership decreased, and in 1816 the congregation united with that of Rasquert (q.v.) and Obergum (q.v.), forming the congregation of Mensingeweer (q.v.). After the building of a new meetinghouse at Mensingeweer in 1819, services at Den Hoorn were discontinued and the old meetinghouse was razed. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1841, 1977-79; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 149, 202 f.; DB 1906, 46.

Hoorn, van, a Dutch Mennonite family, from the end of the 17th century, found in the northeastern part of the province of Groningen, originally all belonging to the Groningen Old Flemish and numerously found among the membership of the congregation of Zijldijk, Middelstum, and Leermens. In the 19th century they spread all over the Netherlands.

Another van Hoorn family, not related to the former, is found at Leer, East Friesland, Germany. This family, according to a family tradition, moved to East Friesland in the 16th century from Hoorn in the Dutch province of North Holland because of religious persecution. Among them were a large number of deacons of the Mennonite congregations of Leer and Emden. They became related with other Mennonite families like Vissering, Rahusen, Zytsema, and Alring. The van Hoorns were usually engaged in business; e.g., the Reinhard van Hoorn Sons tobacco business at Leer. Apparently Jacob van Hoorn, preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Burtscheid-Maastricht ?-1710 and the Amsterdam Lamist congregation 1710-28, belonged to neither of these families. vdZ.

Hoornbeek, Johannes (1617-66), a Dutch Reformed theologian, appointed professor of theology at the University of Utrecht in 1644, and at Leiden in 1654. Among his numerous writings is the stately compendium of five volumes, which also touches upon the Mennonites, Summae controversiarum religionis (Utrecht, 1658). Among the writers opposing Anabaptism he has received considerable recognition. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. IV, 277-86; BRN VII, 95; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 14; DB 1883, 9; ML II, 345.

Hoorns Liedt-boeck, vergadert uyt verscheyden gedruckte boecken waer by ghevoeght syn eenighe nieuwe Liedekens, a Dutch hymnary printed by Isaac Willemsz and published by Zacharias Cornelisz, both at Hoorn. Only one edition, that of 1630, is known. It contains 474 pages and 214 hymns in alphabetical order without music. The hymns, as is indicated, could be sung to familiar melodies of both secular songs and hymns. vdZ.

Hoornsche Gesanghboeck, a name often used for a Dutch Mennonite hymnal, Het Boeck der Ghesangen (q.v.), printed at Hoorn in 1618.

Hoosen (Hoozen, Hoose, Hose), a Mennonite family, which according to tradition emigrated in the 17th century from Switzerland to Giethoorn, in the Dutch province of Overijssel. Some of the members served as preachers and elders of the Danzig Old Flemish congregation of Giethoorn ("Noord"), i.e., Jan Hoosen 1744-69(?), and both his sons, Gerrit Jans Hoosen 1796(?)-1812(?) and Pieter Jans Hoosen about 1802-?. Jan Jansz. Hoosen of Giethoorn, who is not the same person as the foregoing elder of Giethoorn, but likely also a son, was elder of the Swiss emigrant congregation at Kampen about 1805-22. He was a shoemaker, was b. 1758 at Giethoorn, died there 1834. vdZ.

J. Huizinga, Stamboek . . . van Samuel Peter and Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890) 67; DB 1878, 28; 1880, 103 f.; several issues of Naamlijsten; DB 1881, 103 f.

Hoover (Hover, Hoober, Huber, Huver, Hueber), a Swiss family name found among the Mennonites of Germany and America. A Swiss Anabaptist named Ulrich Huber was executed in 1538, and Hans Huber, a German Anabaptist, was put to death in 1542 at Wasserburg on the Inn. The Hutterite Chronicle contains the martyr record of Wolfgang Hueber, who was executed in Bavaria in 1559. A number of Huebers are mentioned in the Chronicle; for example, Caspar Hueber who was ordained as a preacher in 1557.

More than 50 Hubers emigrated to America before the Revolutionary War, who represented at least four faiths: Mennonite, Lutheran, German Reformed, and Moravian. The ancestor of many of the Mennonite Hoovers was the immigrant Hans Huber (ca. 1670-1750), a Swiss who was married to Margaret Koch. After living for a period in the Palatinate he came to America in 1710 or soon thereafter and settled at Mill Creek, Lancaster Co., Pa. Today the Hoover family is spread rather widely in the United States and Ontario. More than a dozen Hoovers have been ordained in the Mennonite Conference of Ontario (MC), and a smaller number in Indiana (MC). Bishop Martin Hoover (MC) settled in Elkhart Co., Ind., in 1845, four years before his death; he had immigrated from Europe and had lived in Lancaster Co., Pa., Markham, Ont., and Ohio. Noah S. Hoover (MC) served long as a deacon in the Yellow Creek, Ind., congregation 1887-d.1913. The name Hoover also occurs among the Brethren in Christ; their second Overseer in the Indiana District was a Martin Hoover who evidently served in the second half of the 19th century. Paul Hoover is a minister of the Old Order Mennonites (Wisler) near Goshen, Ind. J.C.W.

Harry M. Hoover, The Huber-Hoover Family History (Scottdale, 1928).

Hope, a Dutch family. A number of members of this family of bankers and wholesale dealers, which came from England to the Netherlands and settled at Rotterdam, belonged to the Mennonite Church. The first member of the Hope family in Rotterdam was Archibald Hope (d. ca. 1743), who was married to Anna Claus. He may have moved to Rotterdam about 1680. He soon became very prosperous; in 1716 he built the country seat Lindenhof at Kralingen near Rotterdam. By the last decade of the 17th century he was conducting an important trade to England, Ireland, and America. Both he and his wife were members of the Mennonite congregation. His son Isaac Hope (d. 1767) was baptized in 1729 and was a deacon of the Rotterdam congregation 1735-39; his brother Zachary (d. 1770) was baptized in 1733, and served 1739-43, and another brother, James, was deacon 1751-55. In 1735 Archibald Hope and his son Isaac transported 180 Swiss emigrants (probably Mennonites) to Pennsylvania, and again and again they carried emigrants to the English colonies in America, e.g., 3,000 persons in 1753, and 4,000 emigrants from the Palatinate in 1765. Among those there may also have been a number of Mennonites. The Hopes were friends of the Bisschop (q.v.) family of Rotterdam; after the death of Jan Bisschop in 1771, Jan Hope inherited the painted portraits of the Bisschop brothers, Archibald Hope, Jr., the rich collection of coins, while Adriaan and Jan Hope bought the considerable collection of paintings gathered by the Bisschops. During the 18th century some of the Hopes moved to Amsterdam. They were—in contrast to most Mennonites, who were Patriots (q.v.)—at the close of the 18th century nearly all convinced followers of the Prince of Orange. vdZ.

Hope Rescue Mission, the first rescue mission operated by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC), opened on Feb. 28, 1954, at 530-32 South Michigan Street, South Bend, Ind., because of the great need in that city. Men from surrounding churches donated over 1,750 man-hours of labor to clean and renovate a dilapidated tavern and gambling hall, transforming it into one of the most attractive rescue missions in the country.

During the first month an evening service was held on five nights of the week. Today one public service and two classes are conducted daily in the mission. Thirty different church groups participate in the evening services. The facilities consist of a chapel seating 125, prayer room, dining room, kitchen, laundry, shower rooms, housing facilities for 45 transient men and women, and quarters for staff workers. The mission serves two meals daily to transients, distributes clothing daily, and operates a medical clinic, a barber shop, and an employment service. T. E. Sch.

Hopedale Mennonite Church (MC), approximately 2½ miles southeast of Hopedale, Tazewell Co., Ill., a member of the Illinois Conference, was originally named the "Delavan Prairie Church." Preceding the merging of the Amish with the Mennonites of the state, it was known as the Hopedale Amish-Mennonite Church and by the general public as the German Church. Some of the first settlers were Joe Litwiller 1854; Peter and Christian Nafziger 1856, Christ Slagel 1857, David Springer 1858, Simon Bechler 1862, and Christ Birky 1862. Services were held every two weeks in the homes in 1854-76. The first church building was erected two miles southeast of Hopedale in 1876. Additions to the church were built in 1884 and 1906. A new building, still in use, with a seating capacity of 450, was erected in 1926.

Christian Nafziger (1819-99) was ordained as the first minister in 1856 and as bishop in 1860. John C. Birky served as bishop 1896-1920, Samuel Gerber 1920-25, and Simon Litwiller 1925-56. Others who have served as ministers are Joseph Litwiller, Simon Bechler, William Unzicker, Joseph Hochstetler, J. Nafziger, Noah Augsburger, Andrew Birkey, Joseph Birky, Daniel Grieser, J. Birkey, John Egli, Joseph Egli, Joseph Springer, Daniel Nafziger, Ben Springer, and Ivan Kauffmann, who was installed as pastor in 1956. The membership in 1956 was 370. The first Sunday-school services were held in 1885 and were conducted in German. I.K.

H. F. Weber, Centennial History of the Mennonites of Illinois (Goshen, 1931).

Hopefield (Hoffnungsfeld) Mennonite Church (GCM), located four miles west of Moundridge, McPherson Co., Kan., a member of the Western District Conference, is one of the oldest Mennonite churches in Kansas. It was founded in October 1874 under the leadership of Elder Jacob Stucky (q.v.), by a group of 64 Swiss Mennonite families who had emigrated as a congregation from Volhynia, Russia, in August 1874. The congregation adopted the name Hoffnungsfeld but in 1880 it was chartered as the Hopefield Society of the Mennonite Church. Eight churches in central Kansas have been organized wholly or in part by members and descendants from the original Hopefield congregation. The original and present frame structure was built in 1882. Recently the building has been completely remodeled and redecorated. The 1953 membership was 100, with Archie Kliewer as pastor. D.D.S.

Hopewell Mennonite Church (MC), located near Hubbard, Marion Co., Ore., a member of the Pacific Coast Conference, was organized in the fall of 1899 by George R. Brunk, a minister of the Kansas-Nebraska Conference. J. D. Mishler, then of Eugene, Ore., was the first bishop. The membership in 1953 was 56. The present meetinghouse, the second built on the same site, is a frame structure with a seating capacity of 200. Ministers serving this congregation are N. L. Hershberger, James Bucher, and Jacob Roth; O. W. King is the deacon. O.W.K.

Hopewell Mennonite Church (MC), located in the village of Kouts, Porter Co., Ind., is a member of the Indiana-Michigan Conference. The original Mennonite settlers in this area came largely from Hopedale, Ill., and Nebraska, beginning in 1916. They built their first meetinghouse in 1919, just south of the village, and in 1952 a new house of worship at the northern edge of the village. The most outstanding leader of the church was Bishop Jacob Z. Birky (1855-1926), who was born at Morton, Ill., and ordained preacher in Nebraska in 1895, and bishop in 1902. He located at Kouts, Ind., in 1920. He was a brother of Bishop John C. Birky (1849-1920) of Hopedale, Ill. The membership in 1954 was 207, pastor Samuel S. Miller. J.C.W.

Hopi, a tribe of less than 4,000 Pueblo Indians inhabiting about 986 square miles of arid land in the northern Arizona highland, which was until the end of the 19th century less touched by contemporary culture than the larger tribes. Its customs and morals, its culture and religion were therefore preserved in their original form. The Hopi live in seven villages in northeastern Arizona on the elevations between the Rio Colorado and the Colorado Chiquito on the same area on which the Spanish Conquistadores found their ancestors in 1539. Even at that time their villages, consisting of stone houses, were apparently very old. In 1893 the General Conference Mennonites opened mission work among the Hopi, when H. R. Voth (q.v.) settled in Oraibi, the largest of the villages, having at that time a population of about 1,000. The work was difficult, but was continued with persistence and eventual success. A second mission station was opened in Moencopi (q.v.) and a third one in Hotevilla (q.v.), which had been established in 1906 by the Hopi inhabitants of Oraibi. During 60 years of missions (1893-1953) about 150 Hopis were baptized.

One of the early difficulties was the lack of ability to communicate, since there were no written materials to facilitate learning the Hopi language. The missionaries, however, produced some literature, including a Bible history and a translation of the Gospels. The three stations had a combined membership of some 50 in 1931. Hege.

J. B. Epp, Bible History in the Hopi Indian Language (Los Angeles, 1916); H. R. Voth, The Oraibi Powamu Ceremony (Field Museum of Natural History, Anthropological Series III, 1901); idem, Traditions of the Hopi (Field Museum of Natural History, Anthropological Series VIII, 1-319, 1905); Laura Thompson, Culture in Crisis, A Study of the Hopi Indians (New York, 1950); ML II, 345 f.

Höppner, Jakob, appointed with Johann Bartsch (q.v.) as a deputy of the West Prussian Mennonites; they traveled to Russia in the fall of 1786 to investigate the offer for colonization made by Catherine II. Under very difficult circumstances they performed their task. The outcome was the emigration to Russia beginning in 1788. Their services were miserably rewarded. When the emigrants reached the colonization site at Chortitza, all the resentment of the disappointed settlers, who had expected better land, was heaped upon Höppner and Bartsch. Höppner was expelled from the Flemish congregation. He was accused of misappropriation of funds and imprisoned in Ekaterinoslav, and was to be deported to Siberia. When Emperor Paul I died and was succeeded by Alexander I, Höppner was pardoned and released after a year's imprisonment. Meanwhile his property had been sold. Finally he was received into the Frisian church at Kronsweide, where he quietly spent the last years of his life. After his death a beautiful monument was erected in his honor on the island of Chortitza. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 72, 95 ff.; Unser Blatt I, 205 ff.; ML II, 346.) D.H.E.

Höppner, Jakob, b. Aug. 10, 1850, on Chortitza Island, South Russia, d. Nov. 16, 1936, at Winkler, Man. He was the great-grandson of the Jakob Höppner (q.v.) who was sent to Russia by the Danzig Mennonites to inspect the land. He was married to Aganetha Dück in 1873. In 1876 he emigrated to Manitoba, where he was elected minister of the Bergthal Mennonite Church (q.v.). In 1887 he was ordained minister and on April 14, 1903, he was ordained elder. C.K.

J. G. Rempel, Fünfzig Jahre Konferenzbestrebungen, 1902-1952 I (Steinbach, 1954) 15.

Horb, a town (pop. 2,800) of Württemberg, Germany, situated on the Neckar, had a tempestuous period in the early decades of the Reformation. From December 1522, to the beginning of March 1523, Karsthans, who was probably Johann Murer (Maurer), a native of Horb, worked here for the new (Lutheran) faith as a lay preacher and won some adherents. In addition, the Protestant schoolteacher, Aegidius Krautwasser, praised by Joh. Eberlin as an exponent of the Gospel, had come to Horb from Stuttgart. A canon of the Heiligkreuzstift, Konrad Starzler, had expressed his Protestant convictions in three pamphlets, but later recanted.

Concerning the imprisoned Karsthans, of whom he expected constancy in the faith, Sebastian Lotzer (q.v.), a furrier and a native of Horb, wrote from Memmingen in the middle of March 1523: Ain hailsame Ermanung an die ynwoner zu Horw, das sy bestendig belyben an dem hailigen wort gottes mit anzaigung der göttlichen hailigen geschrift. He admonished his countrymen that he who had two coats should sell one and buy a New Testament. Then he examined fasting, holy days, indulgences, and the worship of the saints in agreement with Luther's interpretation. When his father wrote him that his pamphlets had aroused much antagonism among the populace, he wrote a second pamphlet entitled Ain christlicher sendbrief, darin angezaigt wirt, ds die layen macht und recht haben von dem hailigen wort gots reden, leren und schreiben . . . (1523). He points his father to Christ as the Saviour, distinguishes clearly between the church faith and justifying faith, which is proved by good works. Against the assertion of his opponents that the layman must not concern himself with the Scriptures because he does not understand them, he cites the promise: Every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth. Then in opposition to the natural man's fear of suffering he demands open confession of faith, even if it is dangerous. Waiting for a decision of council is superfluous for him who hears the Word of God and buys a New Testament; that is sufficient council. The government does not approve of laymen's discussing and writing on sacred subjects. Lotzer's writings must have made considerable impression on Horb, for on Sept. 30, 1523, the Hofrat in Innsbruck reported to Archduke Ferdinand that the Protestant movement was making rapid strides in Horb.

In the spring of 1526 Wilhelm Reublin (q.v.), of Rottenburg, came to Lotzer's home town and won many friends for the Anabaptists. In Horb, too, he found many adherents; he baptized in 25 homes. Ludwig Scheurer of Reutlingen he baptized at a well in a field near the Neuneckerhalde, dipping water with his hands and pouring it on Scheurer's head. Then he called his friend Michael Sattler (q.v.) from Strasbourg to Horb.

In the middle of February the government became aware of the Anabaptists. Reublin escaped to Reutlingen and to Esslingen. But his wife, Sattler and his wife, Veit Feringer, and Matthias Hiller, a furrier of St. Gall, were seized at the end of February. Because the authorities feared that the multitude of adherents might create a disturbance, the prisoners were taken to Binsdorf. After eleven weeks of imprisonment Sattler, Feringer, and Hiller were taken to Rottenburg with an escort of 56 foot soldiers. Sattler died at the stake there on May 21, 1527; three of his adherents including Hiller were beheaded, and his wife was drowned in the Neckar on the next day; Feringer had recanted, but withdrew his recantation and was held thirteen and one-half years imprisoned in Schömberg. Reublin's wife and child lay in prison in Ihlingen and Horb.

On May 31, 1527, Capito (q.v.) wrote to the council in Horb, that they should defend the prisoners against the Austrian government; though they erred in some points they were not blasphemers whom the government had to punish, unless it was blasphemy to avoid gambling, excessive drinking and eating, adultery, war, killing, slander of one's neighbor, and living according to the lusts of the flesh. At the same time he wrote to the prisoners, urging them to desist from their error concerning the oath, holding government office, and the rejection of force, but comforted them in their suffering and encouraged them to pray for their enemies and to lose all hate for them. These letters of Capito's are examples of the most beautiful testimonials of the Christian spirit (Baum, Capito, 371; Hulshof, Geschiedenis, 66 ff.).

Nowhere is there a suggestion that Reublin showed any concern for his wife; but on June 19, 1527, Zürich sent a request to the authorities of Horb on behalf of their fellow citizen Adelheid Lehmann. The letter played up her foolish simplicity; she was only a poor woman who had been misled by her husband. The Austrian government had no inkling that the woman in question was Reublin's wife. On June 21 the Horb authorities replied that the woman was in the prison of the prince and out of their jurisdiction (Egli, Akten. pp. 210 ff.). Many petitions for clemency were presented. On June 14 the government gave the information that those who had escaped must surrender unconditionally and could not sell their possessions. At the same time an attempt was made to lure them home; for it was hoped that with their help the Anabaptist leaders might be betrayed into government hands. They even promised that any who delivered Bällin and Küeffer to the authorities would be unconditionally pardoned.

On July 17 court was again held in Horb, guarded by 90 foot soldiers. Twenty-four men and women were accused of Anabaptist adherence. All of them were led to recant. On the market place a framework was set up, and there the defendants had to swear before a notary and trustworthy witnesses that they would abandon their error and faithfully and zealously adhere to the holy Christian Church and its regulations to the end of their lives. On the next seven Sundays they were to gather at the altar at the early Mass, with bare feet, bare heads, and loose hair, in gray wool apparel on which the baptismal font was painted in white, and in the customary procession walk around the church before the cross. As a sign of penitence they had to carry in their left hands a rod, in their right a lighted candle, and after the procession kneel before the altar; there they should receive absolution from the priest with three blows, and remain on their knees until the end of the Mass. Their gray clothing they must wear a year and a day. On certain days they must go to the confessional and to communion. For the rest of their life they must avoid all public and private society in or outside the houses, could carry no weapons but a broken bread knife. Finally they could not without permission leave the town of Horb. The fine levied upon them was heavy.

That which the Anabaptists could be compelled to yield to was merely the ceremony of the church and submission to the priest. A clear confession of their error, a renewed love for the church, whose service was hard, could not be secured by compulsion. We do not hear that the clergy were requested to win their spirits by indoctrination.

Many Anabaptists had fled from Horb, especially to Strasbourg. Jörg Lederlin, whom Reublin had baptized, was there. In his house the Anabaptists met. He rejected communion, because Christ had not commanded that His example be followed. Hans Frisch of Horb was the treasurer of the Anabaptists in Strasbourg; Thomas Schomer's property was confiscated; but his clever mother had all his movable goods taken to her house at night and sent on to Strasbourg. In Switzerland a Hans from Horb appears as an Anabaptist (Egli, Wiedertäufer in Zürich, 88).

The government had indeed been victorious over the Protestant and Anabaptist movement; but it could not be sure that no new opponents of the old church would appear, and had to observe that a wildness took possession of the populace, and murder increased, while the Anabaptists in the Hohenberg could not be charged with wrongdoing, deceit, thievery, drunkenness, or vice. G.Bo.

E. Egli, Die Züricher Wiedertäufer zur Ref.-Zeit (Zürich, 1878); TA Zürich; A. Hulshof, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg ... (Amsterdam, 1905); Bl. f. württemb. Kirchengesch., 1887, 9 ff., 25 ff., 89 ff.; 1888, 65; 1889, 83; 1892, 82, 90; ML II, 346-48.

Horn, Den, a hamlet in the Dutch province of Groningen, seat of a Mennonite congregation, formerly also called Zuidhorn (as in Naamlijst). Originally the congregation, which existed already in the early part of the 17th century, but of whose history nothing is known, belonged to the Flemish branch. Until 1829 it was served by untrained and also unsalaried preachers; the first preacher to receive a small salary was the untrained preacher Jan Geerts, serving here until 1788; the last untrained minister was Jan Tjerks Vermanje, serving 1799-1829. During his ministry the number of members increased from about 50 to 90. The first minister here who had been trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, serving in 1835-44, was Jacob Dirks Huizinga (q.v.). A new meetinghouse was built in 1861, an organ was not acquired until 1906. Ministers serving during the last half century are F. F. Milatz 1905-10, H. Schuurmans 1910-12, J. A. P. Bijl 1914-27, R. Boersma 1928-36, J. S. Postma 1936-40, and S. J. Verveld 1940- . The membership, numbering 95 in 1861, decreased to 53 in 1954. There is a ladies' circle and a youth group. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 206, 238; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1842; Naamlijst 1829, 67; DB 1861, 149 f.; 1901, 122; 1906, 46, 195; De Zondagsbode III, No. 30 (May 25, 1890).

Horn, Georg H. (1620-70), a German historian, professor of history at the University of Leiden in Holland, the author of the book, Historia ecclesiastica et politica (Leipzig, 1677, new revised edition, Frankfurt, 1679), a book of 442 pages dedicated to Karl Ludwig, the Palatine elector. In compressed form it deals with the history of the church from the creation of the world to the 17th century. The author's statements about the Anabaptists, whom he derives from Thomas Müntzer, do not differ from the contemporary and traditional presentation. The book is of no historical importance. What he has to say about the Anabaptists in England is more extensive and is more deserving of consideration, even though he offers little that is new even here. (ML II, 348.) NEFF.

Hornbach. In the Naamlijst of 1769-75 is found a congregation Freudenberg-Hornbach-Kirchheimerhof. This congregation was in the duchy of Zweibrücken, Germany. Joseph Schnebele, preacher 1762-67, was elder since 1767; preachers were Johannes Lehman from 1745, Rudolph Schmidt from 1755, and Peter Böer also from 1755. In the Naamlijst of 1780 and following this congregation is not found any more. vdZ.

Horning Mennonites. Following a dispute over the introduction of a pulpit in place of the traditional preachers' table at the Lichty meetinghouse, Weaverland circuit, Lancaster Conference (MC), Lancaster Co., Pa., in 1889, Jonas Martin led a conservative schism in October 1893, popularly called "Martinites." This group in 1926 suffered another schism under Bishop Joseph Wenger, who led a still more conservative faction, commonly called "Wengerites." The Martinite group have had Moses Horning as their bishop since 1914, and since 1926 have been popularly called "Horning people," although their official name is Weaverland Conference of Old Order Mennonites. Their membership (1955) numbers 1,710, with congregations at Weaverland, Groffdale, Martindale, Bowmansville, Churchtown, Pequea, Meadow Valley, and Springville in Lancaster County; Fairview and Myerstown in Lebanon County; and Witmer and Stony Brook in York County. About half of their services are still conducted in German. They have no missions, Sunday schools, summer Bible schools, nor youth activities. They have automobiles, but paint the bumpers black and are therefore sometimes termed the "Black Bumpers." They are chiefly farmers and live mostly in the northeast sector of Lancaster County. The present bishops are Moses Horning, Joseph Hostetter, and Joseph O. Weaver. The conference also includes (1953) eleven ministers and eight deacons.

This group has joined with the 1889 Martinite division of Waterloo County and elsewhere in Ontario and the Wisler division of 1873 in Elkhart Co., Ind., to form the Old Order Mennonites (q.v.). The Old Order church is found elsewhere in Markham Twp., Ont., Dayton, Va., Wayne County and Mahoning County, Ohio, numbering 5,277 baptized members all told. It is not to be confused with the Old Order Amish Mennonites. It does not require beards and hooks and eyes and uses meetinghouses. I.D.L.

Horozanna wielka (i.e., Great Horozanna), a Ruthenian village in the district of Rudki, about 22 miles south of Lemberg in Galicia. In 1850 some Mennonites from the first settlements at Einsiedel, Falkenstein, and Rosenberg, whose names were Bergthold, Ewy, Rupp, and Schmidt, bought about 800 acres of the Horozonna estate and settled there on individual farms with their families. According to a note in the oldest church record of the Galician Mennonites, the first prayer meeting was held in Horozanna on April 25, 1852. In 1857 the settlers called as their preacher Johannes van der Smissen, and formed a subsidiary congregation. It did not exist long, however, for the farms were sold one by one and the families migrated to other localities in Galicia or to America. In 1931 only one Mennonite family was living in Horozanna, the Ewy family, who belonged to the Kiernica-Lemberg Mennonite Church. (ML II, 348.) J.Ru.

Horqueta is the name of a town in East Paraguay about 25 miles east of the city of Concepcion which is located on the Paraguay River approximately 200 miles north of Asuncion. A narrow-gauge railroad, one of the few railroads in Paraguay, operates from Concepcion through Horqueta to a few miles beyond. Hardly had the Russian Mennonites settled in the Fernheim colony in the Chaco when, for various reasons, some became dissatisfied and began to cast about for other places to which they might move. Early in 1931 a committee composed of Gerhard Isaak and a certain Langemann investigated several areas in East Paraguay including Horqueta where a few German-speaking families were already settled. Langemann recommended moving to Horqueta, but Isaak advised against it. In 1932 a few families, including Langemann's, moved to Horqueta and started a new Mennonite colony. Others followed in the next few years until about 20 families were located there. The group did not prosper, however. In addition to having some difficulties with Paraguayan neighbors, there was a lack of unity in the colony. Gradually families began moving away —some back to the Chaco, some to the newly formed Friesland colony, a few to near-by Concepcion, and a few to Asuncion. The last family moved away in 1945. W.H.S.

Fr. Kliewer, Die Deutsche Volksgruppe in Paraguay: Eine siedlungsgeschichtliche, volkskundliche und volkspolitische Untersuchung (Hamburg, 1941).

Horsch, a South German (Badischer Verband) family, presumably of Swiss origin, which has produced many preachers. The earliest record of the name is that of Hans Horsch in the Büchelhof congregation near Wimpfen in 1731 (Müller, Berner Täufer). In the Mennonite census lists of the Palatinate Joseph Horsch appears at Mauer near Heidelberg 1738-59 and a Jakob Horsch at Schatthausen near Heidelberg in 1759. One branch of the family settled near Giebelstadt, Bavaria, about 1810, from which descended four elders in succession (with one break): Jacob (d. 1873), Jakob (d. 1888), Michael (d. 1949), Hellmut (still living). Another branch continued at Hasselbach and elsewhere in Baden. In 1956 a Johannes Horsch was preacher in Hasselbach and David Horsch was preacher at Bretten. David Horsch of Lamprechtshof near Durlach was long a preacher of the Hahn'sche Mennonites there, and a cofounder of the Bibelheim Thomashof. Michael Horsch (1872-1941), who came to America in 1887, was for over 40 years a minister in the General Conference Mennonite Church and an active general leader, for some years field secretary of the conference. John Horsch (1867-1941), who came to the United States in 1887, was a well-known writer and historian in the Mennonite Church (MC), resident at Scottdale, Pa., 1908-41. H.S.B.

Horsch, John (1867-1941), a leading historian and writer of the Mennonite Church (MC) in America, was born in Giebelstadt near Würzburg, Germany, on Dec. 18, 1867, the fourth of nine children born to Elder Jacob Horsch and his wife Barbara Landes; m. Christine Funck of Neipperg near Heilbronn, Württemberg; was the father of four children—Elizabeth (Mrs. H. S. Bender), Walter, Menno, and Paul; died Oct. 7, 1941, at his longtime home at Scottdale, Pa. Intended by his father to be a farmer he studied two years at the Bavarian State Agricultural School at Würzburg, securing the diploma in 1886. Having meanwhile come to accept the full nonresistant position he emigrated to America to avoid military service, arriving in New York Jan. 3, 1887.

January to May 1887 Horsch spent at Halstead, Kan., attending the Indian Mission School conducted by Christian Krehbiel (to learn English), then moved to Elkhart to enter the employ of John F. Funk in the Mennonite Publishing Co., where 1887-95, with intermittent absence to attend several colleges, he did much of the editorial work on the Herold der Wahrheit, the Familien-Kalender, and the German Sunday-school quarterlies. This was the beginning of a long career of 55 years of editorial work, historical research, and historical and theological writing. During these eight years at Elkhart he also collected a large Mennonite historical library, and established a lifelong connection with the Hutterites in South Dakota.

Between 1888 and 1898 Horsch spent almost four years in study in various colleges and universities (Evangelical Theol. Seminary at Naperville, Ill., Valparaiso University at Valparaiso, Ind., Baldwin-Wallace College at Berea, Ohio, and the University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis.). In 1898-1900 he engaged in a private publishing business at Elkhart, publishing the monthly Farm und Haus (first number September 1898). In 1900-8 he was associated with J. A. Sprunger (q.v.), the owner and operator of the Light and Hope Publishing Co., at Berne, Ind., Cleveland, Ohio, and Birmingham, Ohio. Sprunger, formerly a minister in the Berne Mennonite (GCM) Church, was at this time loosely affiliated with the Missionary Church Association. In May 1908 Horsch moved to Scottdale, where he served the Mennonite Publishing House as German editor of several publications and carried on private research and writing in Mennonite history and the theological field until his death in 1941.

The awakening of John Horsch's historical interest was the result of the intellectual movements in the Mennonite Church in Germany during his youth. His father had a not inconsequential library and subscribed to the two German Mennonite periodicals: the Mennonitische Blätter (q.v.) and the Gemeindeblatt der Mennoniten (q.v.), both of which carried many historical articles in the 1880's particularly 1885-86. The first adequate Mennonite history in German had just appeared in 1884, written by Anna Brons (q.v.). But the decisive influence on Horsch's interest in Mennonite history was the archivist and historian Ludwig Keller (q.v.), with whom he continued in close touch for ten years (1885-95), even after his emigration to America, and who directly influenced him to dedicate his life to a revival of the ancient Anabaptist principles in the Mennonite brotherhood, in spite of the fact that Keller considered the principle of nonresistance a handicap to be discarded. Keller had begun to publish his books on Anabaptist history in 1880 with a book on the Münsterites, followed by his biography of Hans Denk in 1882, and was an almost constant contributor to the Mennonitische Blätter.

In his early period in America, from 20 to 30 years of age, Horsch had not altogether found himself. During this period he did publish (1890) his valuable brief history of the Mennonites in German, Kurzgefasste Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinden as well as his English booklet, The Mennonites, Their History, Faith, and Practice (1893), in addition to countless periodical articles. But his program of reviving the church through writing was also partially frustrated due to three factors: (1) his lack of intimate knowledge of the American Mennonite Church, its leadership, and its problems; (2) his want of a complete and independent mastery of Anabaptist history and theology and the full inner meaning of its program, due partly to the dominance of Keller's unbalanced interpretation; and (3) the difficulties with Bishop Funk and his editorial staff at Elkhart, including a disappointment with the somewhat legalistic program of the church there. The net result of the early years was disheartening, and he found no other connection by which he could effectively work for his program than that which he reluctantly surrendered at Elkhart. Nor was the connection with J. A. Sprunger a solution, for Sprunger had no vital connection with any church body, still less with any Mennonite body. Horsch's library was in Funk's hands at Elkhart, and he had no adequate stimulus to creative scholarship, although he did publish during this time his book, A Short History of Christianity (1903).

But with the coming to Scottdale in 1908 Horsch found himself again. Here in the old church, he found inspiration, challenge, and opportunity. In the next 35 years he gave himself without reserve to Mennonite historical research and writing, producing a series of valuable studies: Menno Simons (1916); Infant Baptism, Its Origin Among Protestants (1927); The Principle of Nonresistance as Held by the Mennonite Church, An Historical Survey (1927); The Hutterian Brethren: A Story of Martyrdom and Loyalty, 1528-1931 (1931); and Mennonites in Europe, posthumously published in 1942. In addition many historical articles came from his pen in both scholarly and popular journals, some published in the Mennonite Quarterly Review, 1927-40. He has the credit of discovering the modern Hutterites and their historical manuscripts and introducing them to modern scholarship, particularly to Wolkan in Vienna. He was the channel through which their large hymnal, Riedemann's Rechenschaft, and the Ehrenpreis Sendbrief were published.

For a number of years, 1917-26, Horsch was deeply stirred by the Fundamentalist-Modernist controversy in America and was drawn away somewhat from his historical studies into a position of semi-participation in this controversy. One fruit of this was the writing of an influential book called Modern Religious Liberalism, a scholarly exposé of modernism which became quite popular in Fundamentalist circles, going through three editions (1920, 1924, 1938) with a total sale of over 10,000 copies, and being used as a text in several seminaries and Bible institutes. One edition was published by the Moody Bible Institute Colportage Association. It was preceded in 1917 by a booklet, The Higher Criticism and the New Theology. In this period Horsch also assailed the milder forms of liberalism which had begun to infiltrate into American Mennonite educational circles through a few men trained in liberal seminaries, writing the pamphlets, The Mennonite Church and Modernism (1924), and Is the Mennonite Church of America Free of Modernism? (1926).

Being convinced about the same time that the Mennonites of America needed a strengthening of their nonresistant position, Horsch also performed valiant work in this field through publication of booklets and articles, including the book, Die biblische Lehre von der Wehrlosigkeit (1920) which was also published in Germany, and the pamphlets, The Principle of Nonresistance as Held by the Mennonite Church and Symposium on War (1927). Horsch's writing on modernism and nonresistance, intended both to awaken the Mennonite Church (and others) and to ward off theological and historical enemies, was frequently of necessity polemic and controversial.

In the last years of his life Horsch again returned fully to his first and major love, Mennonite historical writing. Having received a commission from the Mennonite General Conference to write a history of the Mennonite Church in Europe, he devoted himself to this task and succeeded in completing the manuscript in 1939 in all essentials before the final illness which cut short his career—Mennonites in Europe, which will remain his greatest monument.

One of John Horsch's lasting contributions to historical scholarship was the collection of an unusually rich library on early Anabaptist history. At the age of 17 he was seeking to secure books of Hans Denk, and to the end of his life he sought to assemble the tools necessary to scholarship in a good library. The Horsch Collection, as it is now called, is especially rich in early Swiss, German, and Dutch Anabaptistica. A study of the Catalogue of the Mennonite Historical Library, prepared by Horsch and published at Scottdale in 1929, and of the final contents of the collection as it was incorporated into the Mennonite Historical Library of Goshen College in 1945, reveals its uniqueness. It was for Horsch a working collection; the many marginal notes, underlinings, and indexes of subjects and names on the flyleaves speak of his assiduous use, as do also numerous notebooks and scrapbooks filled with copious extracts; the extensive documentation of his writings with source references likewise proves his thoroughness. The gleaning in the sources which Horsch did will not need to be repeated.

Horsch is best known for his outstanding work in the field of Mennonite history, by which he won wide recognition in two continents. He was a thorough and painstaking research scholar, capable of the most intensive and sustained effort in the exploitation of original sources, competent in several languages and an able and prolific writer, although he lacked formal advanced training in history. But the deepest interest and greatest passion of Horsch's life was not history, but the church, the Mennonite Church. He strove to help her to attain and maintain the ideal of a church "without spot or wrinkle," wholly devoted to her Lord.

Horsch's historical interest was not merely antiquarian, nor one of pure scholarship. He found in Anabaptism the prototype of his own faith, and he sought with all his heart to revive and make effective this faith in his own Mennonite brotherhood and beyond. History was to be an instrument for evangelism in the truest and best sense. It is this frankly propagandistic strain in his writings, often with a polemical slant, that at times annoyed his readers and irritated his critics. It must be remembered, however, that the ancient perversions of Anabaptist history were still dominant and that a vigorous challenge to this historical error was necessary. Much of Horsch's brilliant energy was devoted to the fight to rehabilitate the Anabaptists in the world of scholarship. He lived to see the verdict largely reversed, a reversal to which he made no small contribution.† H.S.B.

The July 1947 issue of the MQR was a special John Horsch Memorial Number containing the following articles: H. S. Bender, "John Horsch, 1867-1941: A Biography," 3-16; E. Correll, "Notes on John Horsch as a Historian," 17-22; J. C. Wenger, "The Theology of John Horsch," 23-31; R. Friedmann, "John Horsch and Ludwig Keller," 32-46; E. H. Bender, "The Letters of Ludwig Keller to John Horsch, 1885-1893," 47-76; Edward Yoder, "A Bibliography of the Writings of John Horsch," 77-100. These materials were also issued in book form as John Horsch Memorial Papers (Scottdale, 1947).

Horsch, Michael (1871-1949), an outstanding elder and leader of the Mennonite churches of the Badischer Verband (q.v.), South Germany, was born of a long line of elders and preachers of two old Swiss-Baden Mennonite families, which settled in Giebelstadt near Würzburg, Germany, soon after 1800 (Horsch and Landes). Born the son of Elder Jakob Horsch, Jan. 15, 1871, he grew up on the estate at Gelchsheim rented by his farmer father, which he with his mother took over at the death of his father when he was only 17. The rest of his life Michael Horsch was a farmer, purchasing the large estate of Hellmannsberg near Ingolstadt where he lived from 1914 to his death. He was married to Maria Schmutz in 1898; one of their 10 children is Elder Hellmut Horsch of Ingolstadt. Michael was ordained preacher of the Giebelstadt-Würzburg congregation in 1909 and elder of the Ingolstadt congregation in 1923.

Michael Horsch, though without formal higher education, displayed a remarkable breadth of interest, vision, and ability as a leader. Conservative in theology, and a devoted Mennonite, he was not denominationally narrow nor bound by tradition. He founded (January 1922) and led as chairman until his death the South German Mennonite relief organization known as Christenpflicht (q.v.). He was a prime mover in the founding of the Bibelheim Thomashof (q.v.) near Durlach. He was an active promoter of the deaconess work and a supporter of missions and evangelism. Many Bible conferences (q.v.) were held at Hellmannsberg. He died Oct. 13, 1949, and was buried at Hellmannsberg.† H.S.B.

Jakob Landes, "Michael Horsch, Aus seinem Leben und Lebenswerk," Gem.-Kal. 1954, 19-53.

Horst (Hurst), a well-known family name among Mennonites in Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, Kansas, Iowa, and other midwestern and far western states. The ancestors of these people emigrated from Europe in 1731. They sailed from Rotterdam on the Brittania, which arrived at Philadelphia on Sept. 21, 1731, with 108 Palatinates and their families on board. The Horst family was composed of Barbara, a widow of 40, and three sons—Michael, 18, Joseph, 8, and Peter, 2. To pay their passage Barbara bound out the two elder sons as redemptioners. Joseph's master was Hans Groff, a pioneer settler of Groffdale, Lancaster Co., Pa. When Joseph reached maturity, he married Mary, a daughter of Samuel Groff, a grandson of Hans Groff. Samuel Groff deeded to Joseph 150 acres of land. Joseph Horst continued to live in the Conestoga Valley until his death in 1804, at the age of 81 years. He is buried in the Groffdale cemetery. He is the ancestor of most of the Horsts in the Mennonite Church today. In 1750 Michael located in Lebanon Valley, where he owned nearly 500 acres of land. He died in 1772, leaving a large family, some of whom now live in Dauphin Co., Pa. Peter settled southeast of Lancaster, then sold out and joined the migration to the west after 1800.

Among the ordained men furnished to the Mennonite (MC) Church by this family have been the following bishops: Michael Horst (1825-1900) and Moses Horst (1882-), both of Maugansville, Md., Michael Horst of Dalton, Ohio (1832-1916), John L. Horst of Scottdale, Pa. (1889-), and Amos S. Horst of Akron, Pa. (1893-). Michael Horst (1854-1915) was preacher at Peabody, Kan., for many years. Levi Hurst (1903-) and Simeon Hurst (1913-) are missionaries to Tanganyika, Africa. A number of other members of this family are serving in the Mennonite ministry in the United States and Canada. Irvin Horst is a professor at Eastern Mennonite College. J.L.H.

Horst, ter, a Dutch Mennonite family, originally living at Hengelo, province of Overijssel, where its members together with the ten Cate (q.v.) family, predominated in the congregation during the 18th century. About 1600 Jan ter Horst at Hengelo was a Mennonite and a weaver by trade. At the beginning of the 18th century the meetings of the congregation were regularly held in the house of Berend ter Horst, also a weaver. Many of this family were deacons, among whom should be mentioned Abraham ter Horst (1715-79), who was a pillar of the congregation. Since the end of the 18th century members of this family have spread all over the Netherlands. vdZ.

Uit het Verleden der Doopsgezinden in Twenthe (Borne, n.d.) 14, 115 f., 137 f.

Horst, Klaas van der, b. 1731 at Amsterdam, d. May 1, 1825, at Haarlem, studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary 1747-52 and was a minister of the Dutch congregations of Goes 1752-57, Zwolle 1757, Leiden 1757-61, and Haarlem—Flemish-Waterlander congregation (Peuzelaarsteeg congregation) 1761-84 and United congregation of Haarlem 1784-1803. He published only a sermon, which had been preached on the occasion of the union of the two Mennonite congregations of Haarlem into one on Nov. 7, 1784. A sermon on John 15:14, preached on July 5, 1767, is found in manuscript in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. IV, 314 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 725; Naamlijst 1804, 63 f.; 1829, 25.

Hortensius, Lambertus (1500-74), a Dutch historian, studied at the school of St. Jerome at Utrecht, then at the University of Leuven, in 1527 was employed as a teacher in the school of St. Jerome, was here dedicated as a priest, served from 1544 as rector of the Latin school at Naarden, in 1572 lost his entire estate by plundering Spanish soldiers, and died on the near-by country estate "de hooge Eng" or "Crayl" in 1574.

One of his several works is of interest to us: Tumultuum anabaptistarum liber unus (Basel, 1548). This booklet of 84 pages is dedicated to the mayors and the council of Amsterdam. It endeavors to increase the fame of the council by bringing into prominence its wisdom and energy in mastering the Anabaptist attempt at a coup d'état, in contrast to the negligence and foolishness of the government of Münster. After a brief reference to the origins of the Anabaptist movement, which he finds in a miscomprehension of Luther's Von der Freiheit eines Christenmenschen, Hortensius presents a detailed account of the events in Münster in a smooth and skillful style in Latin, without division into chapters or sections. The result is a graphic and impressive description of the affair, which explains the remarkable influence the book enjoyed for centuries. Its historical value is slight. The first Dutch translation, Het Boeck . . . van den Oproeren der Weder-dooperen (Enkhuizen, 1614), quarto size, 53 pages, contained 8½ remarkable full-page hand-colored illustrations in five colors (copy in Goshen College Library). Later Dutch editions appeared in 1624, 1660, 1694, and 1699. The Histoire des Anabaptistes, published anonymously at Paris in 1695, is in effect a translation of Hortensius. Neff, H.S.B.

C. A. Cornelius, Die Geschichtsquellen des Bistums Münster II (Münster, 1850) II, p. XXVIII; Mees, "Lambertus Hortensius . . . als geschiedschrijver," Nieuwe Verh. v.h. Prov. Utr. Gen. XI (Utrecht, 1838); ML II, 348.

Horton Mennonite Church (MC), located at Whitmer, Randolph Co., W. Va., is a mission church of the Middle District of the Virginia Conference.

The meetinghouse was originally a Presbyterian church, but when the large sawmill operations were discontinued in that area, and people left the community by the hundreds, the Presbyterians sold their church to the Mennonites for fifty dollars in 1930. It has since been repaired and remodeled—the front lobby over which the bell tower and bell were placed was removed and a new entrance made which was more in keeping with the Mennonite faith and practice. In 1953 the congregation had a membership of 24, with Olin McDorman serving as pastor. H.A.B.

Hosauer, Sigmund (also Hasauer or Hassauer), a preacher in the Hutterite brotherhood. In 1555 he witnessed the martyrdom of Hans Pürchner (q.v.) of Saalen near Bruneck, who was seized at Kortsch near Schlanders in the Adige Valley, and was so severely racked during his trial that he was unable thereafter to use his hands or feet, and was finally beheaded. His death was commemorated by Hosauer in the hymn of 44 stanzas, "Fröhlich wollen wir singen jetzt," which describes all the details of the torture and death. It is found in the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 436-41. Here are also three other hymns by Hosauer (pp. 446-50): "Hör, o Himmel, und Erd merk auf," 18 stanzas; "Mein Sinn dahin steht alle zeit bereit," 11 stanzas; "Merk auf, o Gott, lass dir mein Stimm," 9 stanzas. In 1557 he was called as preacher; he received a final greeting of the martyr Klaus Felbinger (q.v.), and died in 1564 at Gosstal in Moravia. Loserth.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 306-7; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Klaus Felbinger's letter to Leonhard Sailer is published by Loserth in Ztscht für allgemeine Geschichte I, 451-54; ML II, 348.

Hosius, Stanislaus (1504-79), cardinal-bishop of Culm in West Prussia, Germany. He was noted for his hatred of the Protestants; he discusses Menno Simons in his book, Confutatio Prolegomenon Brentii (Antwerp, 1561). He names Hubmaier as the founder of the Anabaptist movement and ridicules the Biblical faith of Menno Simons, who seems "to surpass all his fellow believers in scholarship." He also discusses the Anabaptists in his De origine haeresium nostri (Louvain, 1559). Neff.

K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 322; DB 1872, 89; ML II, 348.

Hospitals. As followers of Christ, Mennonites the world over have always heeded the admonition that "faith without works is dead" (James 2:20), and that faith works by love (I Cor. 13). They have therefore always sought opportunities for service.

Through the years they have not only taken a vital interest in the work of hospitals but have also made it a major part of their conference and mission work. They saw in it opportunity to discharge their obligation to the sick by ministering to their physical needs, and at the same time to their spiritual needs; for when the physical needs of the body are met, the soul is in a receptive mood for those things which are eternal. Also they saw in the work of hospitals a field of service. Since they taught that a vital Christian life must express itself also in sacrificial service to others the work of hospitals offered a splendid field for this type of service and many have found opportunity to dedicate their lives to God in this field of activity.

The Mennonites of Russia were the first Mennonites to establish hospitals for their communities. Chortitza had a district (Zemstvo) hospital which, with its staff of doctors, was maintained by the Mennonite district (Chortitza volost). The Chortitza Mennonite industrialists maintained a doctor for their laborers. In the early days the hospital had ten beds, the number being increased later and a special maternity ward being added. Some of the doctors were Jakob Esau, Theodor Hoffmann, David A. Hamm, and Peter Zacharias. During World War I the Chortitza Mennonites maintained a 75-100 bed Red Cross emergency hospital in addition to the regular hospital. After the Revolution of 1917 these hospitals were nationalized.

In the Molotschna settlement the first hospital was established in 1880 by Franz Wall in Muntau. Under the able leadership of Dr. Tavonius this work expanded and became a great blessing to the community. Somewhat later Warkentin and his wife built a hospital in Waldheim, Molotschna. For some time this work was carried on, although under difficulties, but discontinued its services after World War I. With funds received from the H. H. Reimer estate the benefactors built a beautiful hospital in Ohrloff, Molotschna, which was opened for service on Jan. 7, 1910. In the same year a hospital was erected in Neu-Samara and about the same time Bethania (q.v.), a mental hospital, was established at Alt-Kronsweide, Chortitza. All of these institutions were nationalized by the Soviets after the Revolution.

In Holland and Germany the Mennonites limited their efforts in the care of the sick and the work of hospitals largely to the services which their deaconesses rendered.

In the United States the Mennonites have been quite active in this field. The first General Conference hospital, Bethesda, was established at Goessel, Kan., in 1900. Bethel Hospital was opened at Mountain Lake, Minn., in 1905; Bethel Deaconess Hospital at Newton, Kan., in 1906; the Mennonite Hospital at Beatrice, Neb., in 1911; the Mennonite Hospital at Bloomington, Ill., was taken over by the Central Conference Mennonites in 1919. The Mennonite (MC) Church established the Sanitarium and Hospital in La Junta, Col., in 1908. They have also taken over the administrative responsibility of a hospital at Greensburg, Kan., and one at Lebanon, Ore. They further established a mental hospital, "Philhaven," at Lebanon, Pa., in 1952. The Krimmer Mennonite Brethren established the Salem Hospital at Hillsboro, Kan., in 1917. The Church of God in Christ Mennonites established Mercy Hospital at Moundridge, Kan., in 1944.

In Canada the Mennonites (GCM) established Concordia Hospital at Winnipeg in 1928. Since then Bethania Hospital at Altona, Man., in 1936, Bethesda Hospital, Steinbach, Man., in 1937, and Bethel Hospital at Winkler, Man., in 1935, have been established, and also the Bethesda Home for the mentally ill at Vineland, Ont.

The work of hospitals also plays an important part in Mennonite mission work. The Mennonites (MC) have established hospitals in connection with their mission work in India, Africa, Puerto Rico, and Ethiopia. The General Conference also maintains hospitals in connection with its mission stations in Africa and India, as well as in China until that work had to be discontinued. The Mennonite Brethren have hospitals in India and Africa. The Dutch Mennonites had hospitals in their missions in Java (q.v.).

Another phase of the Mennonite hospital program was brought about by the work of the Mennonite Central Committee, which helped to establish hospitals for the Mennonite refugees who migrated to Paraguay.

In 1950 there were five colony hospitals in Paraguay: Fernheim (org. 1932) with 42 beds; Menno (1947) with 30 beds; Neuland (1948) with 40 beds; Volendam (1948) with 20 beds; Friesland (1949) with 20 beds; Primavera, the Hutterite hospital (1941), with 10 beds. The Krauel settlement in Brazil had a hospital at Witmarsum, established with the strong aid of the Dutch Mennonite relief organization.

A new interest was awakened in hospitals for the mentally ill after World War II, during which time many of the young men of military age did alternative service in our mental hospitals. As a result the MCC, upon authorization of its constituent groups, has sponsored the building and operation of three such hospitals. The first one, Brook Lane Farm, located at Hagerstown, Md., was opened in 1949. Kings View Homes at Reedley, Cal., was opened in 1951. Prairie View Hospital at Newton, Kan., was opened in 1954. H.J.A.

ML II, 556; M. Hottmann, "Dr. Theodor Hottmann," Menn. Jahrbuch 1953, 39-48.

Hostetler (Hostetter, Hochstetler, and many other variations), a family name occurring frequently among Mennonites (MC) and Amish in America. The earliest trace of the name appears in Switzerland, in the town of Guggisberg (canton of Bern) and the neighboring communities of Wahlern and Albigen. According to Christian Lerch, State Archivist at Bern, all Anabaptist-Mennonites of this name come from this locality, but only a small proportion of the Hostettlers (as it is spelled currently in Switzerland) were Täufer. The forms Hofstetter (q.v.) and Hostettler originated independently of each other, though the spellings appearing in early records are never consistent; it is a matter of speculation whether both come from the same root, i.e., "orchard." The first syllable of the name was written "Hoch" by those who went to Germany. The long-standing Hochstättlers of Münsterhof in the Palatinate and those in Regensburg in Bavaria trace their ancestry to Jakob, born at Lautenbacherhof near Strasbourg about 1765, and his father Isaak, who died at Neuhof near Strasbourg. Mennonites with this name are extremely rare in Europe today, and live chiefly in Bavaria near Regensburg. Two well-known Amish Mennonite preachers were Jacob Hochstättler of Münsterhof of Palatinate, and Peter Hochstetter (1814-85) of Regensburg, Bavaria.

Jacob Hochstetler (1704-76), an Amish Mennonite who boarded the English ship Harle at Rotterdam, came to Philadelphia in 1736 with 388 persons from the Palatinate and adjacent places, and settled north of Reading, Pa. The family suffered severely from an Indian attack near North Northkill in Berks Co., Pa., in 1757. The story is told in Harvey Hostetler's Descendants of Jacob Hochstetler. He is the ancestor of most of the large number of Amish Mennonites and Amish bearing the name. Families bearing this name are scattered all the way from Pennsylvania to Oregon.

The Hostetters in the Lancaster Mennonite (MC) Conference district must descend from a different immigrant from the Jacob mentioned above. A congregation of this conference near Hanover in York County is called Hostetter's (q.v.).

Among members of the family prominent in church life and work have been Bishop Jacob Hostetler (d. 1761) of the Hammer Creek district in Lancaster Co.; Bishop Jacob Hostetler (1745-1826) of the same conference, Manheim district; Bishop Jacob Hostetler (1774-1865), moderator of the Lancaster Conference; Bishop John Hostetler (1791-1866), of York Co., Pa.; Bishop Oscar Hostetler (MC) of Lagrange Co., Ind.; Amos Hostetler, a minister in Topeka, Ind., secretary of the Mennonite General Conference (MC) 1923-53; B. Charles Hostetter, a minister in Harrisonburg, Va., evangelist and radio preacher; J. J. Hostetler, a longtime city missionary (MC), Bishop John G. Hochstetler of Creston, Mont. (MC), Bishop Eli G. Hochstetler, Wolford, N.D. (MC), and Lester Hostetler, Freeman, S.D., a minister in the General Conference Mennonite Church. Prominent in the Brethren in Christ Church is Bishop C. N. Hostetter, Jr., President of Messiah College, Grantham, Pa., his father Bishop C. N. Hostetter, long president of the mission board, and his brother, Bishop Henry N. Hostetter, executive secretary of the mission board. J.A.H.

Two monumental genealogies were compiled by Harvey Hostetler: Descendants of Jacob Hochstetler (Elgin, Ill., 1912), and Descendants of Barbara Hochstedler and Christian Stutzman (Scottdale, 1938). Barbara was the youngest daughter of the 1736 immigrant Jacob. See also Mrs. Amos Hostetler, Descendants of David J. Hochstetler (Nappanee, Ind., 1953).

Hostetler, Pius (1867-1937), was born in Elkhart Co., Ind., on July 23, 1867, the seventh son of Christian J. and Magdalena Hershberger Hostetler. He was married to Ella Zook in Mifflin Co., Pa., on Feb. 15, 1892. They raised a family of two boys and three girls. He took a short normal course, taught school in the elementary grades, and was Sunday-school superintendent and chorister in his church. He wrote two books: The Life, Preaching and Labors of John D. Kauffman (1916), and Drifted (1916). He lived in Cass Co., Mo., from his youth until 1910, when he moved to Pryor, Mayes Co., Okla. In 1912 he moved to Shelby Co., Ill., where he died on July 2, 1937, and where he was buried. H.H.

Hostetler's Meetinghouse in Wilmot Twp., Waterloo Co., Ont., is the place of worship of a Reformed Mennonite congregation having approximately 50 members. The church was established in 1844.
J.L.K.

Hostetter Mennonite Church (MC), established in Union Twp., Adams Co., Pa., in 1845, is a member of the Lancaster Conference. The church has a cornerstone marked "Manosimon Meetinghouse Built A D 1854; Rebuilt 1899." This beautiful farming community was settled by Mennonites two centuries ago. The congregation met in private homes with Bair's Hanover and later a schoolhouse until 1854, when Bishop John Hostetter gave land for a church, and the first meetinghouse was built, later replaced by the present one. Services are held here every four weeks. It is part of the Hanover-Bair's Hanover circuit. In 1955 it had 111 members.
I.D.L.

Hotevilla is a settlement on the third mesa in the southern half of the Hopi reservation, seven miles from Oraibi (q.v.), made up of those who were driven out of Oraibi in 1906 by Hopis that were friendly toward the government. The work there had been begun by Marie Schirmer, with the assistance of John R. Duerksen who moved to Hotevilla in October 1919. He built a chapel and mission house near the village. Marie Schirmer resigned in August 1919, and the work of both Hotevilla and Bacabi was left to the Duerksens until 1929 or 1930. After that J. P. Suderman was responsible for this station and from 1949 Daniel Schirmer was there for several years. In 1953 Walter Goossen was stationed at Hotevilla. He was followed in 1955 by Herbert Peters.
W.K.

Hottinger, Hans, the night watchman of Zollikon in the canton of Zürich, and at the beginning of the Anabaptist movement allied himself with it. The court records name several persons of the widely ramified Hottinger family, who joined the Swiss Brethren. As a zealous advocate of church reform Hans Hottinger participated in the storming of the images in the church at Zollikon. Because of this act he had to defend himself before the court in December 1523.

After it had come to a break between Zwingli and some of the Brethren and they began to practice adult baptism, many inhabitants of Zollikon were baptized, Hottinger among them. Soon the government took steps to suppress the movement. Twenty-four Anabaptists were imprisoned in the Augustinian monastery until they were tried on Feb. 7, 1525. Hans, Jakob, and Conrad Hottinger and several companions stated that they had been baptized and were "servants obedient to God"; they wanted to do what God's Spirit directed them to do, and not allow any temporal power to force them from it. Where the Word of God did not interfere, they would be obedient to my lords.—They were then dismissed upon Urfehde and payment of costs and security of 1,000 guilders. They were also to be warned and rebuked for having done wrong and having acted "against God and against their neighbor with offense."

About this time a conference was held between Zwingli and the Anabaptists. Soon afterward, when the Brethren were conversing about the course of the proceedings, Hans Hottinger said Zwingli had asserted that there is no instance in the Bible that anyone had been baptized twice. But when the Brethren showed him the passage (Acts 19), he admitted it, indeed he had been partly convinced and would accept for himself "this godly life." When Hans Asper defended Zwingli and expressed his pleasure with Zwingli's sermons, Hottinger remarked, "I do not know why I should be happy. Today he preaches one thing, and tomorrow he retracts it. Years ago he preached that little children should not be baptized, but now he says they should be baptized. And when he says God has commanded that children be baptized, he lies like a rogue and a heretic." For this statement Hottinger was brought to trial on Feb. 25. He was released on promise to do better, but dismissed from his position as watchman.

In the following month (March) we find Hans Hottinger as a defendant in the great Anabaptist trial. With Manz and Blaurock, who had not been convinced of wrongdoing, he does not want to be considered in the wrong either. No one had instructed him "but Christ and His teaching, which is the true Word of God." He did not know whether he had been baptized as an infant, and had therefore let himself be baptized. At the close of the discussions, which lasted several days, Hottinger is said to have stated that he was satisfied with Zwingli's teaching and promised to be obedient to "my lords." It seems that he kept this promise and gave the authorities no trouble for several months.

When at the turn of the year 1525-26 Balthasar Hubmaier appeared in Zürich, he soon made his influence felt. In the court proceedings in the trial of Hubmaier in January 1526, Heini Aberli stated that the watchman Hottinger had received Hubmaier in his house. Then he related how the two (Aberli and Hottinger) had journeyed to Waldshut, and at a well Hottinger had said to him, "Who has anything against my being baptized?" Aberli then asked him whether he "believed in his heart." Hottinger answered affirmatively and fell on his knees, and asked him "with weeping eyes through God's will" to baptize him. He did so. From that date some of Hubmaier's influence may have remained with Hottinger, whose acquaintance he had made in Waldshut. When Hubmaier appeared in Zürich, Hottinger was one of the courageous advocates of believers' baptism. He was also among those sentenced on March 7, 1526, to imprisonment in the tower on bread and water, and beds of straw. In a book Hubmaier wrote against Zwingli, Ein Gesprech Balthasar Hubmörs von Friedberg auf Mayster Ulrichs Zwinglens Taufbüchlein, he describes the awful conditions of the imprisonment and names several of the prisoners, among them "Hansen Hottinger." On March 21, two weeks after the sentence, Hottinger is said to have returned again to the established church. Did he perhaps emigrate to Moravia? Loserth (Communismus, 42) mentions a Hans Hottinger of Brinelsdorf near Zürich, who lived at Scheidewitz in Moravia. (TA Zürich; ML II, 349.) S.G.

Hottinger, Jakob, of Zollikon, Zürich, a sponsor of church reform, as early as 1523 opposed the doctrine of transubstantiation and demanded the two forms of communion. Without consideration of circumstances he challenged the populace no longer to participate in the Mass, since the priests had hitherto deceived the people with it. There had been enough "looseness and idolatry." For this conduct he was punished with a prison sentence and a fine.

His radical view on the administration of the sacraments was not accepted by the church; he therefore joined the Anabaptists. When Kaspar Grossmann in a sermon on Jan. 16, 1525, defended infant baptism, Hottinger interrupted him and took issue with him on this point. The court records of the Anabaptist trial of Feb. 7, 1525, report that at a meeting of the Anabaptists in the home of Ruedi Thomann, Felix Manz baptized Jakob Hottinger and others with a dipper of water in the name of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost. There is also record of a meeting in Jakob Hottinger's house, where Conrad Grebel spoke on baptism and communion. They had then observed communion together. Grebel cut the bread and distributed it with the admonition that all who partook "should henceforth live a Christian life." In several weeks another meeting was held in Jakob Hottinger's house, at which Blaurock baptized Heinrich Aberli (q.v.) with a handful of water, after Aberli had confessed his faith in the finished sacrifice of Christ.

A distinguishing feature of these meetings is the emphasis placed on the inner state of faith before baptism or communion, not only by the leaders, but also by the rank and file. We read, for example, that Jakob Hottinger and Blaurock met in the evening in Aberli's house and conversed "about divine things" and then observed communion. One of those present had requested them to pray for him that God might strengthen him in the faith, so that he might be worthy to approach the Lord's table. Jakob Hottinger also stated that anyone who falls back into sin after baptism must according to Scripture be punished with the ban. "It is not the sphere of any government to administer the Word of God with force, for it is free" (Egli, Züricher, 96).

In a few instances Hottinger also baptized; one of these he baptized was his wife in Zollikon. In March 1525 he promised before the council to amend his conduct. But in June he was already publicly warning the churchgoers of the parson, the false prophet; he was punished by strict confinement on bread and water. After a period in prison Hottinger requested an audience before the clergy to discuss baptism with them. On this occasion he promised again to go to church, with the reservation that if the sermon did not seem Scriptural to him he would be permitted to discuss it with the preacher after the service. Under the date of June 1526 the records state the following:

"Jakob Hottinger, who about a year ago was converted from Anabaptism in writing and made a recantation in Zollikon, has recently been seized for falling back into Anabaptism. He says he ascribes it to God, who had at that time let him fall and then raised him up again; he would stay by Anabaptism."

He remained true to this intention for a long time. The last report we have of him is dated April 4, 1528: "Jakob Hottinger, who has long been confined on water and bread in the new tower on account of his participation in the disturbances of the Anabaptists, now promises to reform." He was released upon payment of a fine of five pounds, defraying his expenses, and the customary oath, with the urgent admonition "that he keep his sons, his wife, and servants from Anabaptism."

S.G.

E. Egli, Die Züricher Wiedertäufer zur Ref.-Zeit (Zürich, 1878); Fritz Blanke, Brüder in Christo. Die Geschichte der ältesten Täufergemeinde (Zollikon 1525), (Zürich, 1955); H. S. Bender, Conrad Grebel (Goshen, 1950); TA Zürich; ML II, 350.

Hottinger, Johann Heinrich (1620-67), a Swiss scholar who played a role of some importance in the negotiations between the city council of Zürich and the Dutch government on the persecution of the Anabaptists. In 1653, in the commission of the Zürich council, he presented his official opinion on the letter of a "sectarian from The Hague" to the four Protestant cities (Zürich, Basel, Bern, St. Gall), which sharply opposed religious persecution. In December 1663 he was authorized to send a letter to the States-General in Holland, defending the proceedings against the Anabaptists. He pointed out that toleration of the Anabaptists would jeopardize the national security and the existence of the Reformed Church. When in 1664 he was sent to Holland on a political mission he came in touch with the Mennonites living at Utrecht. They handed him a petition addressed to the Zürich council in favor of their persecuted brethren, whom he promised to support. Cornelius Bergmann assumes that he also negotiated with the Mennonites in the Palatinate. The subject deserves investigation. NEFF.

C. Bergmann, Die Täuferbewegung im Kanton Zürich bis 1660 (Leipzig, 1916) 149, 155 ff.; ML II, 350.

Hottinger, Johann Jakob (1652-1735), a Swiss church historian, the son of the above. He continued Joh. v. Müller's Geschichte der Eidgenossen and is the author of the book, Compendium historiae anabaptisticae, which does not claim special importance. (ML II, 351.) NEFF.

Hottinger, Klaus, one of the most zealous advocates of the Reformation in Zürich, participated in the destruction of the crucifix in Stadelhofen before the city gate, was consequently banished from the city for two years on Nov. 4, 1523, died at the stake cheerfully in Lucerne, March 26, 1524, as the first Protestant martyr of Switzerland.

He was closely associated with the founders of the Anabaptist movement, and it can be assumed that if he had lived longer he would certainly have joined it. NEFF.

E. Egli, Schweizerische Ref.-Gesch. I (Zürich, 1910) 254 f.; ML II, 351.

Hotz, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of the Grüningen district of the canton of Zürich. He was probably baptized by Georg Blaurock. It is possible that Hotz was converted in 1525, during Blaurock's successful missionary activity in Grüningen. From that time on Hotz was an inspired defender of Anabaptism. Through the work of such men as he and Jakob Falk (q.v.) and Heini Reimann, the movement continued to gain ground in Grüningen so that great numbers of people flocked to hear them preach.

Meanwhile the Zwinglian church had established itself as a state institution and attacked "corner preaching and rabble-rousing," which had grown to considerable proportions in Grüningen. The council of Zürich also decided to put an end to the "Anabaptist mischief" in the Zürich Oberland. The leaders of the movement were arrested, tried, and sentenced. It is not definitely known that Hans Hotz was one of those sentenced by the council of Zürich on March 7, 1526 (see Blaurock). It is nevertheless safe to assume that in 1526 he was still in prison with Georg Blaurock; for in the court records of a later trial is found the following statement: "Hans Hotz in the Ketzerturm says: 'Blaurock first taught him and also strengthened him, likewise Felix Manz. Thus they all encouraged one another in the tower. He holds infant baptism to be an error, and rebaptism right.' "

As soon as the prisoners were released from the Ketzerturm they renewed their missionary work. It cannot be definitely determined when Hotz was again arrested. In August 1528 he was cross-examined with several other brethren, after an imprisonment of nearly one and one-half years. Hans Hotz confessed that infant baptism was the false baptism and was not right; he had once called infant baptism right, but was now very rueful; nor did he want to hear the preachers. All the others likewise repented having called infant baptism right; it is an abomination before God, and baptism on faith is a command of God.

All the prisoners confessed that in prison they had strengthened and encouraged each other, well or sick, to be steadfast. They were therefore isolated in the various towers and monasteries in the city. For two weeks they were kept on bread and water. The leaders Falk and Reimann were then sentenced to death by drowning and were executed on Sept. 5, 1528. At a further trial the others were urged to be converted and return to the pastor in the church, to hear the Word of God and to recognize infant baptism. Probably the following undated notice in the records refers to this trial: "Hans Hotz said he considers the baptism with which he was baptized in his youth, as wrong and useless; but the other baptism that he received was right, and he does not suppose that he has done wrong. Nor did he want to go to church to hear words of idolatry." Those who refused to be converted and like Hotz persisted in Anabaptism should be kept in the tower on bread and water another month to think it over, and should then be tried again and sentenced. The final verdict concerning Hotz is not known. But it is certain that in spite of long incarceration he held fast to his faith.

But Hans Hotz did not share the severe struggles of the Anabaptist brotherhood only in his own community; his activity extended far beyond the borders of this canton. In the disputation at Zofingen (q.v.), July 1-9, 1532, as well as that in Bern (q.v.), March 11-17, 1538, Hotz was the spokesman of the Swiss Brethren. The adamant character of this warrior was so developed by experience and suffering that he became a quick-witted opponent of the church party. Unfortunately the records of these debates rarely name the speaker. One of the most important points the Brethren had to answer in Zofingen was "the divine call to the office of preaching." The preachers had charged the Brethren that their commission to preach the Gospel was not of God. No wonder that they answered their opponents that because they were not sent according to apostolic custom, their mission was not of God! Hans Hotz placed special emphasis on his belief that before a preacher could proclaim the Word he must experience a conversion or renewal of heart and he must then also be found blameless in his life. Those who were divinely called, were called by a believing brotherhood and not by a government.

Hans Hotz adroitly discussed the question of baptism. He admitted that baptism is the sign of a Christian people, with which we are received into the church of God. But this does not belong to little children, but only to those who experience salvation through faith. Hotz said, "It has not yet been proved that those shall also be received who do not have the faith; for baptism is always the sign of the renewed man, buried in the death of Jesus Christ, and always a certain announcement or testimony of resurrection through the death of Jesus Christ."

In the same tone Hotz defended baptism on faith in the disputation in Bern in 1538. The court record says, "This confession of Hotz was read to them, and then the presidents questioned the Anabaptists one by one. They all were satisfied and confirmed it; no one rejected it." After further debate Hotz said, "Therefore we hold baptism in the Christian brotherhood . . . as taught by Christ and practiced by the apostles. If anyone can prove otherwise by Scripture, we will wait for it."

Apparently the authorities were not pleased with the outcome of this disputation. The council decided that the nonresidents (of whom Hotz was one) should be escorted over the border, subject to death by beheading if they crossed it again, because they were "leading people astray." Nothing is known of Hotz's life after this disputation. S.G.

E. Egli, Die Züricher Wiedertäufer zur Reformationszeit (Zürich, 1878); TA Zürich; Müller, Berner Täufer; ML II, 351 f.

Houbakker, Joannes, a Dutch Mennonite preacher, b. April 18, 1685, at Amsterdam, d. there Dec. 14, 1715, who in spite of an early death occupies a place of honor in the Mennonite brotherhood of Holland. At the age of 20, having attended the lectures of Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) 1699-1705, he was provisionally appointed preacher of the United Flemish and Waterland congregation in Amsterdam (Lam and Toren congregation); he received the position permanently in 1711 after he had declined an offer from the Rotterdam church. He was known as an excellent pulpit speaker. After his death three volumes of his sermons, Predikatien over verscheide texten der H. Schriftuur, were published in 1730, 1732, and 1735. His picture in a steel engraving is found in Verzaameling van de Afbeeldingen van veele voornaame Mannen en Leeraaren (Amsterdam, 1743). vdZ.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis der Mennoniten III, 492-97; Biogr. Wb. IV, 325 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 686; DB 1918, 64, note 2; ML II, 352.

Houbraken, a Dutch Mennonite family of artists living at Dordrecht, province of South Holland. In the records of the "Lam and Toren" Mennonite congregation of Amsterdam, there are also found some van Houbrakens who were members of this congregation. Arnoldus Houbraken, b. 1660 at Dordrecht, moved to Amsterdam 1708, d. there 1719, wrote Groote Schouwburgh der Nederlandsche Konstschilders (1718, repr. 1758 and 1943). He also painted a number of portraits. His son Jacob Houbraken (1698-1780), who is well known for his engraved portraits, was Reformed. vdZ.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis III, 492; Biogr. Wb. IV, 325 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 686; DB 1918, 64 note 1.

House-Buyers, a group of Dutch Mennonites: see Huiskopers.

Households of the Hutterian Brethren: see Bruderhof.

Houten, Samuel van, a Dutch statesman, derived from an ancient Mennonite family. He was the son of Derk Hindriks van Houten and Barbara Elisabeth (Samuels) Meihuizen, and a direct descendant of the well-known Samuel Peter and Barbara Frey, who in 1714 emigrated from Gontenschwyl near Lenzburg, Switzerland, and settled in Holland with several other families for the sake of their faith (Müller, Berner Täufer, 322).

Samuel van Houten was born Feb. 17, 1837, at Groningen, received his Doctor juris in 1859. He was at first a barrister, and became a very well-known Dutch political leader. In his native Groningen he was a member of the church and city council. From 1869 to 1894 he was a member of the second chamber of parliament, 1894-97 Minister of the Interior, and 1904-7 a member of the first chamber of parliament. He was a liberal statesman in the style of 1848. Inflexible and independent, he never tried to favor any person or party. He was the instigator of the social laws of the Netherlands. When he was in the cabinet he initiated the election law named after him (de kieswet-van Houten). In 1866-73 he was a member of the A.D.S. (q.v.). He died in The Hague, Oct. 14, 1930. (ML II, 352 f.) J.Y.

Houttuyn, a Dutch Mennonite family, originally found at Hoorn, Dutch province of North Holland, of which some members were preachers in their native town and also at Amsterdam. Pieter Adriaensz Houttuyn (1683-1736) and Willem Houttuyn, a physician (1692-1756), were elders of the Frisian congregation of Hoorn (Willem serving 1721-56), while Adriaan Houttuyn (ca. 1700-77) was a preacher of the Waterlander congregation at Hoorn 1732-77.

This Adriaan Houttuyn was an adherent of Collegiant principles, and of baptism by immersion. He published Eenige redenen om de in- of onderdompeling te verkiezen boven de besprenging (Hoorn, 1752). He preached a sermon, Redevoering over Handelingen XVI:30-34, at Rijnsburg on June 2, 1770, when he baptized by immersion (published Rotterdam, 1770).

When the Frisian and the Waterlander congregations of Hoorn had merged in 1747 Willem Houttuyn and Adriaan Houttuyn were its preachers, and also Jacob Houttuyn, a son of Pieter Adriaensz, b. 1711 at Hoorn, d. there 1789, serving in 1746-89. A Frans Houttuyn of Hoorn (year of birth unknown), who may have belonged to this same family, settled in Amsterdam as a book printer and was a lay preacher of the Amsterdam Frisian ("Arke Noachs") congregation 1750-52, and after this congregation had merged with the Zonist congregation (1752) until his death in 1765. His son Martinus Houttuyn was a physician at Hoorn.

In Hoorn and Amsterdam a number of members of this family were deacons. The grandmother of J. G. de Hoop Scheffer (q.v.), noted Mennonite minister, historian, and professor of the Seminary and the Amsterdam University, was Aagtje Houttuyn of Hoorn (1752-1818), a daughter of Preacher Jacob Houttuyn. Pieter Houttuyn of Hoorn was an ardent Patriot (q.v.), who in 1787 together with P. Bel, another member of the congregation of Hoorn, fled from Hoorn to Brussels because of their anti-Orange principles. He was chorister (voorlezer en voorzanger) of the Hoorn congregation. vdZ.

Houttuyn family: DB 1867, 57, 70; 1898, 119; Pieter Adriaensz Houttuyn: DB 1887, 130 f.; Frans Houttuyn: Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1409; DB 1896, 12; Pieter Houttuyn: Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 178; Willem Houttuyn: Biogr. Wb. IV, 338; DB 1887, 130 f.; Adriaan Houttuyn, Biogr. Wb. IV, 337-38; J. c. van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (Haarlem, 1895) 193, 211.

Houwerzijl, a hamlet around a dike-lock in the Dutch province of Groningen, where already in 1660 and apparently much earlier there was a congregation of Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites. In this congregation of farmers in the 18th century the Rietema family produced three generations of preachers: Kornelis Jacobs, his son Jan Kornelisz, b. 1689, serving 1730-*ca.*1760, and his grandson Jacob Jan 1757-83.

The membership of Houwerzijl, about 70 in 1710, had by 1767 already decreased to 15 members, but seems by 1790 to have increased somewhat. During a terrible flood of the North Sea, which struck this part of the province of Groningen on Christmas Day 1717, 12 members and 7 children of the congregation perished. In 1773-78 the congregation merged with Ulrum (q.v.), but by 1794 the united congregation dissolved. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 127, 140, 142, 202; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 2287; DJ 1840, 43; DB 1879, 4; 1906, 46.

Hove, Peter (Pieter) ten. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror relates that Peter ten Hove, Huybert op der Straten, and two women, Trijnken, Huybert's wife, and Lijsken of Linschoten, were arrested, whipped, and expelled from Wittgenstein, Germany, by Johann, Count of Steyn. This account is, however, not clear. First it is rather strange that these four Mennonites with their typical Dutch names were living in Germany, but secondly, as Crous has indicated, Count Johann of Wittgenstein died in 1551 and the ruler in 1601 was Count Ludwig the Older, who with the aid of Olivianus (q.v.) gradually Calvinized the duchy. Neff.

Mart. Mir. D 803, E 1,102; Georg Hinsberg, Sayn-Wittgenstein-Berleburg I (Berleburg, 1920); ML III, 352.

Hovens, a Dutch Mennonite family, of which there were in the 17th century two branches, viz., at Haarlem and Utrecht. Later a lateral branch of the Utrecht family was also found at Haarlem. In 1632 Daniel Hovens, a deacon, signed the Dordrecht Confession for the Utrecht Flemish congregation. He became a minister in 1640, and retired in 1652. Johannes Hovens was a deacon of the Utrecht congregation 1680-82. The family was found there until the end of the 18th century. Daniel Howens Korn.zn. was a deacon of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation 1708-14. He was also a member of the Committee of Foreign Needs and its treasurer 1715-21. Enoch Hovens (1661-1742) and Daniel Hovens were preachers of the United Flemish-Waterlander congregation of the Peuzelaarsteeg at Haarlem, Enoch serving 1685-1735 (he died 1742), and Daniel 1731-ca. 1760. Enoch Hovens is the author of an important account of the history of the Mennonite congregation of Haarlem. This account, a letter to M. Schagen (q.v.), dated April 15, 1740, was published in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen 1863, 129-52. A preacher, Daniel Hovens Hz (q.v.), d. 1795, another member of this family, served a number of congregations. A side-branch of this family is the Hovens Greve family, of which there have been deacons until now. Koenraad Hovens Greve (1779-1874) of Haarlem served as pastor at Nijmegen 1812-14 and Zuidveen (since 1848 called Steenwijk) 1814-62. He served also at Giethoorn-Zuidzijde 1826-51, when he was succeeded by his son Abraham Kornelis Hovens Greve (1817-57), who had previously served at Noord-Zijpe 1850-51. vdZ.

Hovens, Daniel, a Dutch Mennonite preacher, b. 1735 at Haarlem, d. 1795, married to Susanneke Nieuwenhuyzen in 1755, became the preacher of the Frisian congregation of Barsingerhorn, province of North Holland, serving 1755-57. His conflict with a Reformed colleague on account of a Reformed girl who joined his congregation, shows him to have been peaceful but determined. He later served the congregations of Sneek 1757-61, Monnikendan 1761-64, West Zaandam "Oude Huys" (Frisian) 1764-70, and Leiden 1770-89. After 1789 he no longer exercised his preaching office, having accepted a political office in Rotterdam. During his term at Leiden he performed at least one (1777) baptism by immersion.

Among his colleagues he holds a high place in scholarliness and mental acuteness. His treatise Over het onderscheidende kenmerk der christelijke openbaring en derzelver verband met de Natuurlijke en Joodsche Godsdienst was awarded the gold medal by the Teyler Theological Association in 1781. The subject indicates the intellectual atmosphere in which Hovens lived. The same spirit is shown in a catechism he wrote: Lesboek voor de Kinderen der Christenen . . . (Leiden, 1787, 1794). He also published Onze tegenwoordige Toestand vergeleken bij dien onzer Voorouders in en omtrent het jaar 1574 . . ., and two addresses (Leiden, 1782). He served as a director of the Maatschapij tot nut van't-Algemeen in 1784, the second year of its organization. He had planned to enter the book business, but under the influence of Collegiant meetings, he devoted his life to theology. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. IV, 342-44; L. G. le Poole, Bijdrage tot . . . het kerkelijk leven onder de Doopsgez. . . . te Leiden (Leiden, 1905) Index; DB 1880, 84-90, 95; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 693; ML II, 353.

Howard (Pa.) CPS Unit No. 40, under MCC direction, attached to the U.S. Government Soil Conservation Service, was established in June 1942 and closed in June 1943. Leaders were in order Ralph Hernley and Jesse Short. The work consisted chiefly of operating the Howard Nursery of the Soil Conservation Service. The unit had ca. 50 men. H.S.B.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, 1949) 122.

Howard (R.I.) CPS Unit No. 85, attached to the Rhode Island State Hospital for Mental Diseases, under MCC direction, was established in February 1943 and closed in October 1946. Directors were in order Earl Heisey, Warren Leatherman, Willard Hunsberger, and Ernest Goertz. A special feature of this unit was the Relief Training unit January 1944-February 1945. A report in book form (The Seagull) was published by the unit. H.S.B.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, 1949) 228 f.

Howard-Miami County (Ind.) Amish settlement, north of Kokomo, was founded in 1848, largely by settlers from the Holmes County (Ohio) region. The division between the "Old Order" and "progressive" factions, which spread throughout the country, took place in the new settlement sometime between 1856 and 1863. The Old Order community almost died out but began to revive in 1887-90. It has never been large, and in 1955 had only two small congregations with a total of 88 members. The two Mennonite (MC) congregations of the area had 422 members, while the Beachy Amish congregation, organized in 1939, had 49 members. A small Conservative Amish congregation organized a few years before the Beachy Amish division failed to thrive. H.S.B.

Howard-Miami Mennonite Church (MC), located about 12 miles northeast of Kokomo, Ind., on the Howard-Miami county line, a member of the Indiana-Michigan Conference, was organized in 1848 by Amish settlers from Tuscarawas and Holmes counties in Ohio. The Sunday school was organized in 1869. The present building was remodeled in 1917. In 1946 the congregation began a mission station in near-by Kokomo. The settlements at Fairview and Pleasant View, Mich., were made by members from this congregation. In 1955 the total baptized membership of this congregation and its mission outpost was 422. The present bishop is Anson Horner; the ministers are Niles Slabaugh and Emanuel Hochstedler. E.S.R.

Mennonite Church History of Howard-Miami Counties, Indiana (Scottdale, 1916).

Howl Ranch (Tschetter), a Hutterite Bruderhof established in 1948 near Irricana, Alberta. It had a population of 76 in 1950.

Hoyte (Hoite, Huyte) Riencx (Renix, Renicx, Rienicks, Reincx), also called Hoyte Renix Santvoort, a Dutch Mennonite elder, a cobbler. The years of birth and death unknown; he died after 1600. Hoyte Riencx was ordained as an elder in 1555 by Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.), who had baptized him and of whom Hoyte remained a loyal follower. He lived at Bolsward (q.v.), a Dutch town in Friesland. K. Vos surmised that Riencx was present at the Mennonite conference of elders held at Wismar in 1554 or 1555, and may also have been present at a meeting of elders in Harlingen in 1557, where Menno Simons and Leenaert Bouwens disagreed on banning and shunning. K. Vos also supposed that a letter by Menno Simons (printed in Opera Omnia, 1681, 392) was addressed to Hoyte Riencx. In 1566-67, during the Frisian-Flemish troubles, he took the side of the Frisians, as did Leenaert Bouwens. In 1590, when the group of the moderate Young Frisians (q.v.) was founded by Pieter Willems Bogaert, Lubbert Gerritsz, and Jan Hendriks of Schiedam, Hoyte also joined this group. He was attacked by the Reformed ministers of Stavoren and Grouw, and in 1600 by Johannes Bogerman (q.v.) and Gosuinus Geldorp, Reformed ministers of Sneek.

Doreslaer-Austrosylvius mentions (pp. 151, 154) a writing by "H.R." of 1563, which had been approved by the Mennonite leaders of "Vrieslant, Hollant, Brabant, Groeningerlant ende Emderlandt." These initials apparently mean Hoyte Riencx.

Hoyte Riencx, though he played an important part in the Frisian-Flemish schism, seems not to have been a highly gifted man; his antagonists have described him as a haughty, narrow-minded man. vdZ.

BRN VII, 51, 62, 67 f.; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) passim, see Index; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, passim, see Index; DB 1893, 12-79 passim; A à Doreslaer and P. J. Austro-Sylvius, Grondighe ende Clare Vertooninge (Enchuysen, 1637).

Hrubcice (also Hrubschitz): see Rupschitz.

Hubbard, Oregon, a village (pop. 493) in the Willamette Valley in Marion County. Approximately 500 Mennonites live in the general area, largely of the M.C. group, and some of the General Conference Church. Most live east of Hubbard in two areas: one surrounding the Hopewell (MC) and the Zion (MC) congregations and the other about three or four miles further east near the Bethel (MC) congregation about 10 miles east of Hubbard. Only about 5 per cent of them live in or near Hubbard. The General Conference Church is near Barlow and Canby to the northeast. The area in which the Mennonites live is one of diversified farming and dairying, which includes berries, cherries, and other fruits, and small grains with some corn for feed; milk is sold on the Portland market about 30 miles to the north. Two tile and brick factories are owned and operated by Mennonites in the Zion community. A few are engaged in the lumbering industry; one large mill is owned by a Mennonite. Mennonites first came to this area in 1892 and held the first services in their homes. Some of the early names still found in the membership are Roth, Kropf, King, Hostetler, Lais, Yoder, Kenagy, Schultz, Strubhar, Burkholder, Hamilton, Nofziger, Rogie. The soil is very productive and well drained, and the climate is moderate with very few freezing days in the winter and few hot days in the summer. P.E.Y.

Huber, a name used early in the 19th century for the Mennonite (MC) settlement in Haldimand Co., Ont., near Lake Erie, where the Hoovers (Hubers) pioneered before 1800. The cemetery at the lake shore southeast of Selkirk village continued to be known as Huber far into the 19th century (see Rainham Mennonite Church). Preacher Jacob Swartz is recorded as buried at the Huber church in 1866. J.C.F.

Huber, Hans, a saddle maker of Strasbourg, one of the first members of the Anabaptist group at that place. He was baptized by Jakob Gross (q.v.). Because of his Anabaptist faith he was imprisoned at Lahr and then expelled from the city. At his trial in Strasbourg in 1527 he presented his views on the ban: Christians who do not live in accord with Christ's command should be expelled from the brotherhood, because one should not have fellowship with them. (Röhrich's article in Ztscht für die hist. Theol., 1860, 30, 35; ML II, 353.) Hege.

Huber, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr of Braunöken (probably Brauneck in Upper Bavaria, Germany), a cobbler, was seized at Wasserburg on the Inn in 1542 under Baron von Oettingen, having been recognized as an Anabaptist. All attempts to move him from his faith were futile; he was sentenced to death by fire. Even in the face of the terrible torture he remained true to his confession. On the fagots, when his hair and beard were already singed off, he was once more offered freedom if he would return to the Catholic Church. But he refused this pardon and died a martyr. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 152; Mart. Mir. D 63, E 466; ML II, 353.) HEGE.

Huber, Ulrich, an Anabaptist martyr of Rötenbach, Signau district, Switzerland, was executed at Bern for the sake of his faith in 1538.

Mart. Mir. E 1129; A. Fluri, Beiträge zur Gesch. der Täufer (Bern, 1912) 14; ML II, 353.

Huber, Wolfgang, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed in 1559 at Titmoning (Bavaria) with Wolf Maier (Mart. Mir. D 243, E 617; see Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 623, where two hymns written by the latter with a later supplement about their death are printed, both with the title, "Wo soll ich mich hinkehren"). (ML II, 353.)

Huber (MC), a "preaching appointment" in York Co., Ont., which appeared in the Calendar of Appointments for 1854. In 1858 the meeting place was given as Whitchurch Twp., which is north of Markham. The Mennonite minister Martin Huber (Hoover) resided near the present village of Gormley for several years before moving to Indiana in 1857. It appears that services were held in or near his home before he left this section. The name Stecklin is later used in referring to this settlement. Stecklin alternated in services with Huber before the building of the Almira Mennonite Church in 1860. The Steckley pioneers lived a few miles east of Huber at Bethesda village. (See Stecklin.) J.C.F.

Hübert, Heinrich (1810-95), the first elder of the Mennonite Brethren Church, was born in Münsterberg, one of the newer villages of the Molotschna settlement in southern Russia. From here he moved to Liebenau, where he became the manager and owner of a treadmill, and served as presiding officer of the village council for a number of years. In 1861 he sold his business interests at Liebenau largely because of the pressure of his creditors, no doubt due to his affiliation with the newly organized Mennonite Brethren Church. Later on he changed his residence to Blumenort, and from there moved to the new Kuban settlement in 1873.

Hübert received his education in the Zentralschule of Ohrloff under Tobias Voth, who inspired in Hübert a love for music, poetry, and nature study. Hübert was a habitual reader of the new books from the circulating library sponsored by Voth, and was inspired by the writings of men like Hofacker, Krummacher, and Spurgeon. In his home congregation, the Ohrloff Mennonite Church, he was held in high esteem until he became a signatory of the Ausgangs-Schrift of the newly formed M.B. Church on Jan. 6, 1860. Hübert's part in the first struggles of this new movement is not exactly known, but his name is affixed to such documents as the Ausgangs-Schrift, addressed to the Mennonite elders of the Molotschna; the explanation of the Brethren written to the leaders of the churches of Ohrloff and Halbstadt on March 19, 1860, in which they replied to the charges that the new group was interpreting the Bible one-sidedly, and respected no existing church organization; the explanation to the Fürsorgekomitee; and the inquiry directed to the Mennonite elders of the Molotschna on Jan. 1, 1861, requesting permission to move away from the Molotschna settlement.

May 30, 1860, was designated by the new church for the election of ministers in the home of Jakob Reimer, where 27 members cast their votes, 24 for Heinrich Hübert as the first preacher of the M.B. Church. Hands were laid on Hübert by the oldest brother of the group, Franz Klaassen, of Elisabethtal. He was ordained elder in 1868 in the home of Cornelius Neufeld in Neukirch by Johann Fast of Rückenau.

Movements of a highly emotional nature (die Fröhlichen), which threatened to make inroads upon this new group, were firmly restrained and in 1862 officially condemned by Heinrich Hübert and his assistant, Jakob Becker.

When Hübert was imprisoned at Tokma by the Russian government on a false charge that he had baptized a Russian, the emotional forces gained control and dismissed Hübert from his office. His case was reviewed, however, in 1865, and repentance on the part of those responsible for ousting Hübert opened the door for his reinstatement. The group, not knowing what to do, cast lots which turned in favor of Hübert's reinstatement. When released from prison he resumed his duties until he emigrated to the Kuban settlement, after having ordained Abraham Schellenberg, the elder of the M.B. Church in the Molotschna. In the Kuban area he was leader of the M.B. Church until May 1877, when he ordained Daniel Fast as his successor and retired because his health had been seriously impaired during the ten months of imprisonment. In 1895, at the age of 85, he died.

Hübert is said to have been the deepest thinker in the Brethren group of that time, and, although he was handicapped in his public ministry because of a weak voice, his sincere faith more than compensated for this deficiency and succeeded in inspiring faith and Christian living in the newly formed M.B. Church.† J.J.T.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 776, 154; Johannes F. Harms, Gesch. der Menn.-Brüdergemeinde (Hillsboro, 1924) p. viii and p. 342; P. Regier, Kurzgefasste Gesch. der Menn. Brüder-Gemeinde (Berne, 1901) 97; F. Isaak, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Elkhart, 1908) 354; P. E. Schellenberg, "Makers of Our Church," Tabor College Herald I, No. 1 (October 1930) 21-27.

Hübert, Johann (d. 1944), was born in Steinthal, Russia. After some study in Russia and Holland he was sent out in 1893 by the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association to its missionary fields in what then was called the Dutch East Indies; he settled at Kedungpendjalin on the island of Java, where he was active in teaching and evangelizing without interruption for a period of more than 15 years. He also founded a little hospital at Kedungpendjalin, of which he was the manager until 1938. In September 1908 he returned to Europe, visiting Holland, Germany, and Russia. In April 1910 he again went to his post. In course of time his field considerably expanded, a number of new posts at Margakerto and other places being founded. In 1938 Hübert resigned because of advanced age. He was succeeded in this territory by Otto Stauffer (q.v.). When Stauffer was arrested in 1940, Hübert served again until the Japanese invasion of Indonesia made all activities impossible in 1942. He died in Indonesia in 1944. vdZ.

Reports of the Doopsgezinde Vereeniging tot . . . Evangelieverbreiding.

Hubmaier (Huebmör), Balthasar (1480?-1528), an Anabaptist leader 1525-28, particularly in Moravia, where he was the head of a large congregation 1526-28, outstanding for the number and importance of his writings, but of no great permanent influence on the later Anabaptist-Mennonite movement, since he diverged from the main line of Anabaptists on the question of nonresistance, and his group of "Schwertler" did not survive his death more than one or two years. He has been variously evaluated. Some have judged him solely by his attitude in the confusion of the Peasants' War, others see him only in his reformatory work in the church. The Baptists in general have viewed him as their great hero among the Anabaptists and celebrated the 400th anniversary of his martyrdom with a special observance in Vienna in 1928. The following presentation, which is based on an objective examination of his works, and which does not leave his opponents out of consideration, will show that he did not advocate radical views, either in the realm of society or the church. His motto was "The truth is immortal." He strove toward it. The truth, he says, occasionally lets itself be captured, yea lashed, crowned, crucified, and buried, but on the third day it will rise victorious, and reign in triumph. This striving of his for the truth becomes evident in his course in life and his teaching, and for it he went to his death with courage.

I. Hubmaier's Life and Teachings. The date of Balthasar Hubmaier's birth is not known. It is assumed that it was in the early 1480's. His native town was Friedberg near Augsburg. His contemporaries called him Pacimontanus after the former, or Augustanus after the latter. He called himself usually Huebmör (as the Geschicht-Buch spells it) or Huebmör von Friedberg. He probably received his early education at home; he attended the Latin school in Augsburg. To his contemporaries we owe a description of his appearance and his personality. He was of short stature and swarthy; when he is described as being proud, it must not be overlooked that this description was given by an opponent.

At Easter 1503 Hubmaier matriculated at the University of Freiburg, Germany, where Eck, later the opponent of Luther, acquired powerful influence over him, and praised him for his rapid progress. In genuine devotion he pursued his theological studies. Lack of funds compelled him to accept a position as a schoolteacher (1507) in Schaffhausen, but he soon returned to Freiburg, took his baccalaureate in 1510, and was ordained to the priesthood. When his teacher Eck went to Ingolstadt, he followed; and there he received the honor of a licentiate, then of a Doctor of Theology. In 1515 he was prorector of the university, and a year later, because of his pulpit eloquence, he was given the honorable position of pastor and chaplain in the ancient cathedral in Regensburg. The populace of Regensburg was involved in a dispute of long standing with the Jews; in it Hubmaier took an active part. It ended in the expulsion of the Jews and the razing of their synagogue; in its place a chapel "zur schönen Maria" was erected, where according to the credulous public there was no lack of miracles; this led to a great concourse of pilgrims and rich gifts for a church. Hubmaier, as the first chaplain of the chapel, kept a record of the supposed miracles. The pilgrimages to Regensburg caused some excitement which resulted in some coarse abuses, for which Hubmaier blamed the eccentric character of the pilgrims.

These events in particular, then also the insecurity of his position, led Hubmaier to accept a pastorate in Hapsburg territory, in the town of Waldshut in Breisgau, situated at an important ford in the Rhine. He preached his first sermon there in the spring of 1521. He was still loyal to his Catholic faith when the Reformation movement had made itself felt in all parts of the Holy Roman Empire, punctiliously observing all the customs of the church, and won the complete confidence of his congregation. But by the summer of 1522 he had begun to change. He studied Luther's writings, made connections with the friends of the Reformation, and engaged in a study of the Pauline epistles. Soon a new call to the Regensburg church reached him and he accepted. But there was already some evidence of his leanings toward the new doctrine. His position became equivocal, and even before the year contracted for had expired he returned to his pastorate at Waldshut, which had been held open for him.

The change in his religious convictions, which drew Hubmaier in the direction of the Swiss rather than to Luther, he now expressed without hesitation. He opened correspondence with the Swiss reformers and in 1523 discussed with Zwingli the passages of Scripture on baptism. "Then Zwingli agreed with me, that children should not be baptized before they are instructed in the faith." Then he began some innovations in Waldshut. Of decisive importance was his participation in the disputation held by order of the Zürich council in the city hall on Oct. 26-28, 1523. Here Hubmaier expressed himself sharply in opposition to the abuses in the Mass and the worship of images. He declared that the Bible alone must decide such questions; the Mass is not a sacrifice, but a proclamation of Christ's testament, which commemorates His bitter suffering and His sacrifice of His life; as a sacrificial offering the Mass benefits neither the living nor the dead. "Just as I cannot believe for another, neither can I hold a Mass for another." Concerning the worship of images he cited the Scripture that a carved or graven image is an abomination to God.

As a pulpit orator Hubmaier received great applause. His attitude in Zürich met with the disapproval of the Austrian government, which painfully watched the progress of the new ecclesiastical movement in its outlying lands. But Hubmaier continued on his way. In the spirit of Zwingli he delivered his 18 Schlussreden concerning the Christian life, which he hoped would win the clergy of Waldshut. The citizenry was already on his side. His connections extended over a large portion of South Germany. But the Catholic party was not idle. Sharply worded letters from secular as well as spiritual authorities demanded the removal of Hubmaier. So much the more expressly he worked for the Reformation in Waldshut, conducting the religious service in German, and abolishing the laws on fasting and the celibacy. He married Elisabeth Hügeline, the daughter of a citizen of Reichenau, who willingly and bravely shared his later lot. All the attempts of the government to restore the old order of things in Waldshut failed; it therefore decided to compel the city to obedience by the use of force. Then Hubmaier requested his own dismissal.

On Sept. 1, 1524, he left Waldshut for Schaffhausen. But he was not safe there either. "Very soon," he wrote, "warnings were brought to me that I was to be arrested." The government opened negotiations with Switzerland, but since Hubmaier had settled in Schaffhausen "in der Freiung" the city refused to deliver him into the hands of Austria. In three written Erbietungen he declared himself ready to defend what he had been teaching for two years; and in order to defend himself against the charge of heresy he wrote his booklet Von Ketzern und ihren Verbrennern. His opponents were meanwhile incessantly working to have him extradited. Not feeling secure "in der Freiung" he returned to Waldshut. The city, threatened with a heavy fine by the government, and hoping to find outside assistance, was now in open opposition to the government. Hubmaier became the soul of its resistance, and now completed the Reformation of the church in Waldshut.

He still adhered to Zwingli's party. But Zwingli was already meeting opposition in Zürich; his opponents accused him of not holding earnestly to the cause, and wanted him to separate from the ungodly and to gather a brotherhood of the true church of God. The leaders among his opponents were Conrad Grebel (q.v.), Felix Manz (q.v.), Georg Blaurock (q.v.), and Wilhelm Reublin (q.v.), who, according to the Geschicht-Buch, "did not recognize infant baptism as a true baptism and demanded that one must and should be baptized in accord with Christian order and the institution of the Lord," i.e., be taught, and then baptized.

These Anabaptists found in Hubmaier their champion. On Jan. 17, 1525, the well-known disputation was held in Zürich to settle the question, which, though its outcome was officially a victory for Zwingli's side, nevertheless won new adherents to the Anabaptist movement. Hubmaier now also in actual practice dropped infant baptism, baptizing only the children of such parents as were still weak in the faith and therefore desired baptism for their children. Anabaptists came to Waldshut and on Feb. 2, 1525, Hubmaier published his Oeffentliche Erbietung, offering to prove in a public debate that infant baptism had no foundation in Scripture. But his request for a disputation was apparently not granted. Hubmaier's step had the support of a large part of the citizenry, but drew upon him the hostility of the Swiss reformers. He undertook further reforms in the order of divine service; after a period in which he conducted the Mass in German, he abolished it altogether and had the altars removed from the church, observed communion as practiced by the apostles, and finally, in accepting baptism by Wilhelm Reublin at Eastertime, openly joined the Anabaptists.

The opposition of the Anabaptists had made of Zwingli an avowed champion of infant baptism. In reply to his book, Von der Taufe, der Wiedertaufe und Kindertaufe, Hubmaier wrote his booklet, Vom christlichen Tauf der Gläubigen, which is correctly regarded as the classic presentation of his teaching on baptism and as one of the best defenses of adult baptism ever written. It was directed against Zwingli, although it does not mention him by name, and made a profound impression on both friend and foe. Zwingli took up arms against it, and the council of Zürich thought it necessary to arrange another disputation, which was held on Nov. 6. Public opinion acclaimed Zwingli as the victor. Grebel, Manz, and Blaurock were summoned before the council and warned to desist from their teaching, and because they did not heed the warning they were taken to prison, so that if they persisted in separation, they should be most severely punished. Adult baptism and the postponement of infant baptism were forbidden. Zwingli's booklet against Hubmaier is dated Nov. 5, and Hubmaier's refutation, Nov. 30, but the latter was not published until the following year at Nikolsburg in Moravia, after misfortune had descended upon Waldshut and its preachers.

Of equal significance with his religious activity was Hubmaier's political position. There is no doubt that he encouraged the city of Waldshut in its resistance against the Austrian government which led to armed intervention, and himself took part in the preparations for battle. Contemporaries and later writers have actually considered him the instigator of the Peasants' War. Thus the chronicler Letsch says, "and if one thinks this matter over properly, this Doctor Balthasar is a beginner and originator of the whole Peasants' War."

Wherever Hubmaier turned his steps later, this ill fame pursued him, and it did no good to resist it. In his booklet Eine kurze Entschuldigung, he said, "In being represented as an agitator, I fare as Christ did. He too had to be a revolutionary, and yet I testify with God and several thousand persons, that no preacher in all the regions where I have been has taken more pains and done more work by writing and preaching than I have that the government be obeyed; for it is of God. As concerns interest and tithes, I said that Christ also gave a third or a fifth. But the fact is: they tried to compel us to abandon the Word of God with force and contrary to law. This has been our only complaint." Likewise the people of Waldshut wanted to obey the house of Austria in all things, as their Erbietung says: "If there were a stone ten fathoms deep in the earth that was not truly Austrian," they would scratch it up with their nails and cast it into the Rhine.

Hubmaier expressed himself similarly in other writings. It has, of course, been demonstrated that he was not an instigator of the Peasants' War; nevertheless it is a fact that in Waldshut he was in close alliance with the peasants, supported them, and was aided by them. He assisted the citizens of Waldshut with counsel and helped them compose letters. He enlarged the peasants' Articles that came to his hands through the army, interpreted them, and told the people to accept them as Christian and reasonable. Much has been laid to his charge by his enemies, of which he was innocent. In Waldshut the point at issue in the entire conflict was not the removal or alleviation of feudal burdens, but, as Hubmaier expressly stated, the freedom of Protestant doctrine. If the people of Waldshut would only be granted religious liberty, they would be ready to fulfill all their obligations as Austrian subjects. But the government sought with a single blow to strike the peasants as well as the citizens of Waldshut who were fighting for the Gospel. It succeeded. First the peasants were defeated at Griessen, and then Waldshut was conquered.

With difficulty Hubmaier succeeded in escaping on Dec. 5, 1525. In flight and with tattered garments he went to Zürich. The city refused to comply with the demand of the Austrian government to extradite him, kept him in light confinement, and arranged a disputation between him and Zwingli, which was held on Dec. 21, 1525, but ended inconclusively. The city demanded that he recant, and he complied on April 15—not without severe qualms of conscience; for while he was on the point of renouncing his teaching on baptism he prayed that God might again establish the two bonds of the Christian faith, baptism and communion; even if through fear of man and weakness of mind he was forced to yield these points by tyranny, torture, sword, fire, or water, he prayed the merciful Father in heaven to raise him up again and not permit him to part from this world without this faith.

In spite of his recantation his position in Zürich was precarious, for he was in danger of falling into the hands of imperial or Swiss enemies. He finally managed to leave Zürich secretly. He went to Constance and from there to Augsburg, where he associated with zealous Anabaptists, and in the summer of 1526 he turned his steps toward Austria, via Ingolstadt and Regensburg. His goal was Moravia, where several creeds lived side by side without molestation. In Augsburg, among others, he baptized Hans Denk (q.v.).

Early in July 1526 Hubmaier arrived at Nikolsburg, which through his influence became for a time the center of the Anabaptist movement. Contemporary reports state that Hubmaier's presence there brought about an extraordinary influx of Anabaptists. About 12,000 are said to have gradually collected there and in the vicinity. The Geschichts-Bücher of the Hutterian Brethren also report, "In 1526 Balthasar Huebmör came to Nikolsburg in Moravia, began to teach and to preach, but the people accepted his teaching and in a short time many were baptized." This Moravian town became to the Anabaptists "what Emmaus was to the Lord, when He was asked to stay there." From all of South Germany they gathered and spread their teaching over all southern Moravia. Here they found the soil well prepared. The Protestants had formed a church here two years before, under the protection of the feudal lord, Leonhard von Liechtenstein; Hubmaier now made contacts with the preachers of this church, Hans Spitalmaier (q.v.) and Oswald Glait (q.v.). The provost Martin Göschl of Kanitz also promoted his cause. Anabaptists of established reputation, including some who suffered a martyr's death for their faith, like Hans Hut (q.v.), Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.), and Hans Schlaffer, came to the community. The printer Simprecht Sorg of Zürich, called Froschower (q.v.), who had been staying in Styria for some time, was now called in by Leonhard von Liechtenstein, brought his entire print shop with him, and published all the works Hubmaier wrote after leaving Zürich. Most of them are dedicated to the heads of the Moravian nobility, with the intention of winning their favor to the Anabaptist cause.

Not all the Anabaptists remained true to Hubmaier. Among his opponents was Hans Hut (q.v.), an apostle of the Anabaptists in Upper and Lower Austria, with whom many of Hubmaier's former friends sided, because in their opinion Hubmaier's program was too moderate. Hut had even before the Peasants' War preached the coming of the last day; he adhered to these chiliastic views, and opposed Hubmaier especially on the questions "of the sword," and whether war taxes should be paid. Hubmaier tried to remove the tension by means of a disputation, which was held at Bergen, a village near Nikolsburg. The discussion centered on community of goods and war taxes. The Anabaptists were faced by a dilemma by the demand for war taxes, for on the one hand they were compelled by law to pay them, and on the other hand their religious principles forbade warfare or the payment of taxes to wage war. The disputation did not achieve the desired result of unity. A second disputation ended similarly. Hans Hut was "held in the castle against his will by the lord of Liechtenstein, because he would or could not agree with him to bear the sword"; he was, however, released at night by a friend. Hut's opposition caused Hubmaier to speak of it openly once more in the "Spital," and in his final book he again discussed this controversy: he rejected all violence, to which Hut was evidently inclined, and told him and others this to their faces. From the cross-examination of an attendant at the Nikolsburg disputation it is learned that other subjects were also discussed there: baptism, communion, the Last Judgment, the end of the world, the new kingdom, and the coming of Christ. The Nikolsburg disputation attracted attention far beyond the borders of Moravia, as can be seen in the "Articles from Moravia," which claim to be the teaching of the Anabaptists, but which mingle much that is false with the truth.

The conflict between Hut and Hubmaier resulted in Hubmaier's publishing his teachings in a series of pamphlets; but, assured of the powerful support of the nobility he was also able to refute earlier rumors spread by his opponents. Thus in the short period of one year he published no fewer than 18 works, some of which he had written before coming to Nikolsburg. The first, probably finished at the end of November 1525 and published in July 1526, was his Gespräch auf Meister Ulrich Zwinglis Taufbüchlein von dem Kindertauf. When he wrote it he evidently did not yet know of Zwingli's sharp reply to his book Vom christlichen Tauf (see above), since he did not mention it. He complained about the severe suffering he endured in Zürich, where he "wished to present the proof in the divine Word that infant baptism is a work without any foundation in the divine Word." He complained further of Zwingli's severe attitude toward the Anabaptists, who, he (Zwingli) preached, should be beheaded. At Zwingli's instigation about 20 Anabaptists had been put into prison, there to die. At the same time an edict was issued which threatened all Anabaptists with drowning. In this manner he overcame the Anabaptists, but not a Scripture did he produce against them; instead, as he admitted in his booklet Von den aufrührigen Geistern, those who baptized children had no foundation for it in Scripture. "In my teaching," continues Hubmaier, "the Holy Scripture shall be the judge, in temporal affairs the government, to whom God has given the sword, to protect the godly and to punish the wicked." He did not want to take revenge on Zwingli, but only contribute to the re-establishment of the church. Four other booklets which were already finished, were to deal with these subjects: (1) a catechism or Lehrtafel, what a man should know before he is baptized with water; (2) what Christian water baptism is; (3) a Christian church order; and (4) a reply to the mocking speech of some preachers in Basel. Hubmaier had great expectations from this polemic against Zwingli: in six years no article had been published which offered clearer proof that infant baptism should not be permitted.

The booklet itself consists of five parts, of which the third is the most important, maintaining that one can become a disciple of Christ only by teaching and faith. When Jesus commanded that all believers should be baptized, all those were excluded who had not been instructed in the faith. To Zwingli's "most powerful argument," that the baptism of children (like circumcision with the Jews) is "an anhebend sign" whereby we obligate ourselves, Hubmaier replies: The child weeping in its cradle knows nothing of a sign, or a duty, or a baptism. In summary, Hubmaier teaches: (1) no element, only faith, cleanses the soul; (2) baptism cannot wash away sins; (3) it is therefore only a testimony of the inner faith and a sign of the obligation of a new life; (4) whether infants are God's children may be left to God; (5) Noah's ark rather than circumcision is a figure of baptism; (6) only adult baptism is founded upon Scripture. Infant baptism is not of God. Hubmaier asked where there is mention in the Bible of a godfather.

The four booklets mentioned are directly connected with this polemic against Zwingli. But first Hubmaier published a booklet dedicated to the provost Göschl, Der uralten und gar neuen Lehrer Urteil, dass man die Kinder nicht taufen solle, bis sie im Glauben unterrichtet sind. It is a collection of quotations which prove that in all periods outstanding men of the church have preferred adult baptism to infant baptism. Since every Christian must be instructed before he is baptized, Hubmaier wrote Eine christliche Lehrtafel, die ein jeder Mensch, bevor er im Wasser getauft wird, wissen soll. The foreword is dated Dec. 10, 1526. This Lehrtafel was intended to in general remove ignorance, namely, among the clergy. The depth of this ignorance he reported from his own experience: "With my own blush of shame I testify and say it openly, that I became a Doctor in the Holy Scriptures without understanding this Christian article which is contained in this booklet, yea, without having read the Gospels or the Pauline epistles to the end. Instead of living waters, I was held to cisterns of muddy water, poisoned by human feet." In the form of a dialogue between Leonhard and Hans (the Christian names of his sponsors in the house of Liechtenstein) he discussed the articles of the Christian faith.

The next book has the title Von der brüderlichen Strafe; it may be the same book that he had earlier called Eine Ordnung christlicher Kirche, and brought to Nikolsburg completed. It deals with the need for church discipline, and gives instructions for brotherly admonition. It was printed with Vom christlichen Bann early in 1527. It was followed by Grund und Ursach, dass ein jeglicher Mensch, der in seiner Kindheit getauft ist, schuldig sei, sich recht nach der Ordnung Christi taufen zu lassen, ob er schon 100 Jahre alt wäre. It was dedicated to Johann von Pernstein auf Helfenstein, the governor of Moravia. In it Hubmaier presented 13 reasons that obligate men to be baptized according to Christ's order, even if they had already been baptized in childhood. This book is a supplement to his Taufbüchlein, and was in all likelihood finished before 1526. It was not published until the following year.

The last book, the outline of which was drawn up in Switzerland, is the reply to the well-known book by Oecolampadius, and has the title, Von dem Kindertauf; Oecolampadius usw., Ein Gespräch der Prädikanten zu Basel und Balthasaren Huebmörs von dem Kindertauf. It is a refutation of the book by Oecolampadius, Ein Gespräch etlicher Prädikanten zu Basel, gehalten mit etlichen Bekennern des Wiedertaufs, which was published at Basel in 1525. Hubmaier defended his teaching that Christ ordained baptism for believers, and not for infants. He replied to Oecolampadius's objection that councils, St. Augustine, and the tradition of the church confirm infant baptism, with the argument that faith must be founded not on councils, nor on tradition, but on the Holy Scriptures. "If you can show me a single instance of infant baptism in the Bible, I am defeated. Anabaptist doctrine is therefore not new, but derives from Christ."

One of the books which Hubmaier brought to Moravia more or less completed has no polemic character. It is Zwölf Artikel des christlichen Glaubens zu Zürich im Wasserthurm betweis gestellt, Hubmaier's confession of faith. Here too his teaching on baptism and communion formed the basis for his arguments. He fervently prayed that God might re-establish the two bonds with which He has girt the church, viz., baptism and communion. The book was written April 15, 1526, and printed in 1527.

Written after this book, but published before it, was his Entschuldigung an alle christgläubigen Menschen, dass sie sich an den erdichteten Unwahrheiten, so ihm seine Missgönner zulegen, nicht ärgern, printed in 1526. It is a defense against the many untruthful charges made against him in four years. To this point he had patiently borne them, and would continue to bear them, but because so many spirits were offended by them he found it necessary to defend his innocence. He was accused of dishonoring the mother of God, of rejecting the saints, of discarding prayer and the confessional, fasting, the Church Fathers, the councils, etc., in short, of being the archheretic. He replied that his teachings were not innovations; he preached Christ and the Gospel, considered Mary both before and after the birth a pure virgin, honored the saints as God's tools, taught prayer without ceasing, fasted daily; confession must be made hourly; i.e., mourn one's sins; a rattling confession would of course not do; the teachings of the Church Fathers, councils, etc., he tested by the touchstone of the Holy Scriptures. He did not regard monks and nuns, taught the true baptism of Christ, which is ruined by infant baptism; the latter is a misuse of the name of God and a disparagement of Christ; of the Mass the Scriptures contain nothing; the "Pfaffenmesse" is of no more avail than the "Frankfurter Messe"; for at both one can buy and sell every day. If he was called an insurgent and a misleader of the people who preached against the government, he could testify with God and a thousand witnesses that he held the people to obedience toward the government; for it is of God. Without murmuring one must give the taxes, tithes, and tributes and pay it honor and reverence. He then enumerated the persecutions to which he was subjected by the Austrian government, and the slanders broadcast during his stay in Regensburg and Ingolstadt. He protested against the charge that he was a heretic, lamented Zwingli's tyranny without mentioning him by name. This book doubtless originated during his residence in Nikolsburg; it must have been of importance to him to prove that the slanders spread abroad were unfounded.

A considerable number of the works of Hubmaier that follow have didactic contents. His Kurzes Vaterunser (Nikolsburg, 1526) is a devotional booklet. In his Ein einfältiger Unterricht auf die Worte, das ist der Leib mein im Nachtmahl Christi (Nikolsburg, 1526) he shows "that the breaking, distribution, and eating of the bread is not the breaking, distribution, and eating of the body of Christ, who is in heaven seated at the Father's right hand, but that it is a memorial of His body, an eating in the faith that He suffered for us. And as the bread is 'the body' of Christ in memorial, so is also the blood of Christ a memorial." The book is dedicated to Leonhard von Liechtenstein, to whom a few words of appreciation are addressed, and Nikolsburg is compared with the Biblical Emmaus. In it Hubmaier opposed Luther's concept of communion no less than Zwingli's.

The next book, titled Eine Form zu taufen in Wasser die im Glauben Unterrichteten (Nikolsburg, 1527) and dedicated to "Johann Dubschansky von Zedenin und auf Habrowan," contains the baptismal ceremonies "as we apply them at Nikolsburg and elsewhere." Whoever wished to be baptized must notify the bishop, so that the latter might examine him to see whether he had been adequately instructed in the articles of the law, the Gospel, and the doctrine, whether he could pray, and with understanding state the doctrines of the Christian faith. If this was the case, the bishop presented him to the congregation, and urged all the believers to ask God to grant him grace. Then followed the formula of the prayer and the baptismal vow, then the baptism, laying on of hands, and the reception of the candidate into the congregation.

A similar purpose was to be served by Eine Form des Nachtmahls Christi (1527). It is dedicated to Lord Burian of Cornitz, a Moravian nobleman who was zealously devoted to the cause of the Reformation, and was sent to him by the (Bohemian) Brother Johann Zeysinger. Hubmaier referred to his booklet, Ein einfältiger Unterricht, as a dogmatic presentation of communion, and here presented "in what form communion is held in Nikolsburg." The church was to be called to a fitting place at a suitable time, the table set with ordinary bread and wine, which requires no silver goblets. The priest reminded the audience of their sins, explained the Scriptures that deal with reformation of life and the new birth, asked them individually whether a proper understanding was still lacking, and instructed them, then took the passage on communion and closed, "Let him who would eat of this bread arise and perform his duty of love with heart and mouth, declare his intention to love God and his neighbor, obey the government, submit to brotherly reproof, and desire to eat at the Lord's table." With a prayer of praise and thanks the communion was then taken. Then the congregation again assembled for the closing prayer and the repeated admonition to live a Christian life.

The booklet Von der brüderlichen Straf (Nikolsburg, 1527), which is probably identical with the Ordnung der christlichen Kirche, and was thus written in Waldshut, proceeds from the idea that "all labor and toil is in vain, baptism and communion futile, if church discipline is not practiced in the church as ordained by Christ; this has been clearly seen in the past few years, when the people, without changing their conduct in life, have learned nothing more than two things. One group says that faith alone saves; the other, that we of ourselves can do nothing good. Both statements are true, but under cover of these truths malice, faithlessness, and unrighteousness have become prevalent, and brotherly love has cooled off more than in 1000 years before. There is only one remedy: Openly committed sins must be punished as a deterrent to others; for such sins eat like a cancer if they are not rooted out; for what one does, the other considers permissible. Secret sins must be punished in secret, as the Lord commands; first before one person, then before two or three witnesses, and finally before the entire congregation. If the question is raised where anyone gets the authority to punish his brother, the answer is, from the baptismal vow, in which each obligates himself to live according to Christ's ordinances. When the brother has been punished in accord with Christ's regulation, and if he still will not forsake sin, then according to the command of Christ he must be excluded from fellowship and banned."

The booklet Vom christlichen Bann (Nikolsburg, 1527) appropriately continues the subject of punishment. It is therefore, says Hubmaier, necessary to know what the ban is, the source of the authority of the church, how banning should be carried out, and what to do with the excommunicated member. The ban is the public excommunication of the obstinate sinner from the Christian brotherhood, to the end that he will not give offense in the church, but will rather confess his sin and reform. Christ employed the ban both in word and deed and left it to the church, which then excludes the wicked, unfaithful, and disobedient from the Christian brotherhood. Concerning the form of the ban Hubmaier says that the brother to be expelled has broken the vow he made at his baptism and communion. Therefore the church is excommunicating him. With the expelled member no fellowship may be had henceforth; yet he shall not be treated as an enemy, beaten or killed, but avoided, for the punishment is not given in hatred, but in Christian love for the benefit of the sinner. Hubmaier does not neglect to point out the flagrant abuses that the clergy have practiced with their anathemas, usually pronounced with unchristian motives. If one did not immediately believe what church law commanded, he was from that hour placed under the false ban instead of the Christian, and the secular arm had to be his constable. The man, continues Hubmaier, is released from the ban when he confesses his sin and repents. Naturally if the great lords, nations, and cities refused to accept this regulation of brotherly punishment and of the Christian ban, then it is difficult to set up a Christian regime there.

With nearly the same words as in the book on brotherly punishment Hubmaier in his book Von der Freiheit des Willens (Nikolsburg, 1527), dedicated to Georg, Margrave of Brandenburg, says that the people have learned only these two things from the preaching of the Gospel: faith saves, and we have no free will. These statements are only half-truths, from which only a half judgment can be formed. Such half-truths do more damage than complete lies, for they are rated by their appearance of whole truths. People then push their guilt upon God as Adam did upon Eve, and she upon the serpent. To root out such blasphemy is the object of this book; this concept includes how and what man is and can do within and without the grace of God. Man consists of three parts, body, soul, and spirit. Therefore three wills must be recognized, that of the flesh, that of the soul, and that of the spirit. Before the sin of Adam all three parts of man were free and good. After his fall he lost this freedom: as a vassal who is untrue to his lord loses his fief not only for himself, but also for his heirs, so the flesh has lost its freedom through Adam's fall and must return to the earth whence it came. The spirit has remained good, but as a prisoner of the flesh had to eat too; the soul, becoming ill through Adam's disobedience, has lost the knowledge of good and evil and is powerless to carry out the good. Since the fall of man the flesh is useless, the spirit willing to do good; the soul stands between in concern; but, healed by Christ, it has again acquired its lost freedom and can willingly obey the spirit and will the good. Thus it depends only on the soul. According to its decision man is saved or damned. Through Adam's fall man received two wounds, an inner one, which is the inability to recognize good and evil; and an outer one, in doing and carrying out. The former is healed through the law, which teaches him to distinguish between good and evil; the other is healed through the Gospel. Thus no one can use lack of liberty as an excuse; for what Adam lost, Christ brought back.

Das andere Büchlein von der Freiwilligkeit des Menschen (Nikolsburg, 1527) was finished on May 20, 1527, and dedicated to Duke Friedrich von Liegnitz und Brieg. It shows, as is said in the title, that God through His Word gives men the power to become His children and commits to them the decision to will and to do good. It contains the passages of Scripture that show that before the fall man had the grace to keep God's commands and be saved; then those passages that show that man has regained the freedom lost through Adam. In the second part follow the conclusions, which show the purpose of the book most clearly. Some of these are as follows: He who knows what the new birth is will not deny the freedom of the human will. He who says that the flesh does not need to will contrary to its natural will or perform the will of the soul that has been awakened by God, gropes along a wall in midday. That lord is foolish who sets a goal for his people and says, "Go on, run that you may win," when he knows that they are in chains and are incapable of running. All things happen in accord with God's will: the good in the power of His word, the evil to punishment. God wills that men should do good; He also wills that he who will not do good be the master of his own works and do evil, that the forsaking of the good may be punished in him. We do not know whom God has elected and which of the two He will give, blessedness or damnation. In the third part he discusses the objections that have been made. He explains 16 situations. Thus if one says to him: God has mercy on whom He will and hardens whom He will, he replies: There is an absolute will of God which is subject to no rule, and a revealed will, which wants all men to be saved. Of course, God does not have two wills; this is a figure of speech so that we may understand.

Already in his Kurze Entschuldigung Hubmaier had expressed himself on the attitude of men to their authorized government and defended himself against the charge that he was a rabble-rouser and heretic. He develops this further in his Vom Schwert (1527), which he dedicated to Lord Arkleb von Boskowitz und Tschernahora auf Trebitz, chief Landeskämmerer of Moravia. He wished to present in it what had always been his conception of government. More earnestly than any other preacher he observed the Scriptures on government, but he also pointed out to the tyrants their vices. Hence the envy, hate, and hostility to him. Hubmaier first treats those passages with which his enemies attack him and then cites those which form the basis of his attitude. His opponents, for example, point out the passage, My kingdom is not of this world. If the kingdom of Christ is not of this world, then he would not be permitted to bear the sword. But the passage merely states that our kingdom should not be of this world. But alas, it is of this world, as we ourselves pray in the Lord's Prayer: Thy kingdom come. Or the opponents quote: Put up thy sword. But here Christ was merely saying that those should not bear the sword who are not entitled to do so; else they will perish by the sword. In the same manner all the passages are explained. For the affirmation of government among Christians Hubmaier cites the verse: Let every soul be subject to the higher powers. For there is no power but of God. This passage alone is sufficient to establish the government against all the gates of hell. Subjects should, of course, examine the spirit of their governments, whether they rule out of pride, envy, hatred, or self-seeking rather than for the common welfare and peace. This is not bearing the sword against the government. But when the government punishes the evildoers to create peace for the good, then help, then advise, then support, as often as it is asked of you. Only when the government is childish or foolish or cannot reign wisely, then if one can legally escape it is good to do so, for God has often punished an entire country on account of a bad government. But if it cannot be done without insurrection, then endure it. No doubt this booklet was intended also to make good the impression that the Nikolsburg disputation must have made on the ruling classes.

II. Hubmaier's Arrest, Imprisonment, and Martyrdom. While Hubmaier was increasingly promoting his teaching, the Anabaptist movement with its elemental force spread throughout the Austrian hereditary lands. From all sides reports reached the government on the success of the Anabaptist movement and advice for its suppression. Ferdinand I had after the death of King Louis of Hungary and Bohemia in the battle of Mohács acquired these lands and it was doubtful that he would deal as tolerantly in Moravia as his predecessors had done. He was particularly disquieted by the reports he received from the Austrian authorities. He did not fail to issue edicts for the suppression of the Anabaptists. On Aug. 12, 1527, he sent a letter to the citizens of Freistadt in Upper Austria with the command to seize Hans Hut, Hubmaier's former associate. But more important to the government than Hut's capture was the capture of Hubmaier, its old opponent from the time of Waldshut, to whom, according to a contemporary eyewitness, masses of people were streaming from the adjacent regions. Hubmaier had no intimation of the danger hovering over him when he signed the foreword of his book on the sword. Four weeks later he found himself imprisoned in Vienna. The details of his capture are not known. The Geschichts-Bücher only record that Ferdinand I had cited Hans and Leonhard von Liechtenstein to Vienna together with their chaplains. "From that hour Balthasar Huebmör with his wife was seized and sent to the Kreuzenstein castle." Hubmaier's extradition was not so much a consequence of his religious work as of his political activity in Waldshut; for the persecution of Anabaptists was not permitted in Moravia until after the edict of the diet in March 1528. Some manuscripts of the chronicles state that Hubmaier was forged to a wagon when he was seized in Nikolsburg, and was thus taken to Vienna. That in the Hubmaier affair the primary issue was his political activity in Waldshut is seen in the command Ferdinand issued to his government in Ensisheim to conduct a careful investigation of Hubmaier's actions in Waldshut, where he caused insurrection and revolt among the common people. His teachings occupy a subordinate place; certain individuals in Waldshut are to be questioned about them. The government in Ensisheim as well as that in Innsbruck complied with the order. Two "witnesses" in Hubmaier's own hand are sent in, one of which had much to say "against Luther"; the second indicated "that his spirit had tended to awaken insurrection against the government"; those in Waldshut had been the first and the last to persist in it and conduct themselves according to the Doctor's teaching.

Kreuzenstein is a castle in Lower Austria, now newly rebuilt from its ruins, three quarters of an hour north of Korneuburg. When Hubmaier was taken there is not certain. It is only known that he lay in prison in Vienna several weeks. But at the turn of the year he was in Kreuzenstein; for from that place on Jan. 3, 1528, he sent his booklet, Eine Rechenschaft seines Glaubens, to Ferdinand I. Kreuzenstein was at that time a possession of Niklas, Duke of Salm, but was used as a state prison, and was in a bad state of repair.

Stephan Sprugel, the contemporary and eyewitness of Hubmaier's execution, reports that Hubmaier enjoyed numerous visits by learned men of good repute, who, with good intentions and sympathy urged him to renounce his errors. Hubmaier himself bemoaned his strict confinement. Illness and other difficulties had come upon him, and he suffered from want of books. The prospects for release were not favorable, even if he would recant, because of his activity in Waldshut.

In his need Hubmaier cast his longing glances upon Johannes Faber (q.v.), his erstwhile fellow student and friend, but now his opponent, and addressed a petition to King Ferdinand to grant him a conference with Faber. This was granted. Faber described the course of his conversation in his booklet, Adversus D. Balthasarum Pacimontanum . . . orthodoxae fidei catholicae defensio. He had gladly acceded to Hubmaier's wish, for he had known him for years and had cultivated friendly intercourse with him while he carried on his studies with him, being still of irreproachable character. Faber was accompanied to Kreuzenstein by Markus Beckh of Leopoldsdorf and Ambrosius Salzer, the rector of the University of Vienna.

During the conversation Hubmaier said: What I have hitherto taught and written, I have not taught for the purpose of securing privileges for myself, but because, as I think, God's Spirit seized me. The colloquium, which took place in late 1527 lasted several days—on the first day until after midnight. Topics under discussion were the exposition and correct understanding of the Bible tradition and infant baptism; on the second day the altar sacrament, sacrifice of Mass, intercession of saints, and purgatory; on the third day faith and good works, Christian liberty, freedom of the will, the worship of Mary, the last things, penitence and confession, the power of the keys, Lutheran and Zwinglian doctrine, and the Councils.

At the close of the conversation Hubmaier declared his intention of presenting his confession of faith to the king. He carried out this intention without delay, and wrote the Rechenschaft seines Glaubens. He requested that the king most graciously listen to it and grant him grace and mercy. The Rechenschaft contains 27 articles, most of which are so worded that any Christian could subscribe to them; and in the two most important points, not so worded, he is willing to submit to the decision of a council, but in the meantime "stand still" on these points.

Hubmaier was mistaken in supposing that his defense would ease his situation. Precisely on the two points mentioned the authorities had looked for unconditional yielding, and said that he had expressed only half an opinion and had not presented a complete revocation. During the last days of February 1528 he wrote a second booklet, which is unfortunately no longer in existence, in which he discussed both points again. But since this document did not contain the required recantation either, Hubmaier was led back to Vienna, and before the heresy court tried on the rack; when this did not produce a recantation he was sentenced to die at the stake. His wife encouraged him; she was, as Sprugel comments, even firmer in her faith than her husband. When Hubmaier was taken to the site of execution, on March 10, 1528, he spoke words of comfort to himself by reciting Bible verses. When he arrived at the scaffold, accompanied by a great crowd of people and followed by an armed company, he raised his voice and cried out in the Swiss dialect, "O my gracious God, grant me grace in my great suffering!" Turning to the people he asked pardon if he had offended anyone, and pardoned his enemies. When the wood was already in flames, he cried out, "O my heavenly Father! O my gracious God!" and when his hair and beard burned, "O Jesus!" Choked by the smoke, he died. To the spectator it appeared that he felt more joy than pain. As the Geschichts-Bücher relate, he sealed his faith with his blood like a knight. His wife, the Waldshut citizen's daughter, did likewise. A few days later she was thrown from the large bridge over the Danube with a stone tied about her neck and drowned.

The men who had been seized with him recanted, except two who likewise died in flames on March 24. On the pyre they sang, "Come, Holy Spirit."

Hubmaier's death aroused consternation not only in Lower Austria and Moravia, but far beyond their borders. Because it was said in many places that he had been unjustly treated and was a martyr before God, and like John Hus innocently burned, Faber had a pamphlet printed in 1528 with the title, Ursach, warumb der Widertauffer Patron und erster Anfänger Doctor Balthasar Hubmayr zu Wien auf den zehnten Martii anno 1528 verbrennet sei.

Hubmaier's large literary output has been listed above. Two of his hymns were known by the Hutterian Brethren, but only one has been preserved, which is based on his constant motto, "God's truth will stand eternally," and begins, "Freut euch, freut euch in dieser Zeit." If the Geschichts-Bücher do not record much about Hubmaier, it must be remembered that he was not only not a member of the Hutterian Brethren, but was in opposition to a central doctrine of the group, namely, nonresistance.

The question of the influence of Hubmaier on Peter Riedemann (and thereby the Hutterian Brethren) has been thoroughly examined by Franz Heimann ("The Hutterite Doctrines of Church and Common Life, A Study of Peter Riedemann's Confession of Faith of 1540," MQR XXVI, 1952, particularly pp. 142-45, and 160). He says:

"The remark of Johann Loserth [Communismus, 226], that Riedemann's Rechenschaft closely follows the writings of Hubmaier, is by and large correct as far as the teachings of baptism, Lord's Supper, and ban are concerned, even though in these points there is no literal identity. Hubmaier's influence upon the Anabaptists with regard to baptism and Lord's Supper is clearly recognized at one place of the Hutterite Chronicle. At the occasion of Hubmaier's martyrdom and death, the Chronicle writes:

" 'Two hymns are still in our brotherhood which this Balthasar Hubmaier composed. There are also other writings by him from which one learns how he had so forcefully argued the right baptism, and how infant baptism is altogether wrong, all this proved from the Holy Scriptures. Likewise he brought to light the truth of the Lord's Supper, and refuted the idolatrous sacrament and the great error and seduction by it' [Zieglschmid, Chronik, 52].

"There exists a common Anabaptist understanding both in Riedemann and Hubmaier as far as they deal with the fallen state of man, the inner rebirth in faith, and the testimony of this faith in confession and life, presupposing the freedom of man to obey God's commandments. Beyond that also the teaching concerning the right sequence of preaching the Word, hearing, change of life, and baptism, seems to be derived from Hubmaier. In addition, Riedemann seems to have borrowed from him almost in its entirety the polemic against infant baptism (70-77) with all its numerous arguments and reasons, in which polemic Hubmaier nearly exhausted his theological capacity. There is also a fairly complete agreement of the Rechenschaft with Hubmaier's teachings concerning the 'Fellowship of the Lord's Table,' whose inner communion must already be present prior to the breaking of the bread. Likewise we find already in Hubmaier the teaching of the Christian brotherhood or church (Gemeinschaft), which exercises inner discipline by brotherly punishment and the ban. It seems fairly apparent that Riedemann knew and used Hubmaier's tracts and books such as: Eine christliche Lehrtafel; Ein einfältiger Unterricht auf die Worte: das ist mein Leib, in dem Nachtmahl Christi; Eine Form zu taufen in Wasser; Eine Form des Nachtmahls Christi; Von der brüderlichen Strafe; and Vom christlichen Bann. Riedemann used these books primarily for his chapters 'How One Should Baptize,' 'The Misuse of the Lord's Supper,' 'Concerning the Supper of Christ,' 'Concerning Exclusion,' and 'Concerning Readmission.'

"The closest contact between Riedemann and Hubmaier is to be found in the concern for the awakening of the Christian individual and for the brotherhood which in Anabaptist thought coincides with the church in general. In the center of Hubmaier's religious thinking stands the inwardly united 'Fellowship of the Lord's Table,' which breaks the bread as a sign of love and readiness for sacrifice (Hubmaier, Eine Form des Nachtmahles Christi, Nikolsburg, 1527). The religious ideal of Riedemann, on the other hand, is more the spiritual fellowship of the body of Christ, or the Holy Church without spot or wrinkle, into which the individual who is longing for Christian fellowship is accepted by the right sequence of hearing the Word, believing, rebirth, and baptism. By this the church becomes a true 'fellowship of committed disciples.' In Riedemann's vision it is in the idea of discipleship of Christ that the unity of the Spirit takes on flesh and blood and becomes a true church.

"Concerning 'brotherly punishment' and 'Christian ban,' Hubmaier sees in them the means to secure the purity of the 'Fellowship of the Lord's Table.' Riedemann would agree, but he sees the fellowship 'of the children of God' much more concrete and wide, and he interprets the ban much more radically in view of the purity and sacredness of his community. In the Rechenschaft the doctrine of the fellowship of the Lord's Table is closely connected with the doctrine of separation from the world, in complete agreement with the Schleitheim Articles. The latter require expressly in Article II that the ban be employed prior to the breaking of the bread, 'so that we may break and eat one bread with one mind and in one love, and may drink of one cup.' Likewise in Article IV the complete separation of the children of God from the wickedness of this world is required.

"The idea of an absolute contrast of the pure church of the children of God to the impure 'world' is basic for the Hutterite brotherhood. From it all further characteristic traits derive, and upon these, it should be emphasized here, Hubmaier's ideas had no influence whatsoever. It was, we should remember, Jakob Hutter who took the step of organizing the final brotherhood and of establishing the way of life in complete communion of goods as the expression of brotherly love and self-surrender (143-45)."

Heimann concludes: "In general it can be said that the teachings of Hubmaier concerning baptism and the Lord's Supper are reflected in the Rechenschaft of Riedemann; in fact, they represent teachings espoused by practically all evangelical Anabaptists. Beyond that, however, Hubmaier had no tangible influence upon Riedemann's thinking. With the arrival of Jakob Hutter in Moravia, late in 1529, the time of compromise had come to an end, and the spirit of strict and committed discipleship, the 'narrow path,' became dominant."

A complete translation into English of all Hubmaier's extant writings has been made by William O. Lewis and deposited in the William Jewell College Library at Liberty, Mo. A microfilm copy of this manuscript is found in the libraries of Bethel College and Goshen College.

The Amsterdam Mennonite Library has the following books by Hubmaier: N. Prugner and B. Fridberger, Acht unnd dreyssig schluszrede so betreffende ein gantz Christlich leben war an es gelegen ist (n.p., 1524); B. Fridberger, Achtzehen schluszrede so betreffende ein gantz Christlich leben (n.p., 1524); Schluszreden die Balthazar Fridberger dem J. Eckio die meysterlich zu examinieren fütbotten hat (n.p., n.d.); B. Frydberger, Ain Summe ains gantzen Christlichen lebens (n.p., 1525); and written copies made in the 19th century of B. Huebmör, Von Ketzern und iren Verbrennen (1524); Ein gesprech . . . auf Mayster Ulrichs Zwinglens Tauffbüchlen (1526); Der Uralten und gar neuen Leerern Urtail (1526), and Zwölf Artickel Christlichen Glaubens zu Zürich im Wasserturm gestellt (1527).† LOSERTH.

C. Sachsse, D. Balthasar Hubmaier als Theologe (Berlin, 1914); a book also very likely written by Hubmaier, Ein warhafftig Entschuldigung und Klag gemeiner Stadt Waldshut von Schultheis und Rat aldo an alle christgläubig Menschen ausgangen anno 1525 (printed by J. Loserth in "Die Stadt Waldshut und die vorderösterreichische Regierung in den Jahren 1523-1526" in Archiv für österreichische Geschichte LXXVII, pp. 1-149); Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914); Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; H. Schreiber, "B. Hubmaier," in Taschenbuch für Geschichte und Altertum in Süddeutschland (Freiburg, 1839); F. Hosek, Balthasar Hubmaier a pocatkov en ovo Krestenstva na Morave (Brno, 1893); W. Mau, "B. Hubmaier," in Abhandlungen zur mittleren u. neueren Gesch., No. 40 (Berlin and Leipzig, 1912); H. C. Vedder, Balthasar Hubmaier, the Leader of the Anabaptists (New York and London, 1905) in Heroes of the Reformation, contains a portrait of Hubmaier, which is probably not contemporary; S. Sprugel, "Bericht über Hubmaiers Tod" in Acta facultatis artium IV, 149b (university archives in Vienna) reprinted in Mitterer, Compectus hist. Univ. Viennensis (1724); A. Stern, "Ueber die 12 Artikel von 1525 u. ihre Verfasser," Hist. Ztscht XCI; G. Wolny, "Die Wiedertäufer in Mähren," Arch. f. österr. Gesch. (1850); W. Wiswedel, Balthasar Hubmaier, der Vorkämpfer für Glaubens- und Gewissensfreiheit (Kassel, 1939); idem, "Dr. Balthasar Hubmaier," Ztscht f. bayr. Kirchengesch. XV (1940): 2 Halbbd. (reprint Gunzenhausen, 1940); ML II, 353-63.

Hübner, Johannes (1668-1731), a noted Lutheran educator, teacher at the University of Leipzig for a time, 1694-1711 rector of the Merseburg (Germany) Gymnasium, 1711-31 rector of the Hamburg Johanneum, important in church history only as the author of Biblische Historien (1714), which enjoyed over 100 editions in Europe (Germany) and was translated into five foreign languages. The book also was reprinted at least 81 times in America (first edition at Harrisburg, Pa., in 1826), and at least four times (1887, 1889, 1891, 1909) by John F. Funk at Elkhart, Ind., and once at Scottdale in 1936, which indicates its popularity among the Mennonites in America. It was the first German book to publish Biblical material for children in story form instead of catechetical or text form. The title of the first Funk edition was Biblische Geschichten des Alten und Neuen Testaments durch Bibelsprüche und zahlreiche Erklärungen erläutert. (222 pp.). The original German title was Zweimal 52 Biblische Historien und Fragen (Leipzig). It is still sold by booksellers for the Amish, e.g., by J. A. Raber of Baltic, Ohio. H.S.B.

Hubrechts, Jan, a sheriff of Amsterdam, was in sympathy with the Anabaptists and obstructed the policy of the government concerning their persecution. When the representatives of the Court of Holland came to Amsterdam (November 1531) to arrest a number of Anabaptists, Jan Hubrechts sent them a warning by his maidservant so that they could escape. Jan Hubrechts was dismissed on Feb. 25, 1534. Though an opponent of Roman Catholic practices, he was not an Anabaptist. He is called a nieuw-gesinde, i.e., a Sacramentist (q.v.). vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 18, 187; DB 1917, 195 f.; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 64-68, 93.

Huf, Lorenz, an Anabaptist of Sprendlingen in Rheinhessen, a member of the Kreuznach congregation "who are called Swiss." "He was evidently an elder, and as such he, with Rupp Gellner (q.v.), Matthes Stroh, and Wilhelm Henchen, was offended by the doctrine and conduct in his congregation." "Although they have learned that a believer should sacrifice himself with all that he has to God and His saints, they have contrary to their own teaching granted in life that each man use his goods for himself and give to the poor only what they need. Besides they have taught concerning the brotherhood that no one should have property, but what one has should be held in common, his neighbor's as well as his own. And, at the same time, when anyone needed anything he had to buy it of others. In the third place, concerning original sin, that they do not teach the right according to the truth, pay taxes for war and sacrifice to idols, do not earnestly rebuke unclean dealing in business and wrongdoing, but rebuke privately so that it does not become known among the populace. Nor do they have true separation from the people, but in many respects mingle with them."

The demand for complete community of goods is foreign to the Swiss congregations; it is Hutterite. On the other hand, the question of strict church discipline and separation not rarely gave occasion to disunity and strife. An extensive account is given of the manner in which dissatisfied members joined the Hutterian Brethren. When one of them, Thoman Neumann, a cobbler of Wolfsheim, a village not far from Sprendlingen, heard that "there is a group in Moravia that lives in brotherly unity and true fellowship, he made up his mind not to give up until he came to the church of God in Moravia, learned the foundation of the truth and offered it again to his friends" (Geschicht-Buch, 272). This led to thorough and repeated discussions among them. They finally agreed to ask Hans Schmidt (q.v.), a missionary of the Hutterian Brethren who was traveling in Hesse, to come to talk the matter over with him. He presented to them the creed of the Hutterian brotherhood, concerning the call of their preachers, their offices, brotherhood, church regulations, marriage, and separation from the world. On several points, viz., marriage, taxes, separation, the food and drink of the preachers, sacrifice to idols, and why one should emigrate to Moravia, they asked more information, and Lorenz Huf was commissioned with other judicious brethren to carry on the above points. When this reply came (Geschicht-Buch, 273-77) they met, discussed it point by point, and found themselves in agreement with it. This was reported to Moravia, and the union was agreed upon on Nov. 26, 1556, with Hans Schmidt. "Then they moved in to the church of God," and Lorenz Huf was made their preacher. He died four years later at Stiegnitz. He is the author of the hymn, "Lugt auf, ihr Christen alle," which has 20 stanzas with the acrostic, "Lorenz Huf von Sprendeling." (ML II, 363.) NEFF.

Hugaart-Heems, Femina: see Heems.

Hügeline, Elsbeth (Elisabeth), the wife of Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.), was the daughter of a citizen of Reichenau on Lake Constance, whom he married on Jan. 13, 1525. She was an energetic and courageous woman, who shared the very sad fate of her husband with devoted love and faithfulness. When he was seized and after cruel torture condemned to death, she spoke words of comfort to him. Three days later she also suffered a martyr's death in Vienna. With a stone tied to her neck she was thrown from the large bridge over the Danube on March 13, 1528, in Vienna. (ML II, 363.)
NEFF.

Hughestown, a Mennonite Brethren Mission station in India, located in the northeastern suburbs of Hyderabad city in Madhya Pradesh (formerly Central Provinces), was purchased by J. H. Pankratz in 1913, and at that time included three compounds —one with a hall for church and school, and the other two with bungalows for missionaries and living quarters for workers. Since the mission at one time intended to discontinue the station and transfer to another locality, it sold two of these compounds and retained the one with the larger bungalow. In 1927 it was, however, decided to retain Hughestown as a center for work in the field southeast of Hyderabad.

Missionaries who have worked here a longer period of time are Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Pankratz, Anna Suderman Bergthold, Katharina L. Schellenberg, Anna Hanneman, and Elizabeth D. Janzen. The station has been without resident missionaries much of the time and was supervised by missionaries of other stations. Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Lohrenz of Shamshabad have long had charge of the work.

Activities have included regular church services on the station and evangelism in the city of Hyderabad and its environs as well as in the villages. The station field has an area of 1,200 square miles and a population of 200,000. Of the Christian community, which numbers 1,000 communicant members, about 400 live in the city and 600 in the villages. A primary school has been conducted since the beginning of the station. A new church was built in 1952. J.H.L.

Hugwald, Ulrich (1496-1571), a native of Wylen near Bischofszell in the canton of Thurgau, Switzerland, a student under Vadian, matriculated at the University of Basel in 1519. As a proofreader in the print shop of Adam Petri in Basel, he published three Latin works: Dialogus studiorum suorum prooemium et militiae initium, Ad sanctam Tigurinam ecclesiam epistola (1521), and Tres epistolae, quarum ultima legunt qui hodie Euangelistas persequuntur et caveant, ne lacessitus ad arma deposita redeat (1521). Calvary's statement (Verzeichnis, 9 and 28) that these books show that already at that early period he was a follower of Denk and the Strasbourg Anabaptists is chronologically impossible. Paul Burckhardt correctly says that in these pompous writings there is no trace of old-evangelical heresy. They are rather the ideas of Erasmus; i.e., a blending of humanism with the Gospel. In 1522 Hugwald published a booklet, An alle, die Christum oder das Reich Gottes von Herzen suchen (Clemen, 72 and Wernle, 266). The same year saw the publication, without his knowledge, of 134 theses by him under the title, Est tibi lector brevissimo compendio per U. H., unde hominum perditio, in quoque sit eorum salus. . . . Theses 42-46 deal with baptism. Hugwald vigorously defends infant baptism. He wrote the foreword to several booklets of Luther's, showing himself to be an enthusiastic adherent of the German reformer, whereas he never formed an attachment to Zwingli (Wernle, 265).

At the end of 1524 or the beginning of 1525 Hugwald joined the Anabaptists, and was baptized. He seems to have attached himself to Thomas Müntzer when the latter made a brief visit to Basel. "It is extremely instructive to follow the road that leads from glowing love for Luther to Anabaptism," writes Wernle. At an Anabaptist meeting in the home of Michel Schürer, a tailor of Freiburg, he was seized with 25 others, and released on Aug. 23, 1525, upon an oath of Urfehde "in the best and strongest form." He remained for a time an adherent of the Anabaptists, abandoned his scholarly career and took up turning and agricultural tasks, but then left them, became a schoolmaster at Burg and later professor at the University of Basel.

NEFF.

Keller, Reformation, 374; O. Clemen, "Der Wiedertäufer Ulrich Hugwald," in Beiträge zur Reformationsgeschichte II (1902) 45-85; R. Thommen, Geschichte der Universität Basel (Basel, 1889) 352; Calvary, Verzeichnis wertvoller und seltener Bücher (Berlin, 1870); P. Burckhardt, Die Basler Täufer (Basel, 1898); Paul Wernle's article in Basler Ztscht, 1918, 255, 265 ff., and 286; ML II. 363 f.

Huidekoper, a Dutch Mennonite family, originally from Harlingen, province of Friesland, where Anne Jans Huidecoper, a merchant of hides, from which trade he received his family name, was born about 1640. Both he and his son Jan Annes Huidekoper (d. 1746) were loyal members of the Mennonite congregation of Harlingen. A grandson of Jan Annes, Harm Jan Huidekoper, b. 1776 at Hoogeveen, migrated to the United States in 1795, where he first was a clerk of the Holland Land Company and then an industrialist. He did not join the Mennonites, but in Meadville, Pa., where he died in 1854, he founded a Unitarian church, which caused some trouble. He published a number of theological works. He became the founder of the American branch of this family (N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 884).

A half brother of Harm Jan was Jan Annes Huidekoper (b. 1766 at Berlikum, d. 1835 at Amsterdam), who was married to Geertruy Margaretha Stinstra. This Jan is the founder of the Amsterdam branch of the Huidekoper family. By his important businesses and high positions he was a very influential man; he was a member of the municipal board of Amsterdam and member of the board of directors of the "Great Fishery," of the Levant Trade, of the Amsterdam Chamber of Commerce, later also its president. Notwithstanding his many offices he served the Mennonite congregation of Amsterdam two periods as a deacon, 1796-1801 and 1811-15.

Jan's four sons were all men of great importance: (a) Anne Willem (1796-1841) studied law and was a judge at Amsterdam and member of the Second Chamber of the States-General; he was much interested in improving the conditions of prisoners and served the Mennonite congregation of Amsterdam as a deacon 1821-25 and 1831-35. He was unmarried. (b) Pieter (1798-1852), member of the municipal board of Amsterdam, of the Second Chamber of the States-General, mayor of Amsterdam 1841-49. Besides all this he was a banker and leader of a trading company. He was married to Sara Geertruida van Eeghen and was a deacon of the Amsterdam congregation 1826-30 and 1841-42. (c) Jan (1803-76), married to his niece Catharina Huidekoper from Harlingen, became a merchant at Harlingen. (d) Albert (1807-54), married to Aletta Jacoba Rahusen, also a businessman and deacon at Amsterdam 1836-40. The Huidekoper family had a country house at Breukelen, which was known for its art treasures.

Of the late Harlingen branch should be mentioned Anne Willem Huidekoper, son of Jan (c); he was born Aug. 23, 1836, at Midlum near Harlingen and d. April 7, 1900, at Arnhem. After studying at the Amsterdam Mennonite Theological Seminary he became a preacher of the following Mennonite congregations: Burg, Waal, and Oosterend on the island of Texel 1861-63, Bolsward 1863-

73, Koog-Zaandijk 1873-77, and Almelo 1877-78. In 1878 he left the ministry to found a banking house at Amsterdam. He was married first to Susanna Jacoba Portielje (d. 1836) and then to her sister Cornelia Maria Portielje. vdZ.

Ned. Patriciaat XVIII, 1927, 206-16; Edgar Huidekoper, of Meadville, Pa., Huidekoper Holland Family (n.p., n.d.).

Huig, Jorisz, an otherwise unknown Anabaptist martyr, who was beheaded with his brother Quirijn Jorisz on Jan. 22, 1550, at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, because of being an Anabaptist. They were natives of Delfshaven near Rotterdam. Their goods were confiscated. About these martyrs we only know by the statement of account of the sheriff of Delft. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, p. 162, No. 362.) vdZ.

Huins, a hamlet in the Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert Bouwens in 1568-82 baptized seven persons. They may have joined a congregation in the neighborhood, since there has never been a congregation at Huins. vdZ.

Huisduinen, formerly a fishermen's village at the tip of the Dutch province of North Holland, now a part of the town of Den Helder. A Mennonite congregation of merged Flemish and Frisians existed here until 1731, when it merged with the Waterlander congregation of Den Helder (q.v.). Its meetinghouse was in use until 1788. vdZ.

Huisinga Bakker, Pieter, b. March 24, 1714, at Huizinge (q.v.), Dutch province of Groningen, d. Oct. 22, 1801, at Amsterdam, was a merchant. He wrote three volumes of poems, published under the title Poëzy (Amsterdam, 1773, 1782, and 1790); he translated the works of John Milton into Dutch and wrote a biography of the Dutch historian Jan Wagenaar (1776), to whose sister Elizabeth he was married. He was a descendant of the Huizinga (q.v.) family and was the first to publish a genealogy of this family, entitled Stamboek of Geslachtsregister van Derk Pieters en Katrina Thomas (Groningen, 1775). vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. VI, 67; J. Huizinga, Stamboek . . . van Derk Pieters en Katrina Thomas (Groningen, 1883) pp. VI, XI, and 4; DB 1896, 12.

Huisko(o)pers (House-Buyers) is the name of a party of Flemish Mennonites, which arose in Franeker, Dutch province of Friesland, in 1586, when Thomas Bintgens (q.v.) bought a house, the deal involving some implications of dishonesty. A division of the Flemish group followed, with the Huiskopers (Bintgens and his followers) on one hand and the Contra-Huiskopers (q.v.)—Jacob Keest, Joos Jans, and Jacob Berends with their adherents on the other. The elders from Haarlem, Amsterdam, Groningen, and elsewhere, who had met to settle the dispute, returned without having achieved their object.

The schism was not confined to Franeker. Its rapid spread is evidence that it was not merely a matter of the sale of a house. The issue was actually strictness or laxity of moral conduct; i.e., the retention of the concept of a church without spot or wrinkle, or its abandonment. Another attempt made in Haarlem in 1589 to heal the breach ended in failure; Amsterdam decided against Bintgens, while Haarlem decided in his favor.

The Contra-Huiskopers are identical with the "Young" or "Soft" Flemish Mennonites, and the name Contra-Huiskopers soon disappeared. The Huiskopers were identical with the Old Flemish Mennonites. After most of these Old Flemish had merged with the Flemish on the basis of the Dordrecht Confession of 1632, the name Huiskopers was often used for another group of Flemish Mennonites which arose about this time in the Netherlands, namely, the Danzig (q.v.) Old Flemish Mennonites. In the 18th century their congregations were still called Huiskopers, and not only as a nickname by their antagonists, as is shown by a catechism of 1708 of the Danzig Old Flemish, of which R. A. Joncker is the author, entitled Mennoniste Vrageboek . . . als . . . in de vergaderinge der Doops-gesinden: genoemt de Huys-kopers geleert wort. vdZ.

DB 1912, 49-60; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 477, 558, 578, 593, 1122; II, Nos. 2689 f.; ML II, 267.

Huizen, a town in the Dutch province of North Holland, east of Amsterdam, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation, sometimes also called the congregation of Huizen and Spakenburg (q.v.). It belonged to the Waterlander branch of the Mennonites; at the large Waterlander conference at Amsterdam in 1647 this congregation was represented by Pieter Reyniersz; it must therefore have been in existence in this period and perhaps long before. There are no documents older than 1681. In 1731 it received from Jacobus van Hoorn of Amsterdam a rather valuable piece of land (since called "Hoornschehout") and other assets. The membership was small; no exact figures were available before 1792, when it numbered 35, unbaptized children included. The last minister was Jacobus van Moerbeek 1790-1834(?). Since 1834 no meetings have been held, and in 1843 an agreement was reached with the Amsterdam congregation concerning the administration of the properties of the Huizen congregation. The church, now converted into a private house, still stands, and an inscription, Religioni consecrata, recalls its former use.

In 1878 the sleeping congregation awoke and came to new life. A meetinghouse was built at Hilversum and the name of the congregation became Hilversum-Huizen. For the history of this congregation since 1878 see article Hilversum.

P.O., vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1980-2006, II, 2, Nos. 2, 219; DJ 1837, 16; DB 1879, 140 f.; 1907, 113; ML II, 364.

Huizinga (formerly also Huysinga and Huisinga), a widely diffused Dutch Mennonite family, whose ancestor was Derk Pieters (d. 1566 or 1567), a farmer, married to Katrina Thomas, and living on the old "heert" (a castlelike farm building) of Melkema near Huizinge in the Dutch province of Groningen. He was apparently the owner of this stately farm. He was in all probability a Mennonite, as many of his descendants have been. In the 17th and 18th centuries most members of the family belonged to the Groningen Old Flemish branch. Many of them served the church as deacons and preachers or elders. Jacob Derks (1560-1620, a son of Derk Pieters), a farmer at Maarhuizen near Winsum, was in 1585 chosen as a preacher of the congregation of Rasquert.

The name Huizinga was already used by a great-grandson of Derk Pieters, namely, Jacob Derks Huizinga (1659-1736), a merchant living in the city of Groningen, the son of Derk Syerts (1608-78).

The following Mennonite ministers of the Huizinga family have been found: Luirt Luirts (d. 1674), farmer and elder of the congregation of Westeremden, ordained 1655 (see the interesting account of his journey of 1645 with Derk Syerts through the Old Flemish congregations, in DB 1879, 86-94); Derk Syerts (1608-78), Tamme Pieters (d. 1684), ordained elders in 1655, and his son Derk Tammens (d. 1728), all three farmers and preachers of the Huizinge congregation; Jacob Lippes (1660-1735), farmer and preacher at Baflo; Klaas Jans (1701-77), farmer and preacher at Zijldijk 1756; Andries Huizinga was preacher of the Flemish congregation of Obergum-Winsum 1740-*ca.*50 (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1843); Tammo Huizinga (1711-70), farmer and preacher at Baflo (later Rasquert) 1741-70; Jacob Tietes (1734-1821) born at Gaaikemaweer near Oldehove and living at Terhorne near 't Zandt, a farmer, assuming in 1811 the official family name of Huizinga, which was his wife's name, served from 1764 as a preacher of the congregation of Leermens and Loppersum. He married Trijntje Tammes Huizinga. His son Dirk Huizinga, b. Jan. 29, 1772, near 't Zandt, d. Jan. 31, 1843, was trained for the ministry privately by Gerbrand Valter, preacher of Westzaan-Zuid, and served the congregation of Midwolda-Beerta-Meeden 1793-1802, Norden 1802-9, and Westzaan-Zuid 1809-43. He married Trijntje Jurjens Coolman. Their son Jacob Dirks Huizinga (q.v.) was also a Mennonite minister.

Doewe Sieuwertsz Huizinga, b. Dec. 14, 1820, at Loppersum, d. 1907, studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and served the congregation of Mensingeweer 1847-49 (as an assistant pastor), Hoorn on the island of Texel 1849-53, Westgraftdijk 1853-68, and Wieringen 1868 until he retired in 1887 (Biogr. Wb. IV, 400).

Menno Huizinga, a grandson of Jacob Dirks Huizinga, b. 1876 at Harlingen, studied at the Amsterdam University and the Mennonite Seminary there and was a pastor of Nes 1902-10, Zwartsluis 1910-14, and Noord en Zuid-Zijpe 1914 until he retired in 1918. vdZ.

The genealogy of the Huizinga family was first published by Pieter Huisinga Bakker (q.v.) under the title Stamboek of Geslachtsregister der nakomelingen van Derk Pieters en Katrina Thomas . . . (Groningen, 1775), then in a much enlarged edition by Jacob D. Huizinga under the same title (Groningen, 1883) (see also DB 1879, 3-6, passim, and various issues of the Naamlijst); ML II, 365.

Huizinga (Huysinga), Jacob Derks, b. Jan. 9, 1659, at Huizinge, d. Dec. 24, 1736, at Groningen, a member of the Dutch Mennonite Huizinga (q.v.) family. Jacob Derks Huizinga was not a farmer like his forefathers, but a merchant. He settled in the city of Groningen, first as partner of the well-known Jan Arents "in 't Block." He married twice: in 1681 Janneken Lubberts Cremer (see Cremer) of Neustadt-Gödens (q.v.), who died in 1701, then in 1702 Stijntje Mattheusd. van Calker of Deventer, who died in 1731. At first he was a loyal member of the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites, but in course of time friction arose because Huizinga was less conservative than the Old Flemish. He sympathized much with the Collegiants and seems to have left his church to join the Collegiants, who had a considerable group in the city of Groningen with a meetinghouse of their own.

Huizinga wrote a family book in which he wrote "memorable occurrences from my time 1672-96," which gives some valuable information on Mennonite history. His Lyckreden op het Christelijk en zalig afsterven van . . . Albert Jansen was published at Groningen (n.d., 1727). A curious letter by Huizinga as a marriage broker is found in Gorter's Doopsgezinde Lectuur 1858, 329 ff. (Biogr. Wb. IV, 404 f.; N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 886 f.; DB 1883, 73.) vdZ.

Huizinga, Jacob Dirks, b. June 3, 1809, at Norden, d. Aug. 12, 1894, at Groningen, son of Pastor Dirk Huizinga and Trijntje Jurjens Coolman, studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and served the congregation of Knollendam 1832-35, den Horn 1835-44, and Burg on the island of Texel 1844 until he retired in 1879. He was well versed in Mennonite history and the Amsterdam Mennonite archives owe to him a number of important documents on the history of the Mennonites, especially from the province of Groningen. Besides a catechism, Hoofdwaarheden der christelijke Godsdienst (Burg, 1852, reprinted at Sneek, 1863), and a paper on the history of the Mennonites on the island of Texel in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen 1873, he published genealogies of the Huizinga, Coolman, and Meihuizen families: Stamboek der nakomelingen van Derk Pieters en Katrina Thomas (Groningen, 1883); Stamboek . . . der nakomelingen van Fiepke Foppes en Diever Olfferts (Groningen, 1887); Stamboek . . . der nakomelingen van Samuel Peter (Meihuizen) en Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890). Especially the Meihuizen genealogy is of interest for Mennonite history for its account of the emigration of the Swiss Mennonites to Holland, studied from the sources found in the Amsterdam Mennonite archives. Jacob Huizinga was married to Aaltje Samuels Meihuizen of Hoogezand. (Biogr. Wb. IV, 405 f.; N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 885 f.; ML II, 365.) Their son Derk Huizinga (1840-1907) first studied theology at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary; he was appointed ministerial candidate in 1862; but since the ministry did not appeal to him, he studied science and in 1867 became a teacher in physics and chemistry. In 1870 he was appointed professor of physiology on the medical faculty of the University of Groningen (N.N.B.Wb. IV, 789).

Johan Huizinga (1872-1946), a well-known professor of history at the University of Leiden, was a son of Derk and a grandson of Jacob Dirks Huizinga. Johan Huizinga was not a Mennonite. vdZ.

Huizinge, a small town in the Dutch province of Groningen, which already in the 16th century was a Mennonite center, with a congregation of Groningen Old Flemish, known by various names—Huizinge, Westeremden, Middelstum, and Huizinge and Westeremden. A meetinghouse of this congregation was built in Huizinge in 1815, but in 1863 the seat of the congregation was transferred to Middelstum (q.v.), where a meetinghouse and parsonage were built in 1863. vdZ.

Huizum, Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert Bouwens baptized seven persons in 1563-65, who may have joined the congregation of adjacent Leeuwarden. vdZ.

Hulka (Holka, now Velká) is a town in Moravia, two miles east of Strassnitz with a population of about 2,000, of whom about 300 belong to the Reformed Church. The Anabaptists owned a renowned mill there. The market belonged to Strassnitz, and thus to the famous Moravian noble family of Zierotin. The records do not state when the Anabaptists came to Velká. The Geschicht-Buch merely remarks (p. 441), "We lived there many years." In 1595 they were compelled by Arkleb von Kunowitz for selfish reasons to move out. They suffered great losses, but the withdrawal cannot have lasted long, for by 1610 they were again in Velká, in the complete possession of the grace of Johann Friedrich of Zierotin, who was a special benefactor of the Hutterites. (Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; ML II, 365.) LOSERTH.

Hulle, van, a Dutch Mennonite family, formerly found in Haarlem. This was a refugee family. Jan Hulle, a Mennonite martyr of Ieper and executed there in 1561, may have belonged to this family, as obviously did Jehanne van Hulle and Cataline van Hulle, Mennonites who had left Gent in 1568, their property being confiscated. Jehanne seems soon to have returned, for Janneken van Hulle (q.v.), who died as a martyr at Gent in 1570, is identical with Jehanne. Cathalyne van Hulle (baptized about 1581 at Gent by Paulus van Meenen, who soon after performed her marriage with Jacob Martins), apparently not the same person as Cataline mentioned before, was a Mennonite banished from Gent in 1592 (Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.).

Denys van Hulle, son of Michiel van Hulle, living at Haarlem about 1610, was apparently a preacher there. It could not be ascertained in which congregation he served. He was a man of moderation, opposing the strict principles of Leenaert Clock (q.v.) and others. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 482, 519, 525, 535.) vdZ.

Hulshof, Abraham (b. 1874 at Borne, d. 1954 at Utrecht), though spelling his name with one f, belonged to the large Dutch Mennonite Hulshoff family. He studied theology at the University of Amsterdam and the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and became a ministerial candidate in 1902, but never went into the ministry. In 1922 he was appointed director librarian of the University of Utrecht. Among his many publications, mostly papers published in various periodicals, should be mentioned his doctor's thesis, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg van 1525 tot 1557 (Amsterdam, 1905). vdZ.

Hulshoff, a Dutch Mennonite family, whose members are still found in a large number of Mennonite congregations. The ancestor of the family was Berend Jansz (b. August 1635, d. April 1694), whose father had moved to the "Hulshoff," a farm near Zenderen in the district of Twenthe, Dutch province of Overijssel. Berend Jansz, who was a spinner and weaver (and apparently also a farmer), and who was married to Geessien Hendriks, was an elder of the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonite congregation at Borne, as were his sons Hendrik Berends Hulshoff (q.v.) and Goossen Berends Hulshoff, serving 1695-ca. 1727. Another son of Berend Jansz was Abraham Berends Hulshoff, b. 1674 at Zenderen, d. 1759 at Groningen; he was a merchant and a manufacturer in the city of Groningen, and was the ancestor of the Groningen branch of this family. His grandson was Allard Hulshoff (q.v.). Arent Berends Hulshoff was also a son of Berend Jansz. He was apparently a weaver or merchant of woven materials in Twenthe; he accompanied his brother Hendrik Berends in 1719 on his voyage to Prussia and Poland; his son Berend (Barent) Arents Hulshoff (ca. 1697-1779) married Geertje Pol Jansdochter and was a preacher of the congregation of Borne 1736-79, as was the son of Berend Arents, Arent Hulshoff (b. 1728 at Borne, d. 1802 at Hengelo), who founded a textile factory at Hengelo and served as preacher 1770-1802. The son of Hendrik Berends was Gerrit Hendriks Hulshoff; he moved to Wildervank (q.v.) and was a preacher of the congregation of Wildervank-Veendam from 1752 until his death in 1781. His sister Fenneken Hulshoff was married to Jan Jansz Pol, preacher at Borne about 1710-17. All these ministers, except Allard Hulshoff, were untrained. The following Mennonite ministers, trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and the University of Amsterdam, were descendants of Hendrik Berends: Allard Abraham Hulshoff, b. 18— at Amsterdam, d. Feb. 22, 1875, served Akkrum 1839-45, and Leeuwarden 1845-70; Gerhard Adam Hulshoff, b. 1836 at Borne, d. there 1901, served Knollendam 1864-90, and Enkhuizen-Medemblik 1890-94; his son Gerhard Adam Hulshoff, b. 1874 at Knollendam, d. 1938 at Borne, served at Hindeloopen 1904-10, Terhorne 1910-13, Holwerd 1913-16, and Gorredijk-Lippenhuizen 1916-27; Isaac Hulshoff, b. 1869 at Borne, d. at Zeist 1951, pastor of Baard 1895-1901, Noordbroek 1901-3, Irnsum 1903-14, and Workum 1914-35; Jacob Hulshoff, b. 1875 at Sneek, d. 1938 at Amersfoort, pastor at Rottevalle 1902-9, Makkum 1909-20, Oldeboorn 1920-30 and Ternaard 1930-37. vdZ.

Nederl. Patriciaat XXVIII, 1942, 79-105; Uit het verleden der Doopsgezinden in Twenthe (n.p., n.d.) 76-78; ML II, 365.

Hulshoff, Allard, b. Feb. 20, 1734, at Groningen, d. July 30, 1795, at Amsterdam. He studied philosophy at the University of Groningen, obtaining his doctor's degree in 1755. He began his theological studies in 1756 in the Mennonite seminary at Amsterdam. In 1759 he was made preacher of the congregation at Makkum and in 1760 he was called to the "Lam en Toren" congregation at Amsterdam. His eloquence as a pulpit speaker is attested by the collection of his sermons (Kerkelijke redevoeringen, 4 vv., Amsterdam, 1796). He wrote numerous philosophical works, which earned him much recognition. He was also successful in the field of pedagogy. He was married to Anna Debora van Oosterwijk. His son Willem van Oosterwijk Hulshoff (q.v.) died ten weeks before his father. Besides this son he had a daughter Aletta Maria (1781-after 1850), who was an ardent Patriot (q.v.) and caused a lot of trouble to the government. She seems to have been very unbalanced; in 1810 she made an attempt on Napoleon's life when he visited Amsterdam; only by fleeing abroad could she save her life; by many she was celebrated as a heroine. vdZ.

W. de Vos, Leven en Character van A. Hulshoff (Amsterdam, 1796); Biogr. Wb. IV, 412-18; N.N.B.Wb. II, 619; Naamlijst 1796; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 724; DJ 1850, 112 f., 125 f.; DB 1868, 95, 97; 1898, 20, 26; ML II, 365.

Hulshoff, Hendrik (1664-1745), usually called Hendrik Berents, was a spinner and weaver, married to Jenneken ten Cate of Groningen, and lived in "het Paschen" at Zenderen near Borne in the district of Twenthe in the Dutch province of Overijssel. From 1690 on, he was an elder of the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites. This group also had a congregation in Twenthe, which split in 1728 into the Borne (q.v.) and Hengelo (q.v.) congregations. As elder he made official trips to the Old Flemish congregations; in 1719 he made a journey all the way to Polish Prussia. On May 22, accompanied by his brother Arent Berends, he started out on a trip via Groningen and Harlingen, to Vlieland, and from there by boat to Danzig, where they arrived on June 28. Here he met with Mennonite leaders, including Jan van Hoek and Anthony Janssen, but he did not preach. In Gruppe he visited Jacob Bertelt (Bartel), "being a man of the other Mennonites" (i.e., Bertelt belonged to the Waterlanders), for whom he had brought a letter and a "great basket full of books" from Holland. On July 5 the travelers arrived at Przechovka or Przysierk, later called Wintersdorf, not far from Schwetz. (In the Naamlijst of preachers of 1755 the congregation is called "In't Colmsche op Kunpad en Przekowsky.") Here Hulshoff took up his residence in Elder Benjamin Wedel's (q.v.) house. This was also a Groningen Old Flemish congregation. Hulshoff visited many members and preached several times; and on Thursday, July 13, he officiated at the ordination of the two preachers, Jacob IJsaäks (Isaak) and Abraham Onrouw (Unrau). On the following Sunday he officiated at the reception into the congregation by baptism of at least 31 baptismal candidates, to whom he had given baptismal instruction on the previous Monday. They also visited the brethren in Wolz(?) and Schönsee. On Saturday the matter of the discipline of Hans Voet (Voth) was acted upon, and on Sunday, July 23, he conducted communion and footwashing. On Tuesday, July 25, he preached once more. On this occasion many persons came from other places, even from the other side of the Vistula.

Afterward Hendrik and Arent Hulshoff took their departure. On the return journey they spent a night with a member at Montau, Pieter Baltzer (Balzer) of the Frisian branch. After a short stay in Danzig, where the brothers had business—our elder managed very eminently to combine the spiritual calling with the material—they traveled overland via Berlin, Hamburg, Bremen, Lingen, and Noordhorn back to their home, arriving there on Aug. 13.

The travel account was written up by Hendrik Berends Hulshoff himself, and was published in 1938 with an introduction by H. Ch. Hulshoff. Among the important items included is a list which Hulshoff received from his fellow elder Alle Derks (q.v.), and one which he himself made of the members of the congregation in "Persighofke en 't Koenpat (Przechowka)." Presumably Hendrik Berends made a second journey to Prussia and Poland. vdZ.

H. Ch. Hulshoff, "Bezoekreis van Hendrik Berents Hulshoff aan de Doopsgezinden Gemeenten der Oude Vlamingen in Pruisen in Polen in 1719" in Bijdragen en Mededeelingen v. h. Hist. Genootschap LIX (Utrecht, 1938) 32-82; Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederl. Menn. im Weichseltal (Marburg a. d. Lahn, 1952).

Hulshoff, Sybrand Klaas, b. May 4, 1849, at Leeuwarden, d. April 5, 1897, at Utrecht, a son of Allard Hulshoff, studied medicine, then devoted himself to diseases of the eye and later after a journey abroad to pediatrics. The erection at Utrecht of the first children's hospital in Holland is due to his initiative; he served as its managing physician. He is also the author of several scientific studies. (Nederlandsch Tijdschr. v. Geneeskunde, 1897, 565; N.N.B.Wb. IV, 790 f.; ML II, 365.) vdZ.

Hulshoff, Willem van Oosterwijk, son of Allard Hulshoff (q.v.), b. March 6, 1771, at Amsterdam, d. there May 17, 1795, studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Theological Seminary and became a ministerial candidate in 1792. The ministry, however, did not appeal to him, and so he studied philosophy at the University of Utrecht. Having always been frail, he died at the age of 24 years. Yet his name was very well known in the 19th century for his publications: Vertoog over het Wederzien (Amsterdam, 1795); Josef in sijne Kinderliefde en trouw ter naarvolging aangepresen (published 1796 by the "Genootschap tot verdediging van den Christelijken Godsdienst"), and especially De Geschiedenis van Josef voor Kinderen (Leiden, Amsterdam, 1796); this last book, crowned by the "Maatschappij tot Nut van 't Algemeen," was used until 1857 in nearly all elementary schools in the Netherlands; a new (17th) edition appeared as late as 1886. vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. IV, 418 f.; DB 1869, 56, 59, 83.

Hulst, van, a Dutch Mennonite family, probably from the Lower Rhine district in Germany, in the last part of the 17th century residing at Nijmegen, Dutch province of Gelderland, where Laurens (Lourens) van Hulst was appointed deacon in 1697. His son Caspar van Hulst and grandson Jan van Hulst (d. 1809) were also deacons. A son of this Jan van Hulst, also named Jan (d. Nov. 13, 1821, at Cleve), became a Mennonite minister. After having been trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, he served the congregation of Cleve 1804-21.

His cousin Jan van Hulst, b. Aug. 24, 1779, at Nijmegen, d. Nov. 12, 1846, at Norden, a son of Lourens, studied at the Amsterdam Seminary and served the congregation of Kampen 1802-9 and Norden 1809-44; in 1944 he resigned. He published Korte Geloofsbelijdenis in vragen en antwoorden ten behoeve van Min-geoefenden in den Godsdienst (Norden, 1816), also some German and English theological works in Dutch translations. Two of his sons went into the ministry: Laurens van Hulst, serving the congregation of Emden 1826-50, in which year he resigned to become director of the Teyler Foundation (q.v.) at Haarlem, and Willem van Hulst (d. 1885), serving at Bolsward 1831-58.

Whether Coenraad van Hulst, baptized at Amsterdam in 1793 (Lamist congregation), d. 1844, who was a famous actor, was a member of this family or not, could not be ascertained. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2028-29, 2608-13; DB 1874, 31; 1875, 68, 71, 81, 90; Biogr. Wb. IV, 435-36; several issues of Naamlijst, especially 1829, 39, 68 f.

Hulst, Pieter Teyler van der: see Teyler, Pieter.

Humanism, since the middle of the 15th century the designation of an intellectual movement, which in many respects prepared the way for the Reformation and in contrast to medieval theology placed man in his natural and intellectual development in the foreground, sought to free him from all hierarchical and scholastic restraints and endeavored to build a new culture and Weltanschauung on the foundation of the purely human.

As the basis of education Humanism valued the "humanities" (studia humaniora), especially as they were presented in the works of classical antiquity and to whose content scholars devoted themselves with a new zeal. To be sure, the writings of the Greeks and Romans were not entirely neglected in medieval times; Aristotle indeed had a profound effect particularly on formal education; but on the whole they were only of secondary importance, and science remained dependent upon the church and philosophy was regarded as the "handmaid of theology."

The second half of the 15th century brought with it a fundamental change in this respect. Its point of orientation the Humanistic movement took from Italy. At the time of the "Council of Union" (1439) important Greek scholars from the Orient had come to Florence and exerted their influence on the western world. After the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks (1453) many Greeks fled to Italy. Through their influence first in the field of art, a conscious connection was made with antiquity which was united in the Renaissance with the new feeling of life of the greatest Italian painters; in philosophy Humanism triumphed as the new intellectual movement.

The principal nurseries of this movement were the princely courts of the Medicis in Florence; but the new spirit also penetrated into the highest circles of the hierarchy and the Curia at Rome. Classical learning was accompanied by antique heathenism and a refined syncretism in the secularized church, and occasionally could be heard the pulpit greeting, "Beloved in Plato." For Christianity the Italian Humanists had only a historical or aesthetic interest, in so far as they were not completely indifferent or actually hostile to it.

Much deeper was the development of the Humanistic movement in the countries north of the Alps, where it achieved its greatest significance and where it found a soil prepared for its coming in the schools endowed by Gerhard Groote of the Brethren of the Common Life (q.v.), especially at Deventer in the Netherlands and later at Schlettstadt in Alsace (Jakob Wimpfeling). Humanism reached its decisive influence when it passed from the Latin schools into the universities and was zealously cultivated there: first in Vienna (Celtes), then in Basel, Freiburg, Heidelberg (Agricola), Tübingen, Ingolstadt, Erfurt (Muth), Leipzig, etc. Everywhere a new spirit of research awoke, and through the invention of the art of printing about 1450 the Humanistic ideas found rapid dissemination, especially among the educated classes, the patricians in the cities (Augsburg, Nürnberg, Strasbourg), as well as the nobility of Germany (Ulrich von Hutten, Franz von Sickingen).

The cry, "Back to the sources!" was now applied not only to the study of the old classics; it became the stimulus for the eager study of the original text of the Bible and the writings of the Church Fathers, especially of Augustine. The outstanding representatives and leaders of Humanism were Johann Reuchlin (q.v., d. 1522) and Desiderius Erasmus of Rotterdam (q.v., d. 1536). Reuchlin's most meritorious service was in the field of the original language of the Old Testament; his Hebrew grammar was long the only textbook of this language. Erasmus published the first critical edition of the New Testament in 1516; the second edition (of 1519) was used by Luther as the basis of his translation. Philip Melanchthon succeeded in harmonizing the rich Humanistic intellectual training of the time with the new theology filled with Luther's gospel and making them serve the purposes of the Reformation. Luther himself remained spiritually aloof from Humanism; he felt the difference in spirit. He violently attacked the dominating influence of Aristotle in theology. "From Aristotle back to Paul and Augustine!" was the watchword with which he led the new "Wittenberg theology" into sound paths.

The positive effect of Humanism came to the surface in the open break with the former world of culture. The reign of Scholasticism fell, and science was freed from the guardianship of the church. From serfdom the people and the individual awoke to maturity, to a clearer awareness of self and to personal responsibility, also in matters of faith. Through occupation with religious questions and through the reading of religious pamphlets and books a new lay piety arose. In opposition to the claims of Rome a new national feeling grew stronger. In rude popular wit and biting satire the intrigues and the monastic narrowness of the priesthood were uncovered and mocked. Against the intolerance of the obscurantists a sharp pen war was carried on. The cry for a reform of the church in its leadership and laity grew more common and could no longer be suppressed. Through all of this, Humanism helped to pave the way for religious renewal.

But the negative side of Humanism must not be overlooked. Humanism was not able to penetrate the core of the Gospel. It was more concerned with the education of the spirit than with a renewal of the heart. It remained uninterested and politely indifferent to the actual questions of salvation. In addition to morally outstanding representatives who led an exemplary life, there were others who felt themselves above all moral restraints. Many Humanists rejected the absoluteness of the Christian religion and placed the ethics of Plato and Cicero or the Stoics on the same plane as Jesus' Sermon on the Mount. Syncretism and Pelagianism, indeed often heathen superstition (magic, alchemy, fear of witches), were not lacking. Powers much deeper than and very different from those shown by Humanism were required to produce an inward renewal and transformation of religious and spiritual conditions among the Western peoples. They were not found in Humanism, but in the new comprehension of sin and salvation of the Reformation with its cardinal question, "How can I acquire a merciful God?" Humanism could only serve by preparing the way.

As Humanism in some respects was in general of service to the Reformation, it also in a certain sense helped to break a path for the Anabaptist movement. There was, however, no close connection between Humanism and Anabaptism. But in the field of formal scientific training many an Anabaptist, like Conrad Grebel, Felix Manz, Balthasar Hubmaier, Hans Denk, etc., owed a good share of his sound education to Humanism.

Conrad Grebel (q.v.) acquired a comprehensive knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew during his student years in Vienna, Paris, and Basel. Theology was still remote from his interests, and yet "it would be an error to reckon him as one of the adherents of Humanism antagonistic to Christianity." His fundamental religious views, which he put into reality in the founding of the brotherhood in Zürich, are rooted in his later conversion and are determined only by the words of the Holy Scriptures.

The same is true of Felix Manz (q.v.). He had pursued Humanistic studies in Basel and had a thorough mastery of the classical languages. With Zwingli he read the Old Testament in Hebrew; his expositions of the Bible at their meetings are based on the original text of the New Testament. But his preaching showed no trace of Humanistic influence, but was thoroughly Biblical and theologically orientated.

Hubmaier (q.v.) had a brilliant Humanistic education at his command, the foundation of which had already been laid in the Latin school in Augsburg. At the university of Freiburg he completed it with deep seriousness. Among his teachers Dr. Eck, Luther's later opponent, exerted the greatest influence on him. Hubmaier speaks of Eck with gratitude. "It is wonderful to say," he says, "with what care and eagerness I took up the philosophical ideas, how carefully I listened to my teacher and how zealously I took down his lectures—an industrious reader, an untiring listener, and a busy teacher of the other hearers. So I won the master's degree with the highest praise . . . . What progress I made is attested by my learned lectures, my sermons before the people, and my scholastic exercises" (Loserth, 15). Hubmaier's later works show a comprehensive knowledge of patristic literature. Thus in his booklet, Der uralten und gar neuen Lehrer Urteil of 1526, he bases his teaching on baptism upon the teachings found in Origen, Basil, Athanasius, Tertullian, Jerome, Cyril, Theophylactus, Eusebius, the Corpus juris Canonica; but the more recent authorities are also used by him, in the first place the great Humanist Erasmus (Loserth, 143 ff.). But even though his opponents marvel at his classical education, Fabri calls him a "man of select spirit and outstanding education," and von Watt a "highly eloquent and in a high degree humanistically educated man" (eloquentissimum et humanissimum virum), for Hubmaier all of this was only of formal significance. Humanism furnished him only with the weapons for his fight of faith. His religious life was rooted in his experience of salvation in Christ; the "touchstone" by which he tested all things and on which he based his teaching was the Bible.

Hans Denk (q.v.) also owes his scholarly preparation largely to Humanism; in religious matters, however, he went his own way. Nevertheless his teaching on the freedom of the will, his demand for unconditional liberty of faith and conscience, and his principle of tolerance show the influence of Humanism. In Basel he got into close touch with Oecolampadius and applied himself to the study of the classical languages, especially Hebrew. He was also one of the close circle of students, with whom Erasmus associated. But there is no evidence of any deep influence of that great Humanist upon Denk. A splendid product of his knowledge of Hebrew is the translation of the Old Testament Prophets from the Hebrew, which Denk and Ludwig Haetzer together published in Worms in April 1527. The content of Denk's sensitive contemplative ideas is derived from Christian mysticism, especially from Tauler's sermons and from the Deutsche Theologie, which Luther had published. Denk's doctrine of regeneration and his requirement of discipleship of Jesus in daily life is far above the moral average of his contemporaries.

The relationship of Anabaptism to Humanism may be summarized as follows:

In common with Humanism Anabaptism is characterized by a fearless critique of the traditional ecclesiastical system, a break with the medieval hierarchical concept, a demand for a completely new order in church conditions, a return to the sources of original Christianity, the responsibility of the individual for his own decisions, the demand for complete liberty of faith and conscience and the principle of religious tolerance.

But the ways by which these aims were to be accomplished and the fundamental temper in which it was done were different. Humanism hoped to be able to attain them by humanitarian means; Anabaptism insisted on a renewal of heart, rebirth, and discipleship in daily life. Humanism is basically anthropocentric, Anabaptism Christocentric. To Humanism the actual questions of salvation were unimportant; to Anabaptism the doctrine of salvation had the key position. Humanism regarded the Scriptures as a historic document; Anabaptism held them as the only guide for faith and conduct. Humanism seeks the truth by way of intellectual understanding; Anabaptism looks for it only through divine revelation. To Humanism Christ is a teacher and example among many others; to Anabaptism He is the Son of God and the only medium of salvation. Humanism is concerned with the creation of a new culture; Anabaptism with the realization of the kingdom of God, including the relations of earthly life. To Humanism knowledge was an end in itself; to Anabaptism it was merely a tool of preparation. Humanism promotes the feeling of life and aesthetic enjoyment of life; Anabaptism demands self-denial and willingness to bear the cross to the point of martyrdom. In many of its representatives Humanism teaches that what pleases is permissible; Anabaptism requires fulfillment of the divine commands in the obedience of faith. Humanism pursues a philanthropic ideal and creates an elite of the spirit; Anabaptism seeks a reconciliation of differences in love to the brethren. Humanism is generally indifferent to the Christian ordinances; Anabaptism recognizes in the ordinances of Christ and the apostles a means for the realization of the New Testament church.

In an objective evaluation of given relationships and existing influences and in a critical weighing of inner conflicts, collective Protestantism and with it Anabaptism must not fail to recognize how much it owes to Humanism, especially in its German interpretation. In its positive and negative effects it was an important factor in the historical development of church conditions and in its transition from an old to a new era. E.H.

O. Clemen, "Humanismus in Religion," in RGG; W. Windelband, A History of Philosophy (2d ed., N.Y., 1901); Wuttke, Christliche Sittenlehre (3rd ed., Leipzig, 1874); Loofs, Dogmengeschichte; Springer, Die Rennaissance in Italien III; H. Hermelink, Die religiösen Reformbestrebungen des deutschen Humanismus (Tübingen, 1907); Robert Kreider, "Anabaptism and Humanism: An Inquiry into the Relationship of Humanism to the Evangelical Anabaptists," MQR XXVI (April 1952) 123-41; ML II, 365-68.

Humberstone Reformed Mennonite Church in Welland Co., Ont., was established about 1825. It was later absorbed by Port Colborne, and is now known by that name. The membership of the Port Colborne congregation was 43 in 1954. J.L.K.

Humsterland, a district in western Groningen, Netherlands, where Anabaptists have lived from the beginning. In 1574 an agreement was formulated here between the Frisians and the Flemish, known as the Peace of Humsterland (Humstervrede, q.v.). In 1578 another meeting was held here after fruitless discussions at Emden. There were in Humsterland two groups, the Old Flemish and the Flemish, which extended over several villages. The Old Flemish congregation was always small. In about 1775 it united with the Flemish, which must always have been much larger, and was the center of the Humsterlandsche Sociëteit. In 1838 the combined congregation acquired a new church in Noordhorn, and in 1839 changed the name to Noordhorn. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, passim; DJ 1840, 27, 43; 1850, 60; DB 1879, 4; 1906, 46; ML II, 368.

Humsterlandsche Sociëteit: see Groninger Doopsgezinde Sociëteit.

Humstervrede (Peace of Humsterland). About 1550 divisions began to take place among the Dutch Mennonites. About 1566 the great division between the Frisians and the Flemish occurred at Franeker and Harlingen, and soon spread throughout the country. Violently and irreconcilably they opposed each other. The peaceable, who watched with pain, spared no efforts to heal the breach. Jan Willems was finally successful in establishing a temporary easing of tension on the basis of several articles; the agreement was signed in Humsterland (near Noordhorn) in the province of Groningen, and hence was called the "Peace of Humsterland." The Frisians especially expected much of it, and for a while it seemed that the discussions following it at Hoorn (1576) might bring peace. But the attitude of the Flemish elders was such that all further attempts at peace (1578 at Emden and Hoorn) failed. The question at issue was the application of the ban. The conflict remained sharp and the number of separations increased. Peace did not come for more than a century. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 467, 470, 473; BRN VII, 547 f.; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 109-11; DB 1893, 81; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 425, 447; ML II, 368.

Hungary, originally an independent kingdom (after A.D. 1000) outside the Holy Roman Empire, with the Danube River crossing the great plains, which are surrounded by the densely wooded Carpathian Mountains. In 1526 the last Hungarian king fell in a battle against the Turks and the kingdom was now inherited by the Hapsburgs (q.v.); however, it was not until 1700 that the Turks were driven out completely. From then on Hungary was ruled by the government in Vienna, more or less in an absolutist fashion. After 1867 Hungary again had its own government, and the Hapsburg territory was then named Austria-Hungary. In 1918 this kingdom broke up into the following parts: Republic of Hungary (capital Budapest); Slovakia (capital Bratislava), as a part of the Czechoslovakian Republic; Transylvania (capital Cluj, formerly Klausenburg), as part of Rumania; and Croatia, Slavonia, and the Bata, as part of Yugoslavia.

During the Reformation era the manorial lords (called magnates) turned to a very large extent to the Calvinist or Reformed faith. They were quite independent of the Viennese court, and it was not until the 18th century that this court could attempt greater centralization of the empire. A parliament existed in Budapest since the Middle Ages, mainly as an aristocratic assembly. An elected Palatine functioned as viceroy and representative of the Hapsburgs in Hungary and as a representative of the aristocracy in Vienna.

Anabaptists (Hutterites) lived in only three districts (comitates) of Western Hungary, now Slovakia, after 1546 (see Slovakia), and here enjoyed a relative internal peace under the magnates (externally the numerous Turkish Wars brought much hardship). It was only in the 18th century, under Maria Theresa (1740-80), that enforced conversion by Jesuits (q.v.) was carried out (see Habaner). In Transylvania (inhabited by Rumanians, Magyars, and colonial Germans, called Saxons) the Brethren had only one large settlement near Alvinc (1621-1767). It, too, had to be abandoned when systematic persecution set in in the 18th century, and thus the great trek began into Walachia and Russia. (See Alvinc, Ehrenpreis, Habaner, Jesuits, Sobotiste, Transylvania, Velke Levary, also Hapsburg.) R.F.

Hungerl, Peter, "the servant" of Peter Planer, an Anabaptist martyr, after severe torture beheaded in 1532 at Sterzing, Austria. In the Martyrs' Mirror van Braght calls him "Pieter the servant of Peter Plaver." His martyrdom was shared by Hans Beck, Lambrecht Gruber, Peter Planer, Lorenz Schuster, and Hans Thaler. vdZ.

Loserth, Anabaptismus; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 102 f.; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 108 f.; Mart. Mir. D 33, E 440; ML I, 149; III, 368.

Hunsberger, a Mennonite family, evidently Swiss in origin, found in the Franconia (Pa.) and Ontario districts of the Mennonite Church (MC). Bishop Henry Hunsberger (1768-1854) of the Blooming Glen, Pa., Mennonite congregation (MC) was assistant moderator of the Franconia Conference in 1847 by virtue of being second in seniority in years of service as a bishop. Because the moderator, Bishop John Hunsicker, who died Nov. 17, 1847, sympathized with the vision and concerns of John H. Oberholtzer and sat with the Oberholtzer party who occupied one particular section in the Franconia meetinghouse on Oct. 7, 1847, when the final secession of the Oberholtzer group occurred, Hunsberger served as moderator of the October 1847 session of the Franconia Conference. Jacob B. Hunsberger (1836-1919) served as preacher in the Coventry and Vincent congregations of the Franconia Conference from 1877 until his death over 41 years later. Christian R. Hunsberger (1823-1906) was a preacher in the Upper Skippack congregation (MC) of the Franconia Conference 1879-1906. Among the Ontario Mennonite (MC) preachers may be mentioned Abraham K. Hunsberger (1827-89) of the Moyer congregation, and Noah Hunsberger, ordained preacher in 1903, who served at Sherkston and Waterloo. Bishop Ephraim Hunsberger (1814-1904) of the Eastern District Conference (GCM) served as preacher at the Hereford (GCM) congregation 1849-52 when he removed to Wadsworth, Medina Co., Ohio, where he organized a congregation which he served for 50 years. J.C.W.

B. K. Hunsberger, The Hunsbergers, Part II, The Descendants of 31 Christian Hunsberger (n.p., 1926); idem, The Hunsbergers (Norristown, 1941).

Hunsberger, Ephraim, was born near Bally, Berks Co., Pa., Nov. 18, 1814, died at Wadsworth, Ohio, Feb. 21, 1904. He was married to Esther Bechtel in Montgomery Co., Pa., on Dec. 23, 1838. To this union 12 children were born. After the death of his first wife he married Elizabeth Overholt of Medina County on March 17, 1862. Three children were born to this union. His father, Abraham Hunsberger, was a teacher and gave his son an education in German and English. Ephraim learned the trade of carriage making. On Oct. 18, 1849, he was called to the ministry by lot as assistant to Christian Clemmer, pastor of the Hereford Mennonite (GCM) Church, and on Oct. 10, 1852, ordained elder. Immediately following this ordination, upon the call of four families, he moved to Wadsworth, Medina Co., Ohio, where a congregation, now known as the First Mennonite Church (GCM) of Wadsworth, was organized. For the next half century Hunsberger gave his life in service in this area. One phase of his activity was the organization of a Sunday school in 1854. He continued as pastor until 1892, when N. C. Hirschy became his successor.

Hunsberger was a central figure in the organization of the General Conference Mennonite Church 1859-65. He was overseer of the erection of the Wadsworth School (q.v.) and served as president of the Board of Supervisors from 1863. A.S.R.

H. P. Krehbiel, History of the General Conference (Canton, 1898); Rachel Kreider, "One Hundred Years at Wadsworth," Menn. Life VIII (1953) 161-66; The First Hundred Years (Wadsworth, 1952).

Hunsicker (Hunziker, Unzicker, Hunzinger, Hunsinger, Honsaker), a Swiss family from the region of Aargau, represented today in Alsace, the Palatinate, and America. The Hunsickers left Switzerland because of religious persecution about the middle of the 17th century. One of the well-known European representatives of the family was Abraham Hunzinger (1792-1859), author of Das Religions-, Kirchen- und Schulwesen der Mennoniten (Speyer, 1830). Valentine Hunsicker (1700-71) emigrated from Europe to eastern Pennsylvania in 1717 and served as deacon in the Skippack congregation (MC) of the Franconia Conference about 1739. Three of the more prominent American Hunsickers were Bishop Henry Hunsicker (1752-1836) and his sons, Bishop John Hunsicker (1773-1847), senior bishop of the Franconia Conference in 1847 (he seceded with John H. Oberholtzer), and his younger brother, Preacher Abraham Hunsicker (1793-1872), who also seceded in 1847, and who with the help of his son, Henry A. Hunsicker, established Freeland Seminary in 1848. Henry A. Hunsicker served as principal of Freeland Seminary from 1848 until 1865. (The name of the school was changed to Ursinus College in 1869; the institution had not long remained Mennonite, but had become a college of the Reformed Church.) Oberholtzer's conference ordained Preacher Abraham Hunsicker a bishop in 1847 and his son Henry A. Hunsicker a preacher in 1850, but in 1851 expelled them both. They then carried on a sort of nonsectarian work. The Unzicker families of the midwest, especially in Illinois, are 19th-century immigrants from Europe, and included a number of Amish Mennonite ministers. The best-known layman named Hunsicker was Leidy D. Hunsicker (1878-1954) of the Blooming Glen, Pa., Mennonite Church (MC), a noted chorister for 40 years. J.C.W.

H. A. Hunsicker, A Genealogical History of the Hunsicker Family (Phila., 1911).

Huntersville Mennonite Church (MC), Menahga, Minn., was established as a mission church in 1942 and is sponsored by the district mission board of the North Central Mennonite Conference. It was an outgrowth of a service unit from the Franconia Mennonite Conference in 1949-50. The 30 members, mostly of Finnish background, worship in a basement. The pastor (1955) is Clyde Allebach. C.A.

Huntington Avenue Mennonite Church (MC), formerly the Newport News Mennonite Mission, located in Newport News, Va., was begun in 1928 by the Warwick River Mennonite congregation (q.v.). In 1936 the mission was turned over to the Virginia Board of Missions and Charities, and a year later a brick meetinghouse was built. In 1951 the mission was organized as an independent congregation under the Virginia Conference (MC). In 1955 Andrew M. Hartzler was the minister and the membership was 31. C.N.K.

Hunzinger, Abraham (1792-1859), a German Mennonite writer, was born May 22, 1792, at Wimpfen, Germany. He was the author of a booklet, Das Religions-, Kirchen- und Schulwesen der Mennoniten oder Taufgesinnten: wahr und unpartheiisch dargestellt und mit besonderen Betrachtungen über einige Dogmen und mit Verbesserungs-Vorschlägen versehen von einem Mennoniten (Speyer, 1830). The booklet is dedicated to the Grand Duke of Baden, Ludwig Wilhelm August, and was accepted by him in a letter by his own hand Jan. 13, 1829. An American edition of the book appeared at Milford Square, Pa., in 1862.

After a foreword and an interesting table of subscribers, containing only a few Mennonite names, Part I, Section 1, contains a brief, often inexact and incorrect account of the history of the Mennonites; Section 2, several confessions and a description of the contents of the Christliches Gemüthsgespräch (q.v.) whose appended "Kurze Unterweisung" is presented verbatim; Section 3, an extract from the Dahlem Formularbuch with a short notice on other customs; Section 4 reports on the "Kultus und die Liturgie der amischen Mennoniten," who are erroneously also called Frisians; Section 5 deals with the Flemish or more lenient Mennonites — he means the Reist-Mennonites; Section 6, of the election of preachers and elders; Section 7, of religious instruction; Section 8, of the errors and abuses and their consequences, which are rigorous church discipline, rejection of scientific study.

Part II deals with the distinctive Mennonite doctrines: (1) baptism; (2) oath; (3) divorce; (4) bearing of arms and warfare; (5) occupying government positions; and (6) marriage with members of other churches. The last four Hunzinger wants changed, and presents detailed proposals for improvement, which consist in the appointment of a salaried church council, approved by the ruler, as the highest authority of the Mennonites in every country, the employment of salaried, educated preachers and morally sound, properly trained schoolteachers, introduction of special church synods, introduction of suitable religious instruction, which is to be continued in Sunday schools to the eighteenth year, and proposals for raising funds, with the support of the state and the other churches.

Of the supplements, the statements of the government decisions of Baden and the statistics have a certain historical value. On the whole, the entire treatise, breathing the current spirit of Rationalism, has had no significance for the Mennonites.

In 1817 he changed his name from Hunsinger to Hunzinger, its original form. Abraham Hunzinger had six sons and two daughters, whom he had baptized into the Protestant church. Three of his sons became Protestant pastors in Hesse and Mecklenburg; a grandson Prof. Aug. Wilhelm Hunzinger (d. 1920) was the head pastor of St. Michael's in Hamburg, the author of a series of important books, mostly apologetics. (ML II, 368 f.) NEFF.

Huron County, Mich., a rich farming section locaed in the east-central part of the state. Approximately 370 Mennonites are scattered over an area about 20 miles long and 10 miles wide in the western part of the county. Three families live in adjoining Tuscola County as home missionaries. Approximately three fourths of the settlement is of the Conservative Amish Mennonite branch and the remainder of the Mennonite (MC) branch of the church. The first settlers arrived from Ontario about 1888 or earlier and later organized what is now the Pigeon Mennonite Church. The settlers who later organized the Pigeon River Conservative A.M. Church began to arrive in 1900. The Fairhaven Mission was begun as an outpost of this church in 1934. R.B.

Huron County, Ont., comprises the central townships in Ontario lying along the east shore of Lake Huron. Its maritime climate makes it suitable for raising a variety of bush and tree fruits as well as mixed farming and stock raising. The first Mennonites to migrate westward beyond Waterloo County, settling in Hay Township (q.v.) about 1840, were Amish; about 1850 the Mennonites also settled there and with help from itinerant ministers from Waterloo County assemblies were started in the townships of Hay, Stanley, and Grey. Daniel Brundage (q.v.), who moved from York Co., Ont., about 1850, was the earliest resident minister. The first deacons were Daniel Lehman, Samuel Reesor, Henry Baer. (See Hay; Stanley; Clemens; Zurich, MC.) J.C.F.

Huron Hutterite Bruderhof 12 miles northeast of Huron, S.D., founded in 1906 by ten families from the Bon Homme Bruderhof and their preacher Joseph Waldner, who was chosen to the ministry in 1905 in the Bon Homme colony. In 1911 Michael Waldner was chosen to the ministry. In 1918 the Bruderhof sold its property and migrated to Canada, founding the Huron Bruderhof (q.v.) in Manitoba. D.D.

Huron Hutterite Bruderhof, four miles north of Benard, Man., founded in 1918 by 19 families with their preachers Joseph and Michael Waldner, who were brothers. The colony sold its holdings in South Dakota, 12 miles northeast of Huron and gave the new Bruderhof the same name. The reason for the migration was the more liberal provisions made for conscientious objectors to military service. On Feb. 14, 1926, Joseph Glanzer was chosen preacher and confirmed in office on Dec. 9, 1934. Preacher Michael Waldner was chosen on March 3, 1940. In 1947 the Bruderhof numbered 163, of whom 64 were baptized members. D.D.

Husum, a city (pop. 23,551) in Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, 20 miles west of Schleswig. In the early 1600's Jan Clasen, called Rollwagen (see Acronius), the ducal dike-master, planned to build some dikes south and north of Husum. Although Husum never had special religious privileges, it is known that two Mennonites were citizens there in 1702 and 1737 practicing their dyer's trade; viz., Johan Claesen van Aken and Franz Claasen van Aken, probably father and son; their descendants, if there were any, were lost to the state church through mixed marriage. Twice Husum again plays a slight role in Mennonite history. In 1850 C. J. van der Smissen, pastor of Friedrichstadt, fled to Husum with the church records when Schleswig-Holstein shelled its own city during the Danish occupation. The last preacher of the Friedrichstadt (q.v.) church, an Ellenberger, made his living as a bank official in Husum, because the church had lost its assets in the catastrophic inflation of German currency in 1922-23. (ML II, 369.) R.Do.

Hut (Hutt, Huth, Huet), Hans, is correctly known as the apostle of the Anabaptists in Upper Austria, although his work and influence extended far beyond its borders, at first in his home country, Franconia, then in Bavaria and Salzburg, Moravia, and Silesia. He was a native of Haina near Römhild in Thuringia. The year of his birth is not known. For four years before 1517 he was a sexton in the service of the knights Hans and Georg von Bibra-Schwebenheim in the village of Bibra near Meiningen. There he had property of his own. By trade he was a bookbinder, but he worked also as a book salesman. As such he traveled about the country distributing pamphlets propagating the new evangelical Lutheran faith. Thus he came to Würzburg, Bamberg, Nürnberg, Passau, and as far as Austria. For several years he was a frequent visitor in Wittenberg (Meyer, 223).

His appearance is described in a kind of poster issued by the council of Nürnberg on March 26, 1527, which says: "The highest and chief leader of the Anabaptists is Johannes Hut, a well-educated, clever fellow, rather tall, a peasant with light brown cropped hair and a blond mustache. He is dressed in a gray, sometimes a black, ridingcoat, a broad gray hat, and gray pants."

About 1524 he met in Weissenfels with three other craftsmen, a miller, a tailor, and a weaver of wool. They argued on baptism. Their objections to infant baptism caused him to reflect. He sought enlightenment in Wittenberg. The information he received there in support of infant baptism did not satisfy him; it was outweighed for him by such Bible passages on baptism as Matt. 28:20; Mark 16:16, and Acts 19:3. Christ and the apostles baptized no children; they should therefore not be baptized until they have acquired understanding for a truly Christian life and for the sufferings that accompany it. He was also confused by the fact that the preaching of the Wittenberg theologians did not produce a reform of life.

When Hut had returned to Bibra, he refused to have his newborn child baptized. He declared that he had been shown no proof in the Bible that infant baptism was necessary. Then the lords of Bibra ordered a disputation, but at the same time they demanded that he have his child baptized within eight days or sell his property and move out. He chose the latter course and left his home with wife and five children. He probably betook himself to Nürnberg where he met Hans Denk (q.v.), who received him in his house. He also met Wolfgang Vogel (q.v.), pastor at Eltersdorf; later he preached in this village and baptized Vogel and two others. Vogel also visited him in Nürnberg and talked with him about the Gospel.

While peddling his books between Wittenberg and Erfurt, Hut heard that the Peasants War had broken out near by. He immediately betook himself to Frankenhausen (Thuringia) where the army was stationed, hoping to earn much money selling books and pamphlets (1525). Here he heard Thomas Müntzer (q.v.) preaching against the lords; apparently he was profoundly impressed by all that he saw and heard here. Especially the thought of the imminent coming of Christ kindled in him a sort of enthusiasm for this war. When on the next day the peasants marched to battle, he at first went up the hill with them, but because "the shooting was too thick," he hastened back to Frankenhausen where he was later seized by the Hessian authorities. Although many peasants were executed on that day, he was fortunate in being released.

Now he returned to Bibra, and stayed there for some time. Müntzer also went there on his flight and spent a night and a day in his house. He gave Hut his exposition of the first chapter of the Gospel of Luke to be printed; they had had no other dealings. Hans Hut stated expressly at his later trial that he had not been an adherent of Müntzer; "he did not understand him." In Bibra Jörg Hauck (q.v.) invited him to preach. On May 31, 1525, Hut then preached on baptism, communion, idolatry, and the Mass. He made some grave statements about the holders of benefices, who served the Gospel for the sake of their belly. "The Almighty God will punish them and all who oppose the truth; they will all perish in disgrace, and it is now the time when they will be defeated, and the peasants have the power" (Meyer, 251). He explained that he had meant the end-times, and thought they had come. But he had erred and knew better now.

After the complete defeat of the peasants and the bloody suppression of the revolt Hut could no longer stay in Bibra. He was again forced to flee. He turned his steps to Augsburg, where he again met Hans Denk. Denk and Kaspar Färber (q.v.) persuaded him, after long hesitation, to join the Anabaptists. On May 26, 1526, Denk baptized him in a little house before the Heiligkreuz gate.

Now Hut worked with unprecedented success for the establishment and spread of the new brotherhood. "Very quietly, but indefatigably he went from place to place in Bavaria, Swabia, Franconia, and Austria, a popular preacher of deepest effectiveness, everywhere proclaiming Anabaptist doctrine, immediately baptizing those he convinced, and sending out individuals as apostles. Especially in the ranks of the artisans he found many adherents" (Wappler, 28). In the period of a few months he succeeded in winning a great number of converts.

His confessions and those of his adherents offer rather exact information on his preaching. He usually began with the words, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. He who believes the Gospel and is baptized will be saved; and this is the baptism—to endure anxiety, want, sorrow, and all tribulations in patience." With glowing words he proclaimed the imminent coming of Christ. He divided his sermons into four parts: (1) the judgment upon the house of God; (2) judgment upon the world; (3) the future; and (4) the resurrection. On the basis of Matt. 24; Mark 13, and Luke 17 he explained the signs of the times. The threatening Turkish tribulation was to him a certain sign of Christ's imminent return. But other great tribulations would also occur: revolt, earthquakes, wars, and plagues, so that scarcely one man in three would survive. For three and one-half years more the Lord had given time for repentance, as shown in Rev. 13 and Dan. 12. He who was converted to repentance would be persecuted, as is stated in II Tim. 3:12. But those who repented in these last times would not perish, but survive, and after the day and the judgment of the Lord would possess and rule the earth and would not die (I Cor. 15).

Thus it is evident that Hut's preaching on the return of Christ was entirely based on the Bible and was purely religious. He kept himself aloof from any political or revolutionary tendencies. Statements to the contrary taken from the confessions of his adherents either are erroneously interpreted or are forced by the torments of the rack. He expressly asserted that he knew of no coming of Christ but the one indicated in the Holy Scriptures; it would not be a physical, but a spiritual kingdom. He also denied the imputation that he considered himself a special prophet; he was only a preacher of the Gospel. Nor did he boast of special visions or revelations. God, however, imparted His revelations to the elect sometimes by visions and dreams. There are, he said, three kinds of dreams. Some come from the flesh, from the daily conduct. These are worthless. Some are from the devil; the evils with which one has had contact during the day appear again at night. These are also worthless. Some come from God; they are revealed to human beings by the strength of the Holy Spirit through certain signs and words. He who understands may accept them, and much is revealed to him, as is promised in Num. 12.

Hut also taught that government is instituted by God and implicit obedience is its due. He rejected community of goods. He persuaded no one to sell his goods, but taught that anyone who had a superfluity of goods should help the poor.

In the center of his preaching was the confession of Christ Jesus, the Son of God, who was true God and true man, and who has paid the price for the sins of the whole world and has redeemed us. "He and Denk preached of the crucified Christ, how He suffered and was obedient to His Father unto death," says one of his confessions.

Infant baptism he repudiated; it was not instituted by God; not a word is found about it in the Holy Scriptures. One must not be baptized until he can with full understanding assume the responsibility of living a Christian life, as shown by the Word of God, and for God's sake to suffer all that is laid upon one. Three kinds of baptism are known—baptism by spirit, water, and blood; the three are one and bear witness on earth (I John 5:6-8). The first, the spirit, is the assurance and the assent to the divine Word, that he will live as is proclaimed to him by the Word. This is the covenant of God, which God makes with them through His Spirit and their hearts. Beyond this, God has given water as a sign of this covenant, with which one testifies that he will live in true obedience toward God and all Christians, and lead such a life that he is blameless. But he who does not live right, and deals contrary to God and to love, shall be rebuked by the others; this is the ban that God describes; this is a sign before the church. The third is the blood; this is the baptism that Christ indicated to His disciples; "Ye shall be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with." This is the baptism that testifies throughout the world, wherever such blood is shed.

Concerning the Lord's Supper Hut did not hold that the body of Christ is in the bread, or the blood of Christ in the cup; it is nothing other than it has always been, namely, bread and wine; for Christ said to His disciples, "I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it anew with you in my Father's kingdom"; and likewise, when they had all drunk from the cup, "This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many." These words Christ spoke after the eating and drinking, and also shed His blood afterwards; therefore he believes that Christ gave bread and wine to His disciples as a memorial of His suffering, and not His body and His blood.

From Augsburg Hut probably went first into Franconia. In his native town of Haina he won the cooper Georg Volk Kolerlin; in the vicinity he also won many adherents, among them Kilian Volkaimer, Eucharius Binder (q.v.), and Joachim Mertz, who became zealous representatives of the Anabaptist cause. Near Erlangen he held a conference, which was broken up by the Nürnberg authorities; several of his adherents were seized, but were soon released and expelled from the city. Now he made his way to Swabia; the council of Nürnberg sent warnings to Augsburg, Ulm, and Regensburg. Hut moved on to Austria and Moravia.

In the spring of 1526 Hut again spent about ten days in Augsburg. He lived in the home of Eitelhans Langenmantel (q.v.), and won him to the Anabaptist cause, as also the monk Sigmund Salminger (q.v.), the painter Peter Scheppach, and others. He organized the young congregation in Augsburg, giving it a firmer footing. He conducted the choice of leaders. The lot fell on Sigmund Salminger; his substitute was Jakob Dachser (q.v.). Hut also arranged for the care of the poor.

At the end of 1526 Hut came to Nikolsburg, where he met Balthasar Hubmaier. They were of different temperaments. Hubmaier would have nothing to do with Hut's chiliasm, nor with his opposition to the government. Hubmaier tried to eliminate the difficulties by the usual disputation. The first one was held in Bergen, a village near Nikolsburg. They discussed community of goods and taxes for resisting the Turks. Since the Anabaptists were committed against warfare or furnishing funds for it, they faced the dilemma either of sacrificing their principles of faith or of refusing obedience to the government at a time when the cry arose, "The Turk is marching upon Vienna!" In addition, the Moravian diet had pronounced all those as dishonorable who managed to be released from these taxes. In the Nikolsburg Anabaptist congregation the rigorous party insisted on exact obedience to their principles and found a leader in Hans Hut. Hubmaier and his adherents were less strict. Thus, as could be expected, the first disputation was fruitless.

The second disputation, held in the Nikolsburg castle, likewise did not lead to union. Hut, who voted "against the sword," was now forcibly detained in the castle. A friend helped him to escape through a window. In this disputation also other subjects were discussed. Hans Nadler (q.v.) of Erlangen enumerated seven points under discussion: (1) baptism; (2) communion; (3) God's judgment; (4) God's sentence; (5) the end of the world; (6) the new kingdom; (7) the return of Christ (Schornbaum, 153).

In former times this disputation of 1526 was usually associated with the "Nikolsburg Artikel," a document which brought the Anabaptists into serious disrepute. (It was even deemed important enough to be put on the Index of Forbidden Books in Rome.) Hut at his trial emphatically denied any part in its composition and guessed that perhaps Hubmaier forged it out of jealousy. Today it has been proved that it was forged by enemies of the Anabaptists, most likely by Urbanus Rhegius, the Lutheran preacher at Augsburg, to discredit the Anabaptists, and has nothing to do with Hut or Hubmaier (see Nikolsburg Articles).

In the conflict between Hut and Hubmaier, Oswald Glait was one of those on Hut's side; he soon accompanied Hut to Vienna. In Vienna the Anabaptists held a meeting in a house on Kärntnerstrasse. Here 50 persons, including Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.), were baptized by Hut. From Vienna Hut went to Melk, where he made contacts with Anabaptists and baptized 15 persons.

On June 15, 1527, Hut arrived secretly in Steyr (q.v.), Upper Austria, with two companions, Hieronymus (probably Hieronymus Hermann of Mondsee, a former monk from Ranshofen) and Karius (probably Eucharius Binder), and was introduced into the company of respected citizens by Frater Jakob (Portner), the chaplain of Count Rogendorf. On the following Sunday he held a meeting in the house of Veit Pfefferl at the Grünmarkt; later on he baptized and administered communion also outside the city. Among those baptized were Leonhard Dorfbrunner (q.v.), a former priest, and a chaplain of Pechlarn. When the city council was informed of these meetings, it issued a prohibition and ordered the arrest of the preachers. Hut escaped, but his patrons and those he had baptized were arrested, tried, several executed, and the others expelled; only those who recanted were released.

Hut now fled to Freistadt (q.v.), Upper Austria. Here too he met Anabaptists. Near the city, in the home of Baron von Zelking, Hans Schlaffer (q.v.) had already been active in 1526. In Freistadt Hut baptized ten or twelve persons. From there he went to Gallneukirchen, where he won ten members to the cause, and thence to Linz (q.v.), preaching and baptizing everywhere. It is known that he was active also in Passau. Finally traces of his work are found in Schärding, Braunau, Laufen, and Salzburg. In Salzburg he stayed longer, preaching in the house of a citizen Georg Goldschmidt (q.v.), whom he won with his wife and six others to the Anabaptist cause.

From Salzburg Hut returned to Augsburg, where he participated in the "Martyrs' Synod" of 1527. Here he was later seized and tried for the first time on Sept. 16, 1527. From his admissions it is seen how extensive his field of influence was, especially in Moravia. After this trial he was given several others, some on the rack. Exact information was given on his life in Bibra, Nürnberg, Salzburg, Moravia, Franconia, and Austria.

Concerning Hut's death there are two reports. According to one he apparently had a premonition of death by violence, and decided to escape by flight. He managed to make a light, and wrapping it in rags, produced much smoke, and cried out, hoping that his irons would be opened by the iron-master. He planned to take the keys and escape. But the guard arrived too late; Hut was nearly asphyxiated, and died Dec. 6, 1527, "as God wished." The second account, found in the Geschicht-Buch (Wolkan, 47), was given by his son Philipp. It states that "Hut was racked in the tower, and then released. He lay like one dead." They went away, leaving a candle in his cell, which ignited the straw. When they came to the tower they found him dead.

In either case, sentence could be pronounced only on his corpse. The officials took the dead body to court on a chair, tied the chair to the executioner's cart, sentenced it to die, and burned it at the stake on Dec. 7.

Hans Hut had five children. A daughter died on Jan. 25, 1527, a martyr to her faith; she was drowned in Bamberg. A son Philipp died in Moravia as a member of the brotherhood (Beck, 35).

Not a few mourned Hut's innocent death, gathered his ashes, and took them away as sacred relics. Thus Hut, "a well-educated and clever fellow," as Urbanus Rhegius called him, considered by his brethren an elect instrument of God, who had in scarcely two years won more adherents to Anabaptism than all the other leaders together, laid down his life. Hut was obviously one of the most important leaders of the great Anabaptist movement in the 1520's. He was able to hold his own against great speakers in his own group like Hubmaier. Today the opinion prevails that he was one of the leading and most forceful Anabaptists of the earliest period who influenced that movement, both in Bavaria and Austria by his activities as well as by his writings.

Of these writings only two tracts and two shorter pieces have become known, besides a number of hymns of permanent value. (1) The book Vom Geheimnus der Tauff is found in many Hutterite manuscript books (but without naming its author). According to Roth (1900) it is identical with the book Hut himself mentioned at his trial in November 1527 as Von dem Buch mit den sieben Siegeln, wie in Apocalypsi steht geschrieben (a msc. supposedly in the city archives of Augsburg). The brethren called it "the book with the seven seals." L. Müller, Glaubenszeugnisse, 12-28, prints it from a Hutterite manuscript. (2) Ein christlicher Unterricht wie göttliche Geschrift vergleicht und geurteilt soll werden. This tract was published in 1527 by Johannes Landtsperger (q.v.); L. Müller, Glaubenszeugnisse, 28-37, prints the main part of it; it was also published in the Mittheilungen aus dem Antiquariat S. Calvary (Berlin, 1871; there under the name Landtsperger). It is likewise found anonymously in many Hutterite manuscript books. At his trial on Nov. 14, 1527, Hut mentioned this tract as a "booklet on three articles of faith, for which Landtsperger set the title" (and changed it at not less than 20 places). L. Müller recognizes in it a certain dependence on Denk's book, Unterricht wie das Gesetz Gottes aufgehebt und doch erfüllt muss werden (something which Sebastian Franck had called the Schriftkrieg—the paradoxes within the Holy Scriptures and their solution).

A third booklet of Hut's was a pastoral epistle beginning "To all good-hearted Christians I Hans Hut wish the pure fear of divine wisdom . . ." (dated "at the cave of Elias"; this is supposedly a typical term of Thomas Müntzer, according to L. Müller), written in Augsburg. When it became known to the Lutheran preacher Urbanus Rhegius (q.v.) of Augsburg, he immediately replied with a pamphlet in quarto, Sendbrief Hans Huthen etwan ains Fürnemen Vorsteers im Wiedertaufforden. Verantwortet durch Urbanum Rhegium (Augsburg, 1528). From it L. Müller, Glaubenszeugnisse, 12, note, prints the main section of the epistle.

A fourth Hut publication was the Rathsbüchlein (1526-27). It was found in a pocket of Eitelhans Langenmantel (q.v.) when arrested, and is made up of a catechism, a prayer before meals, and a concordance (with 78 items). F. Roth published it in his study of Langenmantel (Z. d. Hist. Ver. f. Schwaben, 1900, 39 ff.). At his trial Hut admitted that he had compiled close to one hundred concordance items in his Bible, which he left to his son (Meyer, 236).

It must be regretted that the work of Hut has not yet been studied and analyzed from the standpoint of a history of Anabaptist ideas. As Hut was an important agent of this new movement, valiantly suffering for the nonresistant attitude of true discipleship, but, on the other hand, perhaps somewhat too strongly emphasizing the eschatological-chiliastic angle, such a study would be highly needed. The work by Neuser (1913) has unfortunately never been published in full.

Hut was also a rather successful writer of hymns which found later entrance even into Lutheran and Reformed hymnals. Two or three hymns became known from Hutterite manuscript books, two more are known through the work of Wackernagel, Das Deutsche Kirchenlied (see Wolkan, Lieder, 15). (1) The best-known hymn is the Danksagung "which we sing when celebrating the Lord's Supper" (Beck, 35, Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 47). It begins, "Wir danksagen dir, Herr Gott der Ehren . . ." and has seven stanzas. Wackernagel (III, 507) erroneously ascribes it to Thomas Müntzer. According to Beck (649, note 2) it was still in use 1650 by the Brethren, and might even today be sung at the Bruderhofs (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 38 f., from an old msc. book). Wolkan remarks that this hymn was possibly still older, and was only reworked by Hut. (2) The hymn, "O Almechtiger Herre Gott, wie gar lieblich sind Deine Gebot," is well known from the Ausbund (all modern editions, 49-51), 12 stanzas. It is also present in several Hutterite manuscript books, and published by Wackernagel (III, 508) and in the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 39 f. (3) This Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder prints one more hymn (40) of five stanzas, Die Danksagung genannt ("Der wahre Fels ward da geschlagen . . ."), but Hut's authorship is uncertain (again reference is made to Beck, 649, note). The next two hymns are not found in Hutterite codices. Wackernagel prints them (III, 509 and 510 f.) from the Salmingersche Gesangbuch of 1537. (4) "Lasst uns von Hertzen singen." As its author Hut is expressly named. (5) "O Herre Gott in deynem Reych . . . ," a paraphrase of the eighth Psalm, was printed 1527, 1529, and 1537. Hut's authorship is not absolutely certain, but most likely. It has eight stanzas (1527), but only seven in later editions. Wackernagel (III, 511) prints this later edition which begins, "O Herre Gott in Ewigkait, wie ist dein nam so sunderlich. . . ." LOSERTH, R.F.

Chr. Meyer, "Die Anfänge des Wiedertäuferthums in Augsburg," Ztscht d. Hist. Ver. f. Schwaben, 1874, 207-56, with a complete publication of the court records at Augsburg, 1527; W. Neuser, Hans Hut, Leben und Wirken bis zum Nikolsburger Religionsgespräch (Berlin, 1913) (the complete dissertation has never been published; Lydia Müller, Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter (Leipzig, 1938); F. Roth, "Zur Lebensgeschichte Eitelhans Langenmantels zu Augsburg," Ztscht d. Hist. Ver. f. Schwaben, 1900 (here the Rathsbüchlein, 38-40); F. Roth, Augsburger Ref.-Gesch. (2nd ed. 1901); other literature in ML II, 370-75.

Hutagodang, a mission station on the island of Sumatra (q.v.), formerly Dutch East Indies, now Indonesia, operated by the Dutch Mennonite Mission Society, was founded in 1912 by Peter Nachtigal (q.v.). In 1938 this station was transferred to a German mission association. VDZ.

Hutchinson, Kan. (pop. 34,000), is the county seat of Reno County. The earliest settlements of Mennonites near Hutchinson took place between 1874 and 1883 when groups of the Amish came from Pennsylvania and Illinois and settled south and west of the city near the present village of Yoder. Today these Amish settlements constitute three groups: the Old Order Amish, the Conservative Amish, and the Mennonites (MC). The Conservative Amish have a meetinghouse at Partridge, Kan.; the group that has become affiliated with the Mennonite Church (MC) has its church one mile north of Yoder, Kan. This latter church has a membership of 280 at present.

Throughout the years, many Mennonites (GCM, KMB, MB, CGM, EM, and MC) have moved into Hutchinson from surrounding communities such as Pretty Prairie, Burrton, Buhler, Inman, and Sterling. Many of these have relinquished their Mennonite affiliation; still others continue to worship in their home churches. Four Mennonite churches have been established in the city of Hutchinson to minister to Mennonites in the city; viz., the Mennonite Mission Church (MC; present membership 125), the First Mennonite Church (GCM; present membership 200), the Orchard Park Church (KMB; with 31), and an E.M.B. church (with 26). An inter-Mennonite Bible academy named the Central Kansas Bible Academy is also located in the city of Hutchinson. V.S.

Hutchinson County, in southeastern South Dakota, is the most heavily Mennonite populated county in the state. Beginning in 1874 until the early 1880's a heavy stream of Mennonites settled in the county, all coming from Russia. Freeman (pop. 1,000, about two-thirds Mennonite) very early came to be an active center of Mennonite life. In this city there are many Mennonite business establishments, a Mennonite home for the aged, Freeman Junior College (q.v.), and a General Conference Mennonite church. Many Mennonites from the surrounding territory have come to Freeman to retire. There are in the county six Mennonite churches—one Mennonite Brethren, one Krimmer Mennonite Brethren, and four General Conference Mennonite, all but one of which are rural, and three Hutterian Brethren Bruderhofs, all located along the James River, with a population of 275. The estimated 1,700 Mennonites in the county constitute approximately 14 per cent of its total population. J.D.U.

Hutchinson Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church, called Crestview Bible Church, on the corner of 17th and Crestview, Hutchinson, Kan., was organized in 1954, when the meetinghouse was erected, although the first meeting of the group was held on Dec. 2, 1953. The membership in May 1955 was 26, with Vernon Harms as pastor. H.S.B.

Hutchinson First Mennonite Church (GCM) at 725 E. 7th St. in Hutchinson, Kan., is a member of the Western District Conference. The first service was held on April 20, 1913, and a site was purchased in 1914. Sponsorship of the church was transferred to the Home Mission Board in 1917. A church was dedicated on March 28, 1920, and a congregation organized in 1922. The congregation became independent in March 1936. In 1955 the membership was 192, with Leonard Metzker as pastor. V.S.

Huthwohl (Hüthwohl), a Mennonite family found in the Palatinate and Rheinhessen, Germany, in the 17th and 18th centuries. Valentin Huthwohl of Kriegsheim, probably a preacher, wrote a letter to the Mennonites in Amsterdam in 1671, informing them that 430 Swiss Mennonite refugees had come to the Palatinate, and asking their financial aid, which was liberally granted. Again in 1695 he asked for support. Gerhard Huthwohl was a preacher or elder of Heppenheim (q.v.) an der Wiese; in 1784, after the congregation for a long period had held its meetings in his house, he received support from the Dutch Mennonites to build a meetinghouse; again in 1802-6 he asked the Dutch Mennonites for advice in meeting the requirements of the French occupation army, which compelled them to do military service. David Huthwohl was a preacher of the Erbesbüdesheim (q.v.) congregation in 1769-? and (obviously another) David Huthwohl of the Weierhof (q.v.) congregation 1791-?.

In the 18th century most members of the Huthwohl family emigrated to the United States, where they are called Heatwole (q.v.). VDZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1059, 1198, 1248, 1406, 1416, 1547, 1551; II, Nos. 2682-84.

Hutscher, Ulrich, an Anabaptist from Tieff near Windsheim in Lower Franconia, Germany, was arrested early in April 1531 and taken to the mountain castle Hoheneck, together with the wife of Julius Lober. Lober himself shortly met the same fate. On April 16 the prisoners were cross-examined by several priests. Hutscher confessed that two years previously the wife of Georg of Passau had been baptized in Tuchscherer's house at Windsheim. Asked why he had forsaken the pure doctrine he replied: May God forbid that he forsake the pure true doctrine of Christ. He had just entered the pure doctrine of Christ, and he was surprised that they wanted him to abandon it, for faith is the gift of God. Georg of Passau had taught him to forsake sin and to live a true Christian life. He had repented and then been baptized on confession of his faith. Formerly he had been deep in sin, but now he stood in God's grace. In November the prisoners were still in prison. The outcome of the trial is not known. (Wiswedel, Bilder II, 34-36; ML II, 384.) W.W.

Hutter, Jakob. It is a false assumption to consider the simple and unlearned hatmaker Jakob Hutter the founder and beginner of the Anabaptists in Tirol; for the Anabaptist movement had long been thriving when Hutter entered it. But it is certain that none of his predecessors or successors in the eastern Anabaptist movement equaled him in importance; for none was so successful in creating and reforming. He not only afforded the cause a strong support when it had begun to waver in the extremely difficult times; he was also the founder of that peculiar organization which preserved itself in Moravia with its communistic character to the end, the founder of the brotherhood named for him, which still has shoots growing on the American continent. It is therefore easy to understand when the Geschichts-Bücher of the Anabaptists speak of him in highest praise, beginning, "At that time one came, by the name of Jakob."

He was a native of the hamlet of Moos near St. Lorenz near Bruneck in the Puster Valley of Tirol. Scantily educated by the school at Bruneck, he went to Prague to learn hatmaking there. Then he began his extensive journeys for the sake of his trade and finally settled at Spittal a.d. Drau in Carinthia. In Klagenfurt he probably made his first contact with the teachings of the Anabaptists, which became so significant for his inner development. He was never in Silesia or Bavaria, and learned of Gabriel Ascherham (q.v.) and his Silesians only when in 1529 he came to Moravia to find a quiet place for his little congregation. It is not known when he was baptized, but after he had "accepted the covenant of grace of a good conscience in Christian baptism with true resignation to lead a godly life and God's gifts were richly felt in him, he was chosen and confirmed in the service of the Gospel."

In this position he first traveled through the Puster Valley, Tirol. One of the first small congregations he headed was that at Welsperg. Here his adherents assembled alternately in the house of his relative, Balthasar Hutter, or Andreas Planer, a scythe-smith. At the latter place he baptized ten persons on one day. The government had word of this "synagogue" in May 1529 and now ordered Christoph Herbst, the sheriff at Toblach-Welsberg, to surprise and seize the Anabaptists. Some were captured, but Hutter and others escaped. The statements of the prisoners were sent to Innsbruck. They gathered from them that Jakob Hutter, a real leader, "baptized the others for money"; what is meant is that each had to make a contribution to the common treasury.

Though the leader escaped this time, the authorities seized his sister Agnes in 1529. She had a short time previously been pardoned, but had at once returned to the brotherhood. By this act her sentence was already pronounced. The persecution of the "pious in the land" gradually grew intolerable. On every side one saw the blood of the martyrs and the burning stakes, prisons filled with captives, children forsaken and starving at home, with never a ray of hope except in God.

Then some recalled that the Lord of Hosts had gathered a people in His name in the city of Austerlitz in Moravia. The elders decided to send Brother Jakob and Sigmund Schützinger to them to gather information. After hearing his favorable report the brotherhood in Tirol decided to join the one in Moravia. Hutter appointed this co-worker Jörg Zaunring (or Zaunried) to lead them, and sent one small group after the other to Moravia. Most of them were members of Blaurock's (q.v.) orphaned congregation (he had been burned at the stake at Klausen on Sept. 6, 1529). Singly and in groups, driven by the persecution prevailing throughout the land, the Anabaptists sought the road to Moravia. There was hardly an alternative. The government pointed out in a letter to King Ferdinand in Vienna that for two years hardly a day had passed in which Anabaptist matters had not come up in the council; "and more than 700 persons have been in part executed, in part expelled, in part have fled into misery, who left their property as well as their children behind." All the rulings were of no avail. "These people not only have no horror of punishment, but even report themselves; rarely is one converted; nearly all only wish to die for their faith."

Here Hutter worked on without fear. In the early summer of 1530 he wrote a letter about it to Moravia. But while he was devoting all his energy to the care of his brethren at home, conflicts arose in Austerlitz in the winter of 1530, which threatened the very existence of the congregation, and finally split it into two hostile camps. The causes of this division were misapplication of church regulations by ordained ministers, irregularities in church discipline, mismanagement of possessions, lack of tact in critical cases, the ambition of certain individuals, all of which Reublin (q.v.) sharply criticized in his letter to Pilgram Marpeck of 1531.

A part of the congregation then went to Auspitz, but not without having sent a messenger to Hutter, asking him to investigate the difficulty. The Austerlitz group did the same. Therefore Hutter and Schützinger went back to Moravia, investigated "where the error in dispute lay, and found that the Austerlitz group was most to be blamed." After they had settled the quarrel they returned to Tirol, but had to go back to Moravia the next year to establish order once more. At this time Anabaptism came to full bloom in Moravia. From Silesia, Swabia, the Palatinate, and Tirol came a long procession to Moravia.

At this time begins the struggle of the Tirolean Anabaptists for their existence. The year 1533 marks the climax of the persecution of the Anabaptists in Tirol, for the government neglected no measures for their suppression. Special efforts were made to capture Hutter, "who had brought so many people of the district into the sect." But no one was found who could claim the reward offered for his capture. When it was finally decided by the Anabaptists in the Gufidaun region that tyranny had reached the highest degree, so that it was no longer possible for "the saints" to live there, Hutter was commissioned to go to Moravia to prepare a new home for the emigrants.

On Aug. 11, 1533, he arrived in Auspitz with one companion. The majority of the brotherhood there wished to accept Hutter, who was known for his energetic action, as their leader, but this ran counter to the wishes of their current leaders, Schützinger, Philipp, and Gabriel. And yet in view of the continued friction in the congregation, there was imperative need for clear-sighted leadership. These leaders had shown themselves incapable of energetic execution of original Anabaptist doctrine. They had no clear grasp of true brotherhood, and tended to cling to family ties, which were incompatible with unadulterated Anabaptist doctrine. Reublin's complaints about the education of the children, the difference in the treatment of the members in food and clothing and in respect show how inadequate their leadership was.

Hutter's attack on the problem was different. The court records relate that he distributed to the poor the money collected from the members: "This Jakob," say the Geschichts-Bücher, "also brought a temporal gift, a sweet sacrifice, a little food, so that they could repay their debt of the time of need." More important to Hutter than choice by the lot was inner awakening: "The Holy Spirit called him for leadership." He could not escape it. It was his duty to reform matters. He stated this emphatically in his first address before the brotherhood. After a few days he began the improvements. But he was opposed by Schützinger, who claimed the office of leadership on the strength of his election by the brotherhood. He therefore betook himself to Gabriel in Rossitz. "He wanted to see clearly whether the people wanted him as their leader or not. To be quiet and not perform the duties of his office he was not free to do before God. If he was not needed, he would move on, wherever God directed him." With great difficulty he managed to have the brotherhood recognize him as leader, "that he be our bishop and shepherd."

The Hutterites now formed a brotherhood and Hutter was able to lead them with a firm hand. The Geschichts-Bücher say, "He put the true church in pretty good order by the help and grace of God, hence we are still called the Hutterites." The loss created by the withdrawal of Schützinger and of the dissatisfied elements under his leadership was replaced by fresh additions from Tirol. In a letter written immediately after the separation Hutter named 120 to 130 persons who had come in the last few weeks. The reports he sent from the "holy" church at Auspitz to Tirol caused a veritable mass migration of Anabaptists to Moravia; they came singly and in groups.

To provide for the continued growth Hutter was compelled to look about for new homes; thus in the same year (1533) Schäckowitz, a half mile south of Auspitz, was settled. The only serious difficulty arose from their relationship with the adherents of Philipp, his opponent, who also lived in Auspitz. The additions from Tirol continued in increasing numbers; even Tirolean noblemen, like Sigmund von Wolkenstein, made pilgrimages to Auspitz. At the beginning of 1534 the movement was general among the Anabaptists of Tirol. Soon the government was shocked by reports that nearly all the valleys in the Sterzing district were full of them; three leaders had come from Moravia and were agitating in the region of Schwatz. Almost at the same time it was rumored that Hans Amon (q.v.) was planning "to send the common people, whom he had misled from the true faith in the Puster Valley and other places," to Moravia in the coming spring. Although orders continued to be issued to guard the boats on the Inn River, nevertheless the emigrants managed to get to Moravia. It can be imagined what pleasure the report—false, to be sure—created in Brixen, that Hutter and Amon had been seized in Linz. A considerable number of brethren were captured at Hohenwart in Lower Austria; to them Hutter wrote a long letter of consolation. Here in Auspitz, he said, there was also great tribulation. In Tirol there were no longer many brethren. These, too, were preparing to go to Moravia under the untiring leadership of Hans Amon.

But in Moravia affairs had also taken a turn for the worse for the Anabaptists. The blow that was to strike them here had long been in preparation and was in essence the consequence of the events that had taken place in Münster; but it did not materialize until 1535. The Moravian diet, which was attended by Ferdinand I in person, acceded to his wish to have all Anabaptists expelled. In vain they lamented that they were illegally being driven from their possessions. No one in Moravia had ever had cause for complaint to the government. But if the sovereign or the feudal authorities demanded tribute or taxes they were willing to pay as much as they were able, if they were only permitted to keep their work and their religion. A petition did indeed reach the court, but was disregarded. Marshall Johann von Lipa, who took them into his protection, was threatened with the disfavor of the king. They had to move out into wretched poverty.

Hutter took his bundle on his back, as did his assistants; the brethren and sisters with their children went in pairs. "They were thus," their Geschichts-Bücher relate, "driven into the field like a herd of sheep. Nowhere were they permitted to camp until they reached the village of Tracht in the possessions of the lord of Liechtenstein. There they lay down on the wide heath under the open sky with many wretched widows and children, sick and infants." In touching words Hutter wrote to the governor Kuna von Kunstadt: "Now we are camping on the heath, without disadvantage to any man. We do not want to wrong or harm any human being, not even our worst enemy. Our walk in life is to live in truth and righteousness of God, in peace and unity. We do not hesitate to give an account of our conduct to anyone. But whoever says that we have camped on a field with so many thousands, as if we wanted war or the like, talks like a liar and a rascal. If all the world were like us there would be no war and no injustice. We can go nowhere; may God in heaven show us where we shall go. We cannot be prohibited from the earth, for the earth is the heavenly Father's; may He do with us what He will." The step merely resulted in greater efforts to capture Hutter.

Now the brotherhood itself insisted on Hutter's leaving. He committed his office to Hans Amon and bade his relatives farewell; with pain and grief they saw him leave. Those remaining scattered, some here and some there. A little group settled at Steinabrunn in Lower Austria, some on the estates of lords who did not feel bound by the latest decree. Hutter's ideal, "the brotherhood," was now broken up, but preserved itself in numerous small groups. Many who were unable to endure the trials of the brethren returned home.

Thus many returned to Tirol. There, led by Hutter, they began anew their evangelization. "The ungodly tyrants," he writes to his forsaken church, "do not yet know that we are here. God grant that they do not find it out." But even before Hutter appeared in Tirol the cry resounded on every hand, "Anabaptists from Moravia are roaming through the country!" Orders were at once issued for their arrest. During the period from early September to the end of November, 1535, Hutter wrote three letters to the brethren in Moravia. In one he wrote, "God has again set up a church. His people are increasing in numbers daily. The harvest is nearly ripe, but the laborers are few"; in another he spoke of the "raging" of the foe. "They threaten with hangmen and bailiffs." "The Sodomite sea is raging madly. I fear it will not come to rest until the pious Jonah is cast into it." He warned the brotherhood of treachery.

Hutter's last letter, written shortly before his capture, indicates the great danger hovering over him. With so many enemies he could not hope to remain undiscovered. When he and his pregnant wife were spending the night in the home of Hans Steiner, a former sexton, at Clausen, they were surprised by the clerk of Seber and the city judge Riederer, and together with Anna Steiner of St. George and the aged wife of the sexton they were taken to the neighboring episcopal fortress of Brandzell. The capture of Hutter was immediately reported to Brixen and from there on Dec. 1 to Innsbruck, where the news was received with pleasure, and orders were issued to transfer Hutter to Innsbruck, for he was not an ordinary prisoner, but a leader; the hearing of his wife was to take place before the city judge in Clausen. In Hutter's bag were found letters from Hans Amon in Moravia, which were sent to Innsbruck with the statements of the arrested women.

Hutter was then taken to Innsbruck under strong escort on Dec. 9 in severely cold weather, and was cross-examined two days later. The attempts made by Dr. Gallus Müller to convert him were fruitless. Even if he had recanted, his tragic fate would not have been averted, for the final decision of Ferdinand I was, "We are determined that even if Hutter should renounce his error, we will not pardon him, for he has misled far too many, but we will let the penalty which he has merited so abundantly take its course." He was to be closely questioned on his activity within and without the land, and precautions taken not to let him be replaced with other leaders from Moravia; orders to this effect had already been sent to Moravia.

Apparently it was expected that Hutter would ultimately be converted, but this was not achieved, neither by the torments of the rack nor by the barbarous whipping. Hutter was firmly resolved not to yield in matters of faith nor to betray his brethren. He endured every degree of terrible torture and "remained steadfast to the end." The sentence condemned him to death by fire. The court had doubts concerning the advisability of a public execution; but the king would not consent to having him executed with the sword in the quiet of dawn; he insisted on a public execution at the stake. He died on Feb. 25, 1536, and in the words of Hans Amon, "he gave a great sermon through his death, for God was with him." A trusted brother was at once sent to Moravia by the orphaned brotherhood to bear the news of his departure to the brethren there.

Hutter's wife had meanwhile been examined in Brandzell, but as the official report says, persisted "in her obstinate foolish opinion." She was transferred to Gufidaun (q.v.), where a learned and tactful man was assigned to convert her from her error, but she escaped before he arrived. Two years later she again fell into the hands of the government and was executed at Schöneck.

Hutter's death was commemorated in song by his adherents. But his old opponents—a Gabriel Ascherham—carried their rancor beyond his death. Only Philip Plener, also an opponent in Hutter's Moravian period, gave a juster verdict: "No one provided so faithfully for the people in temporal or spiritual matters as Hutter. Never was he found unfaithful. Through him the Lord gathered and preserved His people." In general his brethren recognized his service to the Moravian Anabaptists in re-establishing discipline and order, confirming the "community" in opposition to destructive private ambitions, cleansing it of impure elements, and averting the abuses that brought dissolution of the groups in other places.

The reply to an inquiry concerning the content of his teaching, is to point to the Articles of Schleitheim (Geschichts-Bücher 41-44), common to the Anabaptists of South Germany and Austria. Also Jeronyme Kräls Bekanntnuss und Rechenschaft etliche Artikel christlichen Glaubens betreffend, which Kräl presented to the government in Vienna in 1536, may be regarded as a reflection of Hutter's own words. His spirit is further revealed in the Rechenschaft und Zeugnuss of the brethren who were taken from Steinabrunn to Trieste as galley slaves in 1540; the completion of his doctrinal system is found in the Rechenschaft unserer Religion, Lehr und Glaubens, written in 1540 by Peter Riedemann (q.v.).

The Hutterite brotherhood, after the death of its founder in Moravia, has developed and maintained its sharply defined communistic character to the present time.

Of Hutter's writings only his eight epistles have been preserved. He has erroneously been credited with (1) Riedemann's Rechenschaft; (2) Anschlag und Fürwenden der blinden, verkehrten Welt und aller Gottlosen gegen die Frommen (Cod. G. J. VI, 31 in Gran); (3) Von den 7 Siegeln des verschlossenen Buchs, by which is meant either Sebastian Franck's book, Das verbütschiert mit 7 Siegeln verschlossene Buch, or probably Hans Hut's booklet, Von dem Buch mit den 7 Siegeln, wie in der Apocalipsi stunde. LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Loserth, Anabaptismus; idem, Communismus; ML II, 375-78. The letter by Wilhelm Reublin to Pilgram Marpeck (1531) mentioned above is printed by C. A. Cornelius, Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs II (Leipzig, 1860) 253 f.; Hans Fischer, Jakob Huter, Leben, Frömmigkeit, Briefe (Newton, 1957); Zieglschmid, Chronik; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch.

Hutterdorf Mennonite Church (GCM), a member of the Northern District Conference, located near Freeman, Hutchinson Co., S.D., derives its name from the village in Russia from which the settlers came in 1874. Until 1880, when the first school was built, services were conducted in the homes of members by the first ministers, the brethren William Tschetter and David Waldner. The first church, built in 1901, still serves the congregation. John Hofer, Elias Wipf, and Peter J. Stahl have also served as ministers. The latter was ordained in 1917 and still serves. The congregation has an organized Christian Endeavor and an active Sunday school. The membership in 1955 was 50. J.D.U.

Hutterian Brethren, also called Hutterites, the Austrian branch of the great Anabaptist movement of the 16th century, characterized by the practice of community of goods, as first established in Moravia in 1529 and re-established on more solid grounds by Jacob Hutter in 1533. In contradistinction to the other Anabaptist groups the Hutterites had the unique chance to develop their communal life in comparatively peaceful Moravia where, due to a predominantly Slavic surrounding, they lived in relative isolation from the rest of the world. Thus a rich group life developed with a strong sense for their own history. Remarkable is also their extensive manuscript literature (devotional and historical) which made it possible that their teachings and their history, particularly of the beginnings, should become better known than those of any other group of the Anabaptist movement except the Dutch.

The 1520's saw a lively spread of Anabaptism throughout the Hapsburg territories, Tirol, Austria, Carinthia, etc. In Tirol in particular Anabaptism was by far the strongest trend, and remained so until far into the second half of the 16th century, in spite of a government which ruthlessly fought all "heretics" wherever they could be ferreted out. It was here that Georg Blaurock (q.v.) of Switzerland worked successfully as a missioner until his early martyrdom in 1529. Persecutions were extremely bloody. One source (Kirchmaier, 487) claims that prior to 1530 no less than one thousand had been executed, and that the stakes were burning all along the Inn Valley. Yet the number of Anabaptists only grew. Soon the news became known that Moravia (and in particular the manorial estate Nikolsburg of the lords of Liechtenstein) was a haven for all sectarians. Here Hubmaier (q.v.) could freely write and print his new ideas concerning adult baptism. In fact, one of the Liechtensteins himself accepted baptism upon faith. Also other manorial lords showed sympathy and toleration, perhaps due to the fact that this country had seen the Hussites (now called Piccards) for nearly a century, and allowed complete freedom of conscience to practically all sorts of beliefs. Naturally from now on a continuous stream of Anabaptists moved toward this "promised land," from Tirol as well as from other Hapsburg lands, but also from South Germany, Bavaria, Württemberg, Hesse, and even from Switzerland.

In 1528 the nonresistant group, called "Stäbler" (staff-bearers), moved away from Nikolsburg, then the center of the opposing group, the "Schwertler" (sword-bearers, the Hubmaier followers), who, however, soon died out. Compelled by the emergency situation, the need of taking care of the many indigent brethren, they pooled all their possessions and money in the manner of the first church in Jerusalem. But this act was at first not understood as a definite step toward complete community of goods comprising both consumption and production. This development came but slowly step by step. The first leader was Jacob Wiedemann, the "one-eyed one"; later leaders were Siegmund Schützinger, Jörg Zaunring, and Gabriel Ascherham (for details see Moravia, Nikolsburg, also Auspitz and Austerlitz). The groups around 1529-33 lived by no means in brotherly harmony; local quarrels over leadership and form of community-life mar these first years in Moravia. Jacob Hutter, an Anabaptist from Tirol (q.v.) who had visited the Moravian brotherhoods in 1529, and who worried much about these conditions, first sent his emissary, Jörg Zaunring, but eventually decided to leave Tirol and to try for himself to settle these disputes and rivalries, and to establish more evangelical foundations. Details of this intricate story cannot be told here, but it soon became obvious that Hutter was by far the strongest leader of all. In 1533 the evangelical (nonresistant) Anabaptists of Moravia broke up into three groups: (a) Those who accepted Jacob Hutter's leadership and (according to his organization) complete community of goods, called themselves from now on Hutterische Brüder. Hutter, himself a very strong prophetic and charismatic leader, had given to this group such definite foundations that it could survive and, in spite of many ups and downs, preserve its basic principles through more than four centuries. (b) The Philippites (q.v.), named after Philipp Plener or Blauärmel (q.v.), a Württemberger. This group left Moravia already in 1535 during the first bitter days of persecution. They returned through Austria to South Germany. On their way many were imprisoned in Passau (see Ausbund), while others decided to stay in Upper Austria where still in the 1530's Peter Riedemann (q.v.) visited them and managed eventually a merger with the Hutterian Brethren. This group stressed the suffering church in particular and with it Gelassenheit (q.v.) (see also Haffner). (c) The Gabrielites (q.v.), named after Gabriel Ascherham (q.v.). They, too, soon moved out of Moravia back to Silesia, Ascherham's home country. But soon they became disappointed with their leader, who tended more and more toward a vague spiritualism. Between 1542 and 1545 most of these Gabrielites returned and likewise merged with the Hutterites. (The doctrinal basis for this is contained in a document inserted in the Geschicht-Buch, Wolkan, 197-200, "Der Gabrieler Vereinigung mit uns.") Other groups of evangelical Anabaptists in Moravia who did not accept community of goods were given the general name "Swiss Brethren," even though they did not come from Switzerland. Also a small group of followers of Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.) were found in Southern Moravia under the leadership of Leopold Scharnschlager (q.v.). Yet these groups later disappeared, while the Hutterian Brethren managed to maintain themselves through all early hardships and local persecutions.

This may have been due to a large extent to a remarkable number of outstanding leaders: Ulrich Stadler of Tirol (q.v.), Hans Amon of Bavaria (q.v.), Peter Riedemann of Silesia (q.v.), Peter Walpot of Tirol (q.v.), Klaus Braidl of Hesse (q.v.), not to mention the long array of other brethren, most of whom died as martyrs or suffered long years of imprisonment. Although "expelled" from Moravia more than once upon mandates by Ferdinand (the later emperor), they yet somehow succeeded in finding the sympathy of the manorial lords, who quickly recognized their value as craftsmen and tillers of the soil. Many of these lords were either Protestants or at least in sympathy with the Reformation, and proud of their quasi-independence from the government in Vienna. And thus Moravia remained the one stable place in this century of intolerance and suffering. In 1546 the Brethren also moved east across the border into adjacent Slovakia (then a part of Hungary) where the influence of the Hapsburgs was still weaker, and where a good many of the lords belonged to the Reformed faith.

Jacob Hutter was a leader for only two years (1533-35); he returned to Tirol where eventually he too fell into the hands of his persecutors. In February 1536 he was martyred. Hans Amon thereupon became the Vorsteher or head bishop of the brotherhood, 1536-42, being a strong and inspiring leader. In this time organized missionary activities of the brethren set in, perhaps the first such in all of Europe. Missioners (Sendboten) were sent out to many places (knowing quite well the fate ahead of them; 80 per cent of them died a martyr's death), and those in the throes of death were comforted by epistles and visiting brethren (e.g., the case of the 140 Falkenstein Brethren who were sent to Trieste to become galley slaves, 1539-40). One of the strongest missioners of this time was Peter Riedemann, who went more than once to Upper Austria and to Hesse. While in jail in Hesse (1540-42), he drew up that outstanding document which from now on became the very symbolic book of the brotherhood, the Account of Our Religion (Rechenschaft, q.v.), 1540 (printed 1565, and again in the 19th and 20th century). In 1542-56 he shared the leadership of the brotherhood with Leonhard Lanzenstiel or Seiler.

While elsewhere persecution intensified (Anabaptism had died out by the middle of the 16th century in the Hapsburg domain except Tirol; it declined in Bavaria and other German lands), in Moravia on the contrary it experienced now a kind of flowering. This was particularly true during the reign of Emperor Maximilian II (1564-76), himself rather in sympathy with Protestantism, hence averse to any harsh measures. The Brethren speak of the "Good Period" (about 1554-65) and of the "Golden Period" (1565-90 or 95). Although the Jesuits had been admitted in Hapsburg territories since about 1550-60, they did not find full influence in Moravia until the end of the century. It is true that Nikolsburg had changed hands; the Dietrichsteins (q.v.) bought it in 1575, but even though they were more in sympathy with the Counter-Reformation, the Brethren could still persist here, too, relatively peacefully, until the coming of the Cardinal Franz von Dietrichstein in 1599, the very head of the Catholic party.

During the Golden Period the Brethren, now well established all over southern Moravia and Slovakia, found a particularly strong leader in Peter Walpot (q.v.), a Tirolean, who led the group in 1565-78, and whose activities added much to further consolidate the brotherhood. A number of regulations were drawn up, both for the general conduct of the brotherhood and for the different crafts or trades. The schools of the Brethren were organized on better defined grounds. Doctrinal and polemic writings (mostly anonymous) were drawn up (such as the great Article Book, q.v., the Handbüchlein, q.v., the book called Anschläg und Fürwenden, etc.). A rich correspondence with missionaries all over the countries of German tongue came in and went out (carefully recorded in a Schreibstube or scriptorium); the great Geschicht-Buch was then begun by Caspar Braitmichel (q.v.) on the basis of archival material collected almost from the very beginning. In short, it was the peak of Hutterite history. It has been estimated that in Moravia and Slovakia together there existed at that time about one hundred Bruderhofs or farm colonies, with a population estimated at between 20,000 and 30,000. (Certain estimates go as high as 70,000, but that figure is most unlikely.) (See the accompanying maps.) While Anabaptism elsewhere (except for the Netherlands and Prussia) was on a sharp decline, in fact nearly disappeared as an articulated movement in the latter half of the 16th century, in remote Moravia and Slovakia it was almost on its way to becoming a distinct denomination (were it not that the sect-principle, that is, brotherhood-living, continued to be dominant).

Very remarkable of that time are also contacts with the anti-Trinitarian Polish Brethren (Socinians) who in Racov (Poland) tried to set up their "New Jerusalem" (see Anti-Trinitarianism), somewhat along lines which they had been studying at the Moravian Hutterite communistic colonies. Visitors and correspondence witness to this contact which, however, never became very warm, due to basic differences both in doctrine and intellectual background.

Contacts with Swiss Brethren, in Switzerland and elsewhere, continued to be intensive; missioners were sent out and a good number of Brethren from Switzerland and South Germany joined the church in Moravia. (The later bishop Ulrich Jausling, serving 1619-21, had been such a Swiss newcomer.) Of particular interest is here a long letter (almost a tract) which the Vorsteher Claus Braidl sent to a Swiss brother Christian Raussenberger in 1601 defending on Biblical ground the principle of community of goods. Also with the Prussian Mennonites around Elbing and Danzig contacts were obtained around the turn of the century. Even a settlement was attempted in Elbing though without success. In the meantime the peaceful period had come to an end, and severe trials were in store. (a) The Counter-Reformation (q.v.) became now the cry of the day. Whoever would not be converted to the Roman Church was to leave Moravia. Cardinal Franz von Dietrichstein gave the lead in that movement, supported by a most vigilant government in Vienna and two priests, Christoph Erhard (q.v.) and Christoph Andreas Fischer (q.v.), in southern Moravia, who supplied the Catholics with polemic material (gross slanders), and cast suspicions of all kinds. They incited the hatred of the poor peasant population all around who naturally could not compete with large-scale rational farm economies (see Eysvogel and Jedelshauser). In short the situation became ever more precarious. Yet until 1622 they somehow managed to come through, although on a declining scale. (b) Turkish wars and invasions added to these internal troubles. Emperor Rudolph II asked for war contributions, and Dietrichstein was to extort them from the Brethren (at one time no less than 20,000 fl. was asked). Needless to say, the Brethren very decidedly declined, accepting all the consequences. In 1605 Turks and their Hungarian allies plundered southern Moravia and many brethren were killed or dragged away into Turkish captivity (see Böger). Eventually (c) the event, later called the Thirty Years' War, 1618-48, brought the Moravian establishments of the Brethren to a complete end. After the success of the Catholic forces at the White Mountain in 1620, all restraint was dropped; complete expulsion was ordered by Vienna. The Geschicht-Buch (570-71) reports that what they lost on inventory (corn, wine, cattle, linen and woolens, groceries, equipment, and furniture) amounted to about 364,000 florins not assessing any houses and grounds. And all this after only one year earlier (1621) a sum of 30,000 fl. had been taken away from the Brethren by methods of extortion and downright robbery.

With these events the brotherhood begins to show a sharp decline in activities and also in loyalty to the old principles, and even in number of members and colonies (in Slovakia there were only 15 colonies). Although Moravia was now lost, the Brethren could still withdraw to their Slovakian colonies, and since 1621 also to their new Bruderhof in Alvinc, Transylvania (today Rumania). In spite of continued great hardships, mainly through Turkish marauders, the Brethren carried on, and visitors were amazed by their industriousness and diligence (see Grimmelshausen). The brotherhood was fortunate enough in getting once more a bishop of outstanding qualities in leadership and spirituality, viz., Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.), 1639-62, the real leader already since 1630. He was born in a Moravian colony. His work was an effort to revive the brotherhood in many regards: the last mission work in Silesia (contacts with Schwenckfeldians) and Danzig (the Socinians were contacted) was carried out, although with rather moderate success. A short-lived colony was established in Mannheim (q.v.) in 1664. Internal discipline was re-established by strict regulations (see Gemeindeordnungen). And a rich literature was produced. Of particular value for posterity was also the new custom of writing down all sermons (called Lehr und Vorred). The amount of such manuscript material is amazing; there are about 250 such Lehren (some quite voluminous books about most books of the N.T., and many of the O.T., mainly prophets, psalms, also about many apocryphal books and pseudepigrapha), and about as many Vorreden (shorter sermons). The Klein-Geschichtsbuch (204-21) brings excerpts from these sermons. One may safely say that the Hutterian Brethren of today continue the Ehrenpreis tradition at least as much if not more than any earlier tradition (e.g., that of Jakob Hutter). Ehrenpreis' Gemeindeordnung of 1651 is still in use, and the sermons of that period are the backbone of all spiritual life of the brethren today.

After Ehrenpreis' death more tribulations made life in community of goods harder and harder until this core element of the Hutterites was partly abandoned, and a semiprivate or semico-operative form of economy was accepted (1685, 1695). The great misery of Turkish invasions with its looting (which the nonviolent Brethren could not stop in any way) impoverished the brotherhood to such an extent that they had to turn to their Dutch Mennonite "cousins" to ask for financial help. The Great Chronicle ends with the letter which Johann Rieckєr, the successor of Ehrenpreis, wrote to the "Gemeinden in Holland," April 20, 1665. It is known that the Doopsgezinde most generously responded (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 419, a letter of thanks). Yet also this help could not prevent further troubles.

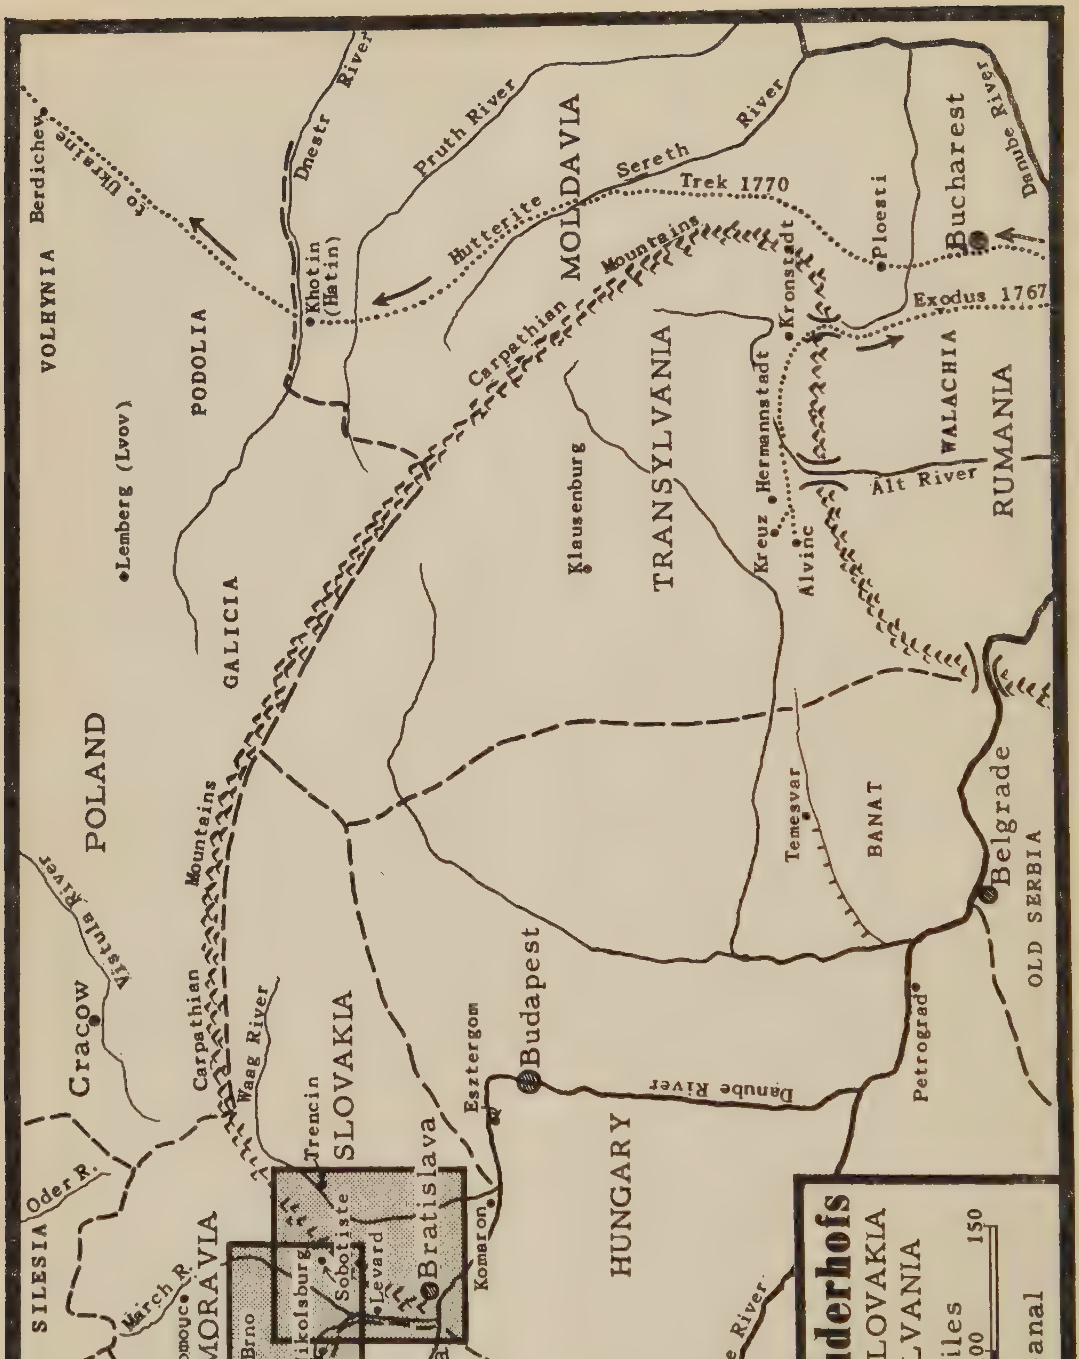
After the defeat of the Turks before Vienna (1683) and their expulsion from Hungary (1700), the Hapsburg government gained strength also in this newly conquered territory. And even though the 18th century is known as one of religious toleration, it was not the same for Hungary. Empress Maria Theresa (1740-80) allowed the otherwise forbidden Jesuits to exert all means to convert non-Catholics back to the Roman Church. And what torture, dungeon, and executioners could not achieve in the 16th century, the Jesuits achieved, at least partly, in the 18th, mainly in Slovakia. Their old manuscript books were confiscated (1757-63, 1782-84); children were taken away from their parents; and the more important male members were put into monasteries until they either accepted instructions and were converted, or until they died. Catholic services were established at the Bruderhofs and every one was compelled to attend. In short, externally the Hutterite population now turned Catholic, although in secret they continued to practice their old beliefs, likewise maintaining their co-operative enterprises. From now on the nickname Habaner (q.v.) became the general name for these people.

In Transylvania the Brethren had dwindled to scarcely more than a small group of perhaps 30 or 40 souls. Then Lutheran transmigrants from Carinthia (q.v.) to Transylvania (they arrived in 1756) came into contact with this remnant of Hutterite life, and felt immediately attracted by this form of Christian communism. They now joined the brotherhood, and thus brought about a rejuvenation of and rededication to the old principles. Naturally, persecutions, mainly by Jesuits, quickly set in here too. After a number of attempts to find other places the Brethren finally decided to flee Transylvania (1767, after a stay of 146 years), across high mountain passes almost without trails, and to enter Walachia (now Rumania) where conditions looked favorable. Another Turkish War (against Russia) again brought hardships, and the great trek continued after three years. In 1770 at the Dniester River the Brethren were received by the Russian general Count Rumyantsov, who offered them an asylum on his own estate in the Ukraine (then a rather sparsely populated area). At Vishenka the Brethren finally settled down for about one generation. In 1802 the colony was transferred to Czarist crown land at Radichev, 10 miles north. It was Johannes Waldner (born in Carinthia) who was then the most outstanding Vorsteher of the brotherhood (1794-1824). It was he who between 1793 and 1802 wrote the second big chronicle of the Hutterites, the Klein-Geschichtsbuch, a work of great charm and refinement. J. Loserth called Waldner a genuine historian. He was also a genuine disciple of Jacob Hutter, who with all his strength opposed the threatening abandonment of the principle of community of goods, which one group under the leadership of Jacob Walter (formerly of Slovakia) carried out in 1818. This new Walter-group then settled down in southern Russia (Molotschna district, under the sponsorship of the Mennonite Johann Cornies), where for about 40 years it practiced private property. In 1859-60 some leader dared to re-establish communal life as of old, and soon the new Hutterite villages began to thrive. Then in 1870, universal military conscription in Russia brought an end to all former privileges, and the Brethren saw no other way out than again to migrate—in this case to emigrate to America.

The story of this migration is too long to be retold here in detail. After a trip of inspection and scouting (1873), all the Brethren decided to come to the United States, where they chose the prairie land of South Dakota for settlement (in scenery so similar to the steppe of Russia). They arrived in 1874, 1877, and 1879, settling down in complete community of goods in three colonies near Yankton. According to these three settlements they are still today divided into the Darius-Leut (q.v., named after Darius Walter, their leader), Schmiede-Leut (q.v., after Michael Waldner, a blacksmith, their leader), and Lehrer-Leut (q.v., named after Jacob Wipf, called the Lehrer). The last group, when still in Russia, did not practice community of goods but began to do so in South Dakota. Those of their members who were disinclined, however, to accept this new-old form of living and wanted to stay in private ownership, later joined the group now called Krimmer Mennonite Brethren or also the General Conference Mennonites.

The colonies soon grew again under the favorable conditions of American democracy and its freedom, until new suffering occurred during World War I. Then super-patriots could not understand the nonresistant attitude of these Anabaptists, and a great number of young Hutterite conscientious objectors went through almost unbelievable hardships in federal prisons. Two men died there on account of exposure and privations. At that point the Brethren decided to move on to Canada where exemption from military service was granted. They located in southern Alberta, and south central Manitoba. However, one colony, the original one at Bonhomme, remained in South Dakota, and several new ones have been re-established there, while others were established in north central Montana from Alberta.

Today the brotherhood is still growing, and in general their young people stay loyal to their group. In 1954 they have close to 120 farm colonies (Bruderhofs) with almost 10,000 souls (between 50 and 150 souls per colony). Community of goods is practiced everywhere, rather strictly, and seems to result in thrift and general health, both physical and moral. By and large the customs of old are observed, and this reminds the visitor occasionally of similar Amish attitudes. Although the young people learn English in their schools (on each Bruderhof), they yet speak exclusively German at home. Since the days of Ehrenpreis (17th century), mission work has been abandoned. At their services they read the sermons of old, and would not allow any new ones. The use of farm machinery, cars, telephone, and electric light is accepted, but otherwise they share very little in modern American civilization. They continue to copy their manuscript books by hand (in fine penmanship). Only the two Chronicles and their hymnbook have been printed,



Hutterite Bruderhofs
IN MORAVIA, SLOVAKIA AND TRANSYLVANIA
Scale of Miles
0
50
100
150
Canal
VOLHYNIA
Berdichev to Ukraine
PODOLIA
Khotin
(Hatin)
Dnestr River
Pruth River
MOLDAVIA
Sereth River
Hutterite Trek 1770
Carpathian Mountains
Kronstadt
Ploesti
Bucharest
Danube River
Exodus 1767
WALACHIA
RUMANIA
Alt River
TRANSYLVANIA
Hermannstadt
Kreuz
Alvinc
Klausenburg
Lemberg (Lvov)
GALICIA
POLAND
Vistula River
Cracow
Carpathian Mountains
Waag River
SLOVAKIA
Trencin
Sobotiste
Levard
Bratislava
Esztergom
Budapest
Komaron
Temesvar
BANAT
Belgrade
OLD SERBIA
Petrograd
Danube River
HUNGARY
Drave River
SILESIA
Oder R.
March R.
Olomouc
MORAVIA
Brno
Nikolsburg
Znaim
Vienna
Danube R.
Ybbs
Linz Upper Lower
AUSTRIA
BOHEMIA
CARINTHIA

together with Riedemann's Rechenschaft of 1540 and Ehrenpreis' great Sendbrief of 1652.

The story of the New Hutterite group (Eberhard Arnold-Leut), originating in Germany in the 1920's, which joined the brotherhood around 1930, and now is settled in Paraguay, England, and recently (1954) also in New York State at Rifton (Woodcrest), cannot be told in this article (see Eberhard Arnold, and Society of Brothers).

Likewise, this article cannot describe in any way the inner life of the Brethren or their external organization; for these purposes compare the following articles: Bruderhof, Community of goods, Crafts, Ceramics, Economic History of the Hutterian Brethren, Education — Hutterite, Epistles — Hutterite, as well as articles on leaders such as Hutter, Amon, Riedemann, Walpot, Braidl, Ehrenpreis, and on their books, Article Book, Chronicles, Handbüchlein, Rechenschaft, Liederbuch. Finally also the following articles should be consulted: Gemeindeordnungen, regarding their regulations and discipline, Marriage, Medicine among the Hutterites, dealing with their barber-surgeons and physicians, Sermons—Hutterite, and naturally also the article Habaner which gives details about those who had turned Catholic in the 18th century.

LIST OF HUTTERITE BRUDERHOFS

1. Moravia, 1529-1622

(According to E. Crous, ML III, 420-22. For location of the Bruderhofs see the numbers 1-85 on Hutterite Map II.)

1. Alexowitz (Alecowitz, Olkowitz)
2. Altenmarkt (Zierotin, 1545)
3. Auspitz
4. Austerlitz
5. Bergen (Pergen)
6. Bilowitz (Billowitz, Pillowitz) (1545)
7. Birnbaum
8. Bisenz (Bisentz) (Zierotin, 1545)
9. Bogesch (Bogesitz/Bogenitz)
10. Bohntitz (Bohutitz/Bochtitz-Pochtitz) (1546)
11. Boretitz/Borzetitz (Paraditz) (1545)
12. Budespitz/Butschowitz (Bucovic, Pudespitz) (1536)
13. Budkau (Budkaw)
14. Czermakowitz (Schermankowitz)
15. Damborschitz/Damborzitz (Dämberschitz) (Kaunitz, 1550)
16. Eibenschitz (Lipa)
17. Eibis
18. Frätz/Wratzow (Niary von Bedek, 1547)
19. Frischau (1581)
20. Gobschitz/Gubschitz (1545)
21. Göding (Hodonin) (Lipa, 1545)
22. Gurda/Gurdau
23. Herspitz (Gerspitz)
24. Hosterlitz
25. Hrubschitz (Rupschitz) (1546)
26. Jamnitz
27. Jemeritz (Jemeritz/Jaronowitz)
28. Kanitz
29. Kobily/Kobyli (Kobelitz)
30. Kostl/Kostel (Gostal) (Zierotin)
31. Kreuz (Creutz) (Lipa, 1565)
32. Kromau (Lipa, 1540)
33. Landshut (Zierotin, 1565)
33a. Lettnitz/Letonitz (Lettonitz)
34. Lundenburg (Breclav)
35. Milotitz/Millotitz
36. Mistrin/Mistrin
37. Moskowitz (Maskowitz)
38. Muschau
39. Napagedl (Napajedl) (Zierotin, 1545)
40. Nembschitz/Klein Niemtschitz (east of Auspitz)
41. Nembschitz/Klein Niemtschitz (near Prahlitz) (1562)
42. Nemschau/Niemtschau (Niemtscha) (Kaunitz, 1560)
43. Neudorf near Lundenburg (Zierotin, 1570)
43a. Neudorf, Hungarian-Ostra district (Liechtenstein, 1570)
44. Neumühl (Liechtenstein, 1558)
45. Nikolsburg (Mikulov) (Liechtenstein, Maximilian II, Dietrichstein, 1556)
46. Nikolschitz/Nikoltschitz (Zierotin, 1570)
47. Nusslau (Nuslau) (Zierotin, 1583)
48. Paulowitz/Pawlowitz (Lipa, 1545)
49. Pausram (Zierotin, 1538)
50. Pohrlitz (Zierotin, 1581)
51. Polau/Pollau
52. Polehraditz (Bellerditz, Pettertitz) (1559)
53. Popitz/Poppitz (1537)
54. Pribitz/Przibitz (Zierotin, 1565)
55. Pruschank/Pruschanek
56. Pulgrams/Pulgram (1538)
57. Puslawitz/Bohuslawitz (Postlawitz) (1546)
58. Rackschitz/Rakschitz (Lipa, 1545)
59. Rakowitz (Räkowitz/Rakwitz) (Lipa, 1540)
60. Rampersdorf (Zierotin)
61. Rohatetz
62. Ropitz/Rossitz (Pernstein, Lipa, Zierotin)
63. Saitz (Lipa, 1540)
64. Schaidowitz/Ziadowitz (1553)
65. Schaikowitz (Schaickowitz/Ceikowitz) (1545)
66. Schäkowitz (Schäckowitz/Schakwitz) (Lipa, 1533)
67. (Klein-) Selowitz/Kl. Seelowitz
68. Skalitz (Gallitz) (1563)
69. (Klein- or Gross-) Steurowitz
69a. Stigonitz/Stignitz
70. Swatoborschitz/Swatoboritz
71. Swetlau
72. Tannowitz (Abtei Kanitz, Thurn)
73. Taykowitz/Taikowitz
74. Tracht (1558)
75. Tscheitsch/Ceitsch (Schenkhof)
76. Turnitz-Durdenitz
77. Urschitz/Uhrzitz (Kaunitz)
78. Voit(e)lsbrunn (1557)
79. Watzenowitz (Wacenowitz) (Zierotin)
79a. Weisstätten
80. Welka-Hulka (Zierotin, um 1560)
81. Wernslitz (Wemslitz/Weimis(ss)litz)
82. Wessely (1546)
83. Wischenau
84. Wisternitz
85. Wostitz (Thurn, 1567)

2. Slovakia, 1545-1762

(According to E. Crous, ML III, 423. For location of the Bruderhofs see the numbers I-XIV on Hutterite Map III.)

I. Broczko (Protzka; Neutra) (1547)
II. Dejte (Dechtitz; Oberneutra)
III. Dobravoda (Gutenwasser; Oberneutra)
IV. Egbell (Neutra)
V. Farkashida (Farkenschin; Pressburg) (1622)
VI. Holics (Holitsch; Neutra)
VII. Kosolna (Kesselsdorf; Pressburg)
VIII. Kuty (Gätte; Neutra) (1550)
IX. Lévárd Velky-Levary (Gross-Schützen, Lewär; Pressburg) (1588)
X. Pobudin (Popadin, Popodin; Neutra) (Bakisch de Lák)
XI. Rovenszko (Rabenska; Neutra) (1622)
XII. Soblaho (Soblahov, Zobelhof; Trentschin) (Illésházi, 1622)
XIII. Sobotiste (Freischütz, Sabatisch; Neutra) (1546)
XIV. Unter Nussdorf (Deutsch-Nussdorf; Pressburg) (1548)

3. Moravia, by manorial estates, 1619-22

(According to Fr. Hruby, Die Wiedertäufer in Mähren, Leipzig, 1935.)

1. Lundenburg-Billowitz: Lundenburg, Altenmarkt, Gostal (Ober- and Nieder-Haus), Pillowitz, Rampersdorf
2. Seelowitz: Eibes (auch Meubes), Nikolschitz, Nussla, Pausram, Pribitz, Poherlitz
3. Austerlitz: Austerlitz and Gerspitz
4. Nikolsburg: Nikolsburg and Tracht

Hutterite Bruderhofs

IN MORAVIA·(1530 - 1622)

Names of the Bruderhofs are given by number in the list in the article "Hutterian Brethren."

5. Steinitz: Dämberschitz
6. Kanitz: Klein-Niemtschitz (Ober- and Unterhaus)
7. Landshut: Landshut
8. Lettonitz: Lettnitz
9. Skalitz: Gallitz
10. Wischenau: Wischnau and Stignitz
11. Tscheikowitz: Schäkowitz (Schaikowitz) and Prutschan
12. Bochtitz: Pochtitz
13. Frischau: Frischau
14. Göding: Göding and Koblitz
15. Mähr. Kromau: Maskowitz and Oleckowitz
16. Milotitz: Wäzenobis
17. Uhritz: Urschitz
18. Wesseli: Wessela
19. Ziadowitz: Schädewitz
20. Ungarisch-Ostra: Neudorf
21. Eisgrub: Neumühl
22. Ober-Tannowitz: Tannewitz
23. Tulleschitz: Schermankowitz
24. Wostitz: (Wostite), Weisstätten
25. Polehraditz: Pellertitz
26. Tawikowitz: Teikowitz

4. Transylvania

1. Alvinc, 1621-1767
2. Kreuz, 1761-67
3. Stein, 1761-67

5. Ukraine

1. Vishenka (1770-1802)
2. Raditcheva (1802-42)
3. Hutterthal (1842-57)
4. Hutterdorf (2) (1859-74)
5. Johannisruh (1864-77)
6. Sheromet (1868-74)
7. Neu-Hutterthal or Dabritcha (1866-75)

6. Germany

Rhönbruderhof (1920-37)

7. Liechtenstein

Almbruderhof (1934-38)

8. England

1. Cotswold (1936-40)
2. Wheathill (1942-)

9. Paraguay: Primavera (3), 1940-

(See page 862)

10. North America, 1950, by branches

(According to J. W. Eaton, "The Hutterite Mental Health Study," MQR XXV, 1951, 17-19.)

Name of Colony	Address	Yr. Settled	Pop., 1950
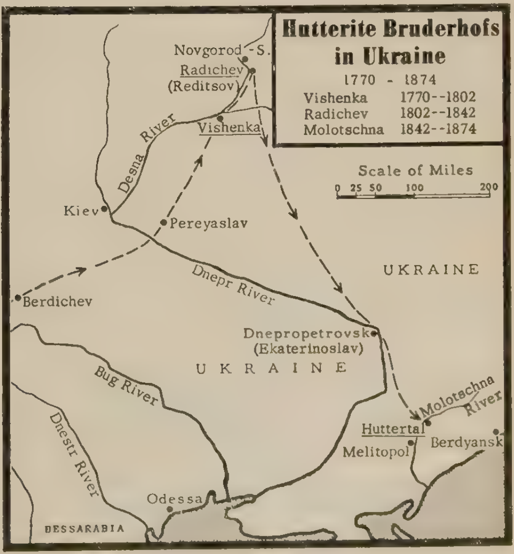
DARIUSLEUT, ALBERTA
1. Camrose,	Camrose	1949	83
2. Cayley,	Cayley	1937	80
3. East Cardston,	Cardston	1918	81
4. Ewelme,	Macleod	1928	69
5. Fairview,	Ponoka	1949	75
6. Granum,	Granum	1930	75
7. Holt,	Irma	1949	57
8. Tschetter,	Irricana	1948	76
9. New Rosebud,	Crossfield	1944	78
10. Lakeside,	Cranford	1935	91
11. Beiseker,	Beiseker	1926	65
12. New York,	Maybutt	1924	110
13. Pincher Creek,	Pincher Creek	1926	85
14. Pine Hill,	Penhold	1948	86
15. Riverside,	Fort Macleod	1933	86
16. Rosebud,	Redland	1918	187
17. Sandhill,	Beiseker	1936	114
18. Springvale,	Rockyford	1918	77
19. Stahlville,	Rockyford	1919	98
20. Stand Off,	Macleod	1918	76
21. Thompson,	Glenwood	1918	76
22. West Raley,	Cardston	1918	117
23. Willow Creek,	Stettler	1949	89
24. Wilson Siding,	Lethbridge	1918	140
25. Wolf Creek,	Stirling	1924	76
DARIUSLEUT, MONTANA
26. Ayers Ranch,	Grass Range	1945	54
27. Deerfield,	Danvers	1947	65
28. King Ranch,	Lewistown	1935	61
29. Spring Creek,	Lewistown	1945	26
LEHRERLEUT, ALBERTA
30. Big Bend,	Woolford	1920	129
31. Crystal Spring,	Magrath	1937	117
32. Elmspring,	Warner	1929	177
33. Hutterville,	Magrath	1932	155
34. Macmillan,	Cayley	1937	127
35. Miami,	New Dayton	1924	103
36. Milford,	Raymond	1918	134
37. New Elmspring,	Magrath	1918	115
38. New Rockport,	New Dayton	1932	113
39. O.K.,	Raymond	——	96
40. Old Elm,	Magrath	1918	151



41. New Dale, Queenstown	1950	60
42. Rock Lake, Wrentham	1935	89
43. Rockport, Magrath	1918	100
44. Sunny-Site, Warner	1935	186

LEHRERLEUT, MONTANA

45. Birch Creek, Valier	1947	95
46. Miami, Pendroy	1948	112
47. (New) Milford, Augusta	1945	105
48. Miller Ranch, Choteau	1949	100
49. New Rockport, Choteau	1948	101
50. Rockport, Pendroy	1947	100
51. Hillside, Sweet Grass	1950

UNAFFILIATED COLONIES, ALBERTA

52. Felger, Lethbridge	1924	25
53. Hofer Brothers, Brocket	1920	15
54. Monarch, Monarch	1942	31
55. Stirling Mennonite, Stirling	1944	30

SCHMIEDELEUT, MANITOBA

56. Barickman, Headingly	1920	151
57. Blumengard, Plum Coulee	1922	132
58. Bon Homme, Benard	1918	108
59. Elm River, Newton Siding	1934	153
60. Huron, Benard	1918	193
61. Iberville, Headingly	1919	101
62. James Valley, Starbuck	1918	128
63. Lakeside, Headingly	1946	94
64. Maxwell, Headingly	1918	86
65. Milltown, Benard	1918	54
66. New Rosedale, Portage la Prairie	1944	155
67. Poplar Point, Poplar Point	1938	93
68. Riverdale, Gladstone	1946	98
69. Riverside, Arden	1934	98
70. Rock Lake, Gross Isle	1947	85
71. Rosedale, Elie	1918	128
72. Sturgeon Creek, Headingly	1938	118
73. Sunnyside, Newton Siding	1925	93
74. Waldheim, Elie	1935	121
75. Springfield, Vivian	1950	83

SCHMIEDELEUT, NORTH DAKOTA

76. Forest River, Fordville	1950

SCHMIEDELEUT, SOUTH DAKOTA

77. Bon Homme, Tabor	1874	58
78. Glendale, Frankfort	1949	97
79. Gracevale, Winfred	1948	71
80. Huron, Huron	1944	74
81. Jamesville, Utica	1937	107
82. Maxwell, Scotland	1949	72
83. Millerdale, Miller	1949	54
84. New Elm Spring, Ethan	1936	102
85. Pearl Creek, Iroquois	1949	94
86. Platte, Academy	1949	68
87. Riverside, Huron	1949	48
88. Rockport, Alexandria	1934	84
89. Rosedale, Mitchell	1945	92
90. Spink, Frankfort	1945	94
91. Tschetter, Olivet	1942	94

CONVERT COLONIES

ONTARIO

92. Colony Farm of the Brethren, Bright	1941	46

SOCIETY OF BROTHERS

ENGLAND

93. Wheathill Bruderhof, Bradon, Bridgeworth, Salop	1942	165

PARAGUAY

94. Sociedad Fraternal,	Primavera Alto	1942	800
95. Isla Margarita	Primavera Alto	1942
96. Loma Hobby	Primavera Alto	1942

URUGUAY

97. Montevideo

NEW YORK

Woodcrest, Rifton	1954	135

SUMMARY OF HUTTERITE POPULATION BY CENSUS, BY KINSHIP GROUP AND LOCATION

					Total
Dariusleut	Alberta	2,247	Montana	206	2,453
Lehrerleut	Alberta	1,852	Montana	613	2,465
Schmiedeleut	Manitoba	2,272	S. Dakota	1,209	3,481
Unaffiliated colonies	Alberta	101			101
Total, Kinship Colonies					8,500
Total, Convert Colonies and Society of Brothers				(est.)	1,100
Total No. of Hutterites					9,600

SUMMARY OF HUTTERITE POPULATION CENSUS (1950) BY LOCATION

Montana	819
South Dakota	1,209
Alberta	4,200
Manitoba	2,272
Ontario	46
England	165
Paraguay	500	(est.)
	9,211

Addenda 1955

List and maps correspond to the situation around 1950. From 1950 until early 1955, 14 new kinship colonies were established; the population increased in these 4½ years by more than 1,400 souls to a total of close to 10,000. These new colonies are (according to Rev. Peter Hofer, James Valley):

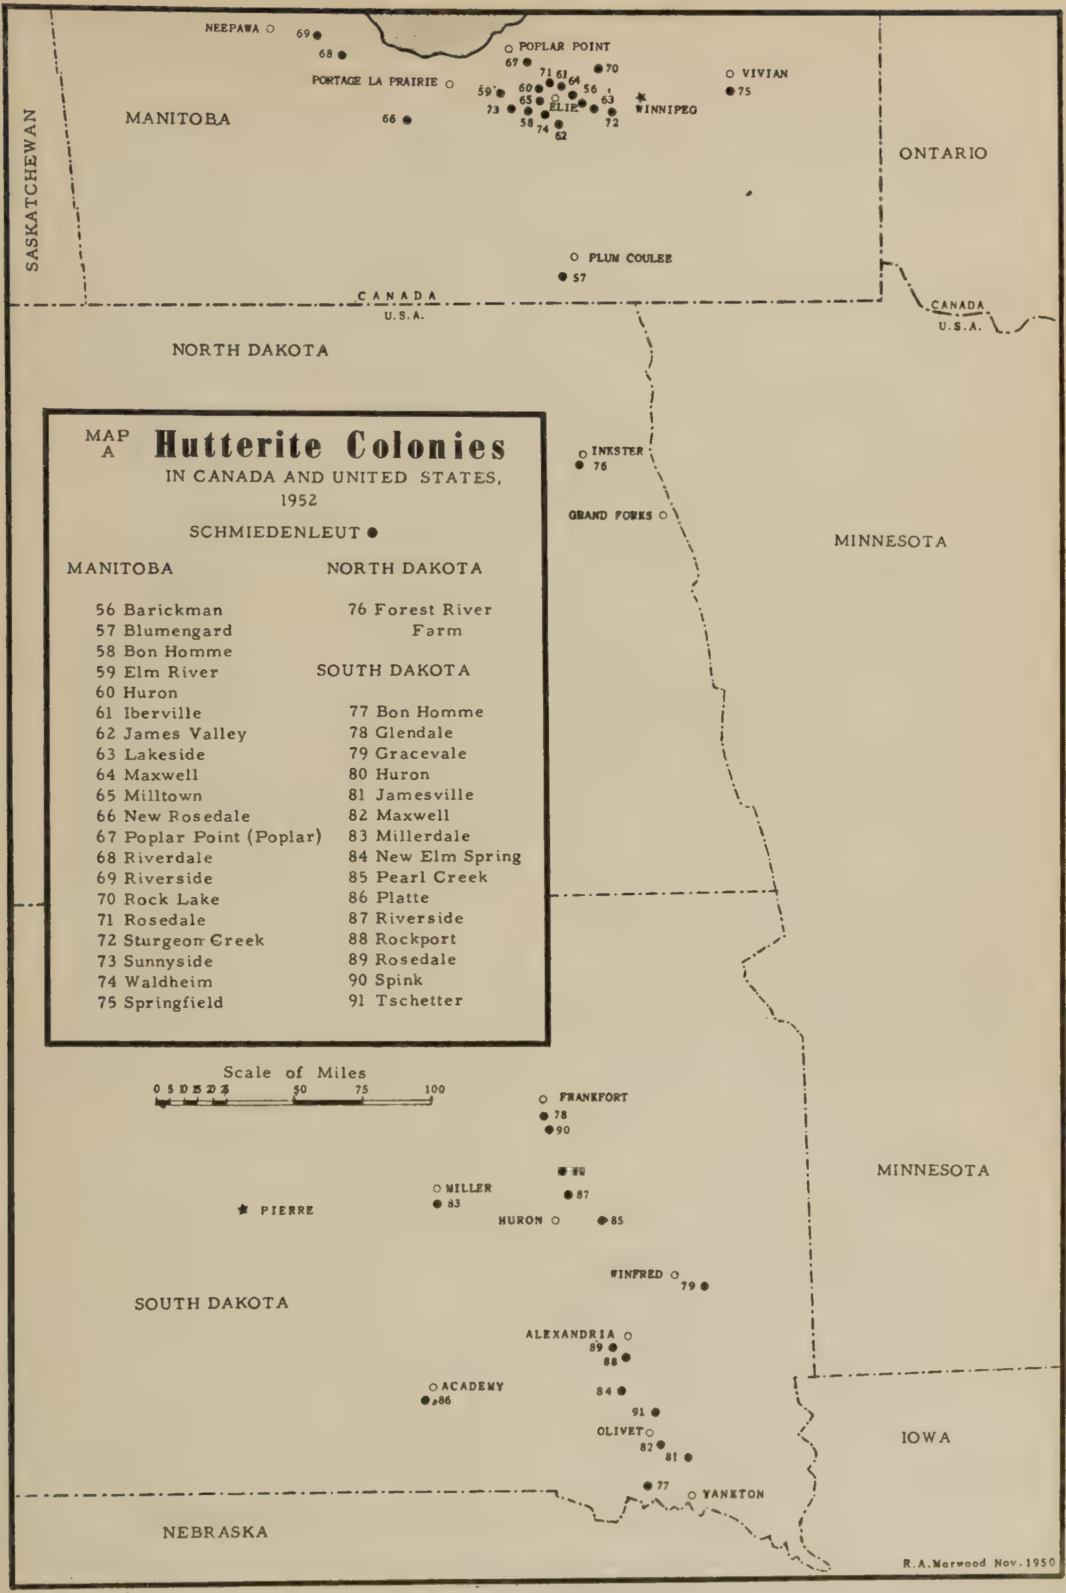
Dariusleut, Alberta
98 Pibroch, Pibroch
99 Scotford, Fort Saskatchewan
Lehrerleut, Alberta
100 Acadia Valley, Oyen
101 New Milford, Winnifred
102 Rosedale, Etzikom
103 Springside, Duchess
Lehrerleut, Saskatchewan
104 Bench, Shaunavon
105 Cypress, Maple Creek
106 Slade Colony, Tompkins
Lehrerleut, Montana
107 Glacier, Cut Banks
Schmiedeleut, Manitoba
108 Bloomfield, Westbourne
109 Crystal Spring, St. Agathe
110 Oak Bluff, Morris
Schmiedeleut, South Dakota
111 Blumengard, Wecota

The colonies of the Society of Brothers (Paraguay, etc.) have grown in the same period to more than 1,000 souls.

NOTE FOR THE MAPS ON THE FOLLOWING PAGES

Rev. David Decker, Tschetter Colony, South Dakota; Rev. Paul Gross, Pincher Creek Colony, Alberta; Rev. Peter Hofer, James Valley Colony, Manitoba; Rev. Joseph Waldner, Springfield Colony, Manitoba; and Rev. John Wurz, Wilson Colony, Alberta, assisted in preparing a list of Hutterite colonies and determining their location. The maps were prepared under the direction of Dr. Joseph W. Eaton, Dept. of Sociology and Anthropology, Wayne University, Detroit, Mich., with the assistance of Evelyn Plaut; they were drawn by R. A. Morwood of the Dept. of Geography at Wayne University.

The first exhaustive list of Hutterite Bruderhofs in Europe with locations (concerning Moravia and Slovakia, however) is that prepared by E. Crous and published in 1953 in connection with the article Rabenska in the Mennonitisches Lexikon (Installment 39, pp. 418-23) where two maps are also given, prepared by Dr. Gerhard Wöhlke of the Geographical Institute in Göttingen on the basis of the Austrian Spezialkarte 1:75,000, published 1869-88 by the



MAP A
Hutterite Colonies
IN CANADA AND UNITED STATES, 1952
SCHMIEDENLEUT ●
MANITOBA
56 Barickman
57 Blumengard
58 Bon Homme
59 Elm River
60 Huron
61 Iberville
62 James Valley
63 Lakeside
64 Maxwell
65 Milltown
66 New Rosedale
67 Poplar Point (Poplar)
68 Riverdale
69 Riverside
70 Rock Lake
71 Rosedale
72 Sturgeon Creek
73 Sunnyside
74 Waldheim
75 Springfield
NORTH DAKOTA
76 Forest River Farm
SOUTH DAKOTA
77 Bon Homme
78 Glendale
79 Gracevale
80 Huron
81 Jamesville
82 Maxwell
83 Millerdale
84 New Elm Spring
85 Pearl Creek
86 Platte
87 Riverside
88 Rockport
89 Rosedale
90 Spink
91 Tschetter
Scale of Miles
0 5 10 15 20 25 50 75 100
SASKATCHEWAN
MANITOBA
NEEPAWA
69
68
PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE
66
POPLAR POINT
67
71 61 64
70
59
60
65
ELIE
56
63
73
58
74
62
72
WINNIPEG
VIVIAN
75
ONTARIO
PLUM COULEE
57
CANADA
U.S.A.
CANADA
U.S.A.
NORTH DAKOTA
INKSTER
76
GRAND FORKS MINNESOTA FRANKFORT
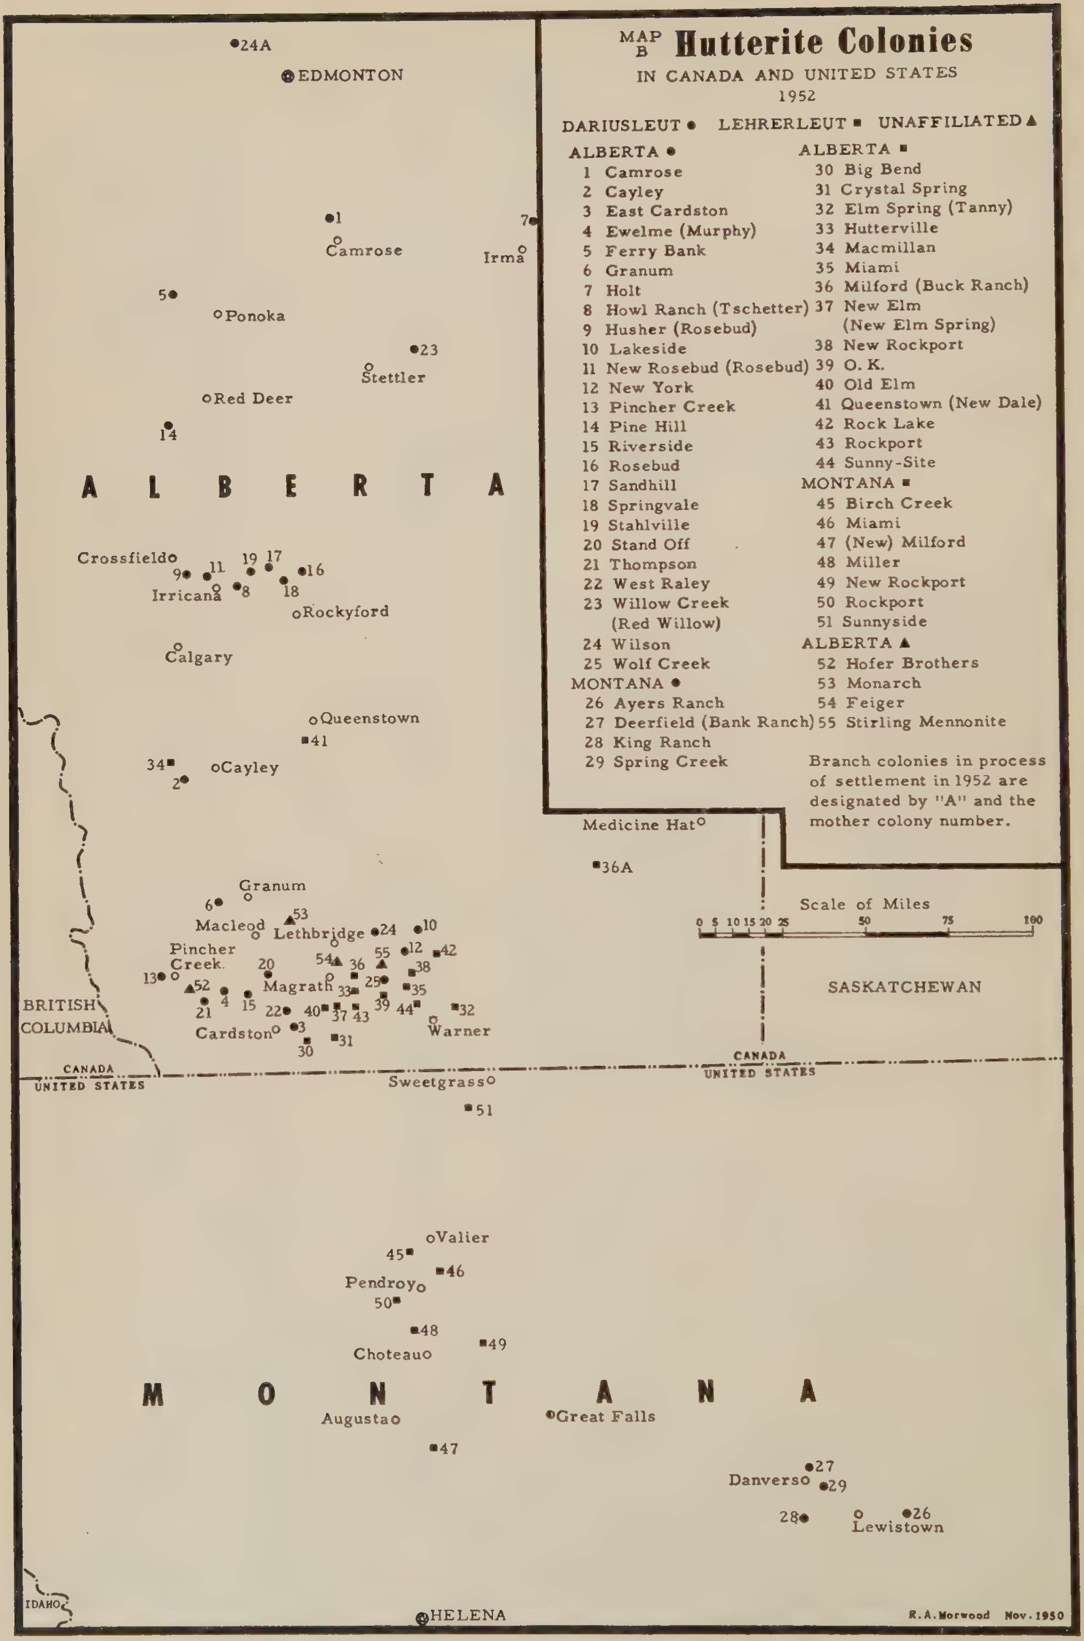
78
90
80
MILLER
83
87
PIERRE
HURON
85
MINNESOTA
WINFRED
79
SOUTH DAKOTA
ALEXANDRIA
89
88
ACADEMY
86
84
91
OLIVET
82
81
77
YANKTON
IOWA
NEBRASKA
R.A.Norwood Nov. 1950



MAP B Hutterite Colonies
IN CANADA AND UNITED STATES
1952
DARIUSLEUT ● LEHRERLEUT ■ UNAFFILIATED ▲
ALBERTA ●
1 Camrose
2 Cayley
3 East Cardston
4 Ewelme (Murphy)
5 Ferry Bank
6 Granum
7 Holt
8 Howl Ranch (Tschetter)
9 Husher (Rosebud)
10 Lakeside
11 New Rosebud (Rosebud)
12 New York
13 Pincher Creek
14 Pine Hill
15 Riverside
16 Rosebud
17 Sandhill
18 Springvale
19 Stahlville
20 Stand Off
21 Thompson
22 West Raley
23 Willow Creek (Red Willow)
24 Wilson
25 Wolf Creek
MONTANA ●
26 Ayers Ranch
27 Deerfield (Bank Ranch)
28 King Ranch
29 Spring Creek
ALBERTA ■
30 Big Bend
31 Crystal Spring
32 Elm Spring (Tanny)
33 Hutterville
34 Macmillan
35 Miami
36 Milford (Buck Ranch)
37 New Elm (New Elm Spring)
38 New Rockport
39 O. K.
40 Old Elm
41 Queenstown (New Dale)
42 Rock Lake
43 Rockport
44 Sunny-Site
MONTANA ■
45 Birch Creek
46 Miami
47 (New) Milford
48 Miller
49 New Rockport
50 Rockport
51 Sunnyside
ALBERTA ▲
52 Hofer Brothers
53 Monarch
54 Feiger
55 Stirling Mennonite
Branch colonies in process of settlement in 1952 are designated by "A" and the mother colony number.
24A
EDMONTON
1
Camrose
7
Irma
5
Ponoka
23
Stettler
Red Deer
14
ALBERTA
Crossfield
9
11
19
17
16
Irricana
8
18
Rockyford
Calgary
Queenstown
41
34
Cayley
2
Medicine Hat
36A
Granum
6
53
Macleod
Lethbridge
24
10
Pincher Creek
55
12
42
20
54
36
38
13
52
Magrath
33
25
35
21
4
15
22
40
37
43
39
44
32
BRITISH COLUMBIA
Cardston
3
31
30
Warner
Scale of Miles
0 5 10 15 20 25 50 75 100
SASKATCHEWAN
CANADA
UNITED STATES
CANADA
UNITED STATES
Sweetgrass
51
Valier
45
46
Pendroy
50
48
49
Choteau
MONTANA
Augusta
Great Falls
47
27
Danvers
29
28
26
Lewistown
IDAHO
HELENA
R. A. Morwood Nov. 1950

K. K. Militärgeographisches Institut. The Crous lists are here reproduced, but new maps have been prepared by Dr. Robert Friedmann, two of which are based on the M. Lex. maps. The first two lists contain all known Bruderhofs of the 16th and 17th centuries, without indication as to the date of dissolution. They therefore do not reveal how many were in existence at any one time, although most were in existence in the "Golden Age" ca. 1590. The only such list is the third one, which names the Bruderhofs in existence in Moravia, 1619-22, 1622 being the date when all were expelled from the country.

J. Loserth published the first list of Bruderhofs in his Communismus (1894) p. 246. This list he published in M. Lex. (1931) Haushaben, slightly revised, where 88 locations are named. Fr. Hruby published a list of 43 Bruderhofs in existence in Moravia in 1619-22, in his Wiedertäufer in Mähren (Leipzig, 1935), which is reproduced as list no. 3 above. He reports that a considerable number of Bruderhofs were destroyed in 1605. According to Hruby most of the Bruderhofs were in Czech nationality areas; only 9 of the 43 listed areas were in German nationality areas.

Zieglschmid's list of North American Bruderhofs (Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 677-80) contains only 64, although it was not quite exhaustive. He reports (p. 471) the growth in numbers as follows: 1878 (3), 1900 (10), 1915 (17), 1926 (29), 1944 (57), 1947 (64). Before 1918 all American Bruderhofs were in South Dakota. The first Canadian Bruderhofs were established in Manitoba and Alberta in 1918, when a mass migration occurred. Zieglschmid (p. 472 f.) gives a genealogical chart of the origin of the North American Bruderhofs of the Schmiedeleut and Dariusleut in existence in 1947. R.F.

R. Friedmann, "Comprehensive Review of Research on the Hutterites, 1880-1950," MQR XXIV (1950) 353-63; idem, "Die Briefe der österreichischen Täufer" in Arch. f. Ref.-Gesch. XXVI (1929) 30-80, 161-87, with extensive bibliography; idem, "The Christian Communism of the Hutterian Brethren," Arch. f. Ref.-Gesch., 1955; idem, "Christian Love in Action, the Hutterites," Menn. Life, July 1946, 38-43; Zieglschmid, Chronik (1943); Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch (1947), with exhaustive bibliography to that date; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Loserth, Communismus; J. Horsch, The Hutterian Brethren (Goshen, 1931); Fr. Hruby, Die Wiedertäufer in Mähren (Leipzig, 1935); L. Müller, Der Kommunismus der mährischen Wiedertäufer (Leipzig, 1927); idem, Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter (Leipzig, 1938); Wiswedel, Bilder I-III; J. W. Eaton and A. J. Mayer, Man's Capacity to Reproduce; the Demography of a Unique Population (Hutterites) (Glencoe, Ill., 1954); Bertha W. Clark, "The Hutterian Communities," Journal of Pol. Economy (1924) 357-74, 468-86; J. Heimann, "The Hutterite Doctrines of Church and Common Life. A Study of Peter Riedemann's Confession of Faith," MQR XXVI (1952) 22-47, 142-60; J. W. Eaton and R. T. Weil, Culture and Mental Disorder, a Comparative Study of the Hutterites (Glencoe, 1954); Hans Fischer, Jakob Hutter, Leben, Frömmigkeit und Briefe (Newton, 1957); J. Sommer, "Hutterite Medicine and Physicians in Moravia in the 16th Century and After," MQR XXVII (1953) 111-27; R. Friedmann, "Hutterite Physicians and Barber-Surgeons," ibid., 128-36; idem, "Economic Aspects of Early Hutterite Life," MQR XXX (October 1956) 259-66; ML II, 378-84.

Hutterite Family Names. The Hutterite Brethren of today (1954) numbering close to 10,000, belong to not more than 15 different families as follows: Decker, Entz, Glantzer, Gross, Hofer, Kleinsasser, Knels, Mändel, Stahl, Tschetter, Waldner, Wipf, Wollman, Wurz, Walter. These 15 families may be divided according to their origin into (a) the "old" Hutterites, (b) the "Carinthian" Hutterites (since 1756), and (c) former Prussian Mennonites who joined the brotherhood in the Ukraine in the 1780's. (This article does not deal at all with the New Hutterites or "Arnold-Leut.")

(a) "Old" Hutterite families may again be subdivided into those (1) who lived in Transylvania (Alvinc) ever since 1621, and from there moved to the Ukraine 1767-70, and (2) those from Slovakia (mainly Sobotiste) who joined the brotherhood only after the 1780's. The assignment, however, to either group is not absolutely certain. (1) From Transylvania come the Stahl and the Wipf families. A Stahl is mentioned in the small Chronik as early as 1663 when he was killed by the Turks; of the Wipfs the Chronik says nothing, mainly because the writers of this Chronik lived in Slovakia and somewhat neglected the story of the Transylvanian (q.v.)Bruderhof. (2) From Slovakia (Sobotiste and perhaps Velky Levary) come the families Walter, Wollman, Tschetter, and Mändel. The Walters are no doubt the oldest family of all. One Franz Walter (of Oetisheim, Württemberg: see Bossert, 685, 891 f.), a barber-surgeon, was made preacher in 1597; in 1621 he led a group to Transylvania (Alvinc), where he died six months later. His family continued in Sobotiste. A Zacharias Walter (1700-62), head bishop from 1746, is the ancestor of all the Walters of today. His son, Jacob Walter, went to Russia in 1782 (see Walter). As to the Wollmans we read of one Jacob Bollman, Vorsteher 1724-34; in the "Väterlied" (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 1914, 878) the same brother is named Wollman. It appears that the names Wollman, Bollman, and Pullman (still today in Slovakia) indicate the same family. A Tobias Pullman, the husband of the daughter of Jacob Walter, came to the Ukraine in 1784. Also the name Walman in the Chronik, may be of the descent.

The Tschetters of today come from a family originally named Zeterle or Cseterle. It is possible that they were of Slovakian origin; however, the name Zeterle (Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 247, note 3) could also be of German origin. They must have joined the brotherhood late, since their name appears only in the Klein-Geschichtsbuch. There were Tschetters both in Slovakia and in Transylvania; it is uncertain from which branch the family of today derives, as no family tradition has survived. Finally there are the Mändels. Apparently this family has nothing to do with the old Tirolean Anabaptist name (Hans Mändel martyred in 1561). It originates rather with a Slavic family, mentioned in the Klein-Geschichtsbuch as "Mändelig." In 1784 a Paul Mändelig arrived in Vishenka. It is interesting to learn that still today the Mändels are called among the Brethren the "Bohemians" (die Behm).

The Klein-Geschichtsbuch lists (373-74) all those who had managed to leave Slovakia and to rejoin the brotherhood in Russia. All told there were 56 souls. In this list also an Andreas Stahl is mentioned; whether the Stahls of today go back to him or to Johannes Stahl of Transylvania can no longer be ascertained.

(b) Hutterites of Carinthian origin who joined the brotherhood in Transylvania in 1756 are Waldner (q.v.), Hofer (q.v.), Kleinsasser (q.v.), Glantzer (q.v.), and Wurz (q.v.). The Klein-Geschichtsbuch (268-70) gives a list of all those who left Carinthia in 1755, with at least 14 names; only 5 names have survived to this day.

(c) Hutterites of Mennonite origin: contacts with the Mennonites of East Prussia began around 1780-81 (see Hofer). Today four families exist of that Mennonite extraction: Decker or Dekker (q.v., in 1782, one Els Deckerin joined with her children), Entz (no further information), Gross (joined the Vishenka group in 1781), and Knels (like Els Deckerin, also one Liset Knelsin with two children, joined the brotherhood in 1782, Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 369). It is said that the family name of Knels will soon die out among the modern Brethren. A fifth Mennonite Hutterite family name, Jantzen, died out in 1927. Any Mennonites of today who bear a Hutterite name (except for the four names just mentioned, deriving from Mennonite background) are certain to be of Hutterite background, and most likely transferred from a Hutterite group after its arrival in North Dakota 1874-77.

It might be valuable also to record that in Slovakia today among the Habaner (q.v.), the following family names have become known: Walter, Pullman, Baumgartner, Tschetter, Bernhauser, Miller and Müller, and Roth.

Another "old" Hutterite family of high standing, the Kuhr family (active in Transylvania), seems to have died out in the Ukraine at an early date.
R.F.

Bertha W. Clark, "The Hutterian Communities," Journal of Pol. Economy XXXII (1924) 357-74, 468-86. She was the first to list all existing family names (16 at that time).

Hutterite Missioners (Sendboten). While it is characteristic of Anabaptism in general that its very existence is preconditioned by the mission idea (as over against the state and national churches with their comprehensive constituency), this is in particular true of the Hutterites, perhaps the most active and aggressive missioners of the entire 16th century. They acted out of a strong sense of being called to spread the Gospel, to call people to repent and to change their life in a spiritual rebirth, and to invite men and women to follow Christ as true disciples. They "sent brethren every year to lands near and far according to the commandments of Christ and the practice of the apostles, to teach and to preach and to gather for the Lord God's people" (Ehrenpreis, Ein Sendbrief, 1652, reprint 1920, 122 ff., Von der Sendung in die Länder).

The established churches in Germany contested the right of the Brethren to send out missioners on the ground that they had not been ordained by God to do so. For instance the Calvinist superintendent of Alzey in the Palatinate asked the Hutterite missioner Leonhard Dax (q.v.), imprisoned in 1567, who had given him the right and authority to come into the Palatinate to confuse the people. Dax replied that he was not sent to confuse them but rather to lead everybody from error to the right way of Christian discipleship. The Brethren owed it to the world to bring it the pure and unadulterated Word of God. And those who were sent by the brotherhood were properly ordained as "apostles" (Sendboten), and must be considered as commissioned by God Himself. Otherwise also the apostolic church would not have done right. (He quoted Phil. 2; Col. 4; II Tim. 4; Titus 3; Acts 11, 12, 13, and 18.) Dax had also been chosen to this service by an orderly established Christian church (Gemeinde), whose duty it was to preach faith in Christ and to testify both to repentance and forgiveness of sins in His name, and that not only at one specified place but to the ends of the earth. (Dax epistles, Beck Collection in Brno, file 14.)

In order to be able to fulfill the task laid upon them by the Lord, the congregation semiannually (usually in the spring and fall) chose from the preachers a number of Brethren to perform a widespread missionary service in all directions, to preach the Gospel in accordance with the commandment of Christ, and to lead the converts to the "promised land" or Moravia.

The departure of these missioners was always a most solemn occasion, as everyone was fully conscious of the extraordinary responsibilities laid upon these itinerant preachers, and also of the real dangers involved in this task. We find in one Hutterite codex of 1628 (in Esztergom) two descriptions: "How the Brethren who go into foreign lands take leave from the brotherhood" and "Response of the elders to the Brethren who are about to leave." (A full description may be found in Loserth, 228-31, and Wiswedel, Archiv f. Ref.-Gesch. 1948, 119 f.) Words of encouragement, of wisdom, and of trust in God and His guidance are exchanged, and the parting Brethren are then assured of the intercessory prayers of the entire brotherhood while they are away on their dangerous task. At the end, a hymn composed especially for this occasion was sung, "Ein Lied wöllen wir singen und fürher bringen tun" (1568); Wolkan (Lieder, 206-9) prints the entire hymn, and the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (650-52) borrows from him.

Each missioner had his field assigned to him; thus Brethren went out to all parts of Germany (Bavaria, Württemberg, Hesse, Thuringia, Rhineland, also Silesia and Prussia), to Switzerland, to Poland, and in two cases also to Venice, Italy. A few even came as far as Denmark and Sweden, but that was hardly their actual field of work. Each brother had epistles and tracts in his knapsack. The home congregation supported its missionaries not only by prayers but also by writing them letters and, in case of imprisonment, by dispatching Brethren to maintain contact, bring them these letters and receive their replies, also to bring home all news of importance. The missionaries, on the other hand, never tired of writing letters home about their success or, if arrested, their trials and their good cheer and unshaken trust in God.

As a rule the Brethren held their meetings at night in remote places, often in forests or mountain glens, in lonely mills, barns, stone quarries, and the like. It was not as their opponents asserted (Menius, for example) that they only "sneaked" around in corners because they feared the light of the day or despised church buildings, but merely because they were safer in such places. By chance we learn also how they called such meetings and how they came into contact with possible listeners. T. W. Röhrich published a "letter of invitation" (which by chance was found in the Strasbourg church archives) in which those who arranged the meeting wrote to a couple to come then and there ("in the house where one has been before") and not to be late and also to invite "the old man" to come too (Röhrich, 115, note 73).

As to the exact contents of their message and preaching we do not know too much. We may assume that it was about the same as what we read in their epistles and tracts. In the Handbüchlein wider den Prozess (q.v.) we read: "An evangelical missioner shall use the sword of the Spirit which reveals to men the sin of their heart, separates them from the wrong, revives the soul and gives assurance of eternal life in the faith of Christ."—"We believe in Jesus Christ," writes Riedemann in his Rechenschaft, "and although men cry against us that we seek to become pious and saved by our own works, we say no to that." And Hans Hut (q.v.) confessed at his trial that he taught nothing but first repentance, then believing, and finally baptism upon faith. But this baptism imposes also the obligation to live as the Word of God indicates. Without such a life of obedience faith does not save. Above all they stressed discipleship—a message which people could not hear anywhere else. There is no God-fearing life without the "fruits of the Spirit." Hence it is deemed necessary to leave this worldly life and join the brotherhood. People may see for themselves in Moravia how genuine disciples of Christ actually live.

The result of this message was truly amazing. A continuous stream of Brethren moved from all parts toward Moravia, from Tirol, from Switzerland, and also from Württemberg, and the Rhineland, including the Palatinate. It made the authorities of these countries uneasy, and almost everywhere laws were enacted specifying that those who left for Moravia should lose all claim to their parental inheritance. But the price of these achievements was also no small one. Very few of the missioners died a natural death. Most of them ended their lives as martyrs, being burned, beheaded, drowned, or imprisoned for life. "Thus fare the messengers of God who seek to help people out of ruin," remarks the Geschicht-Buch. The memory of these blood witnesses is retained in the brotherhood by word, song, or writings. Time and again we find remarks of that kind in the Chronicle.

The execution of these brave men was quite often a public event shared by a crowd "of thousands." As these brethren went to the place of martyrdom with shining eyes, admonishing people to remain loyal to their faith in God and to follow His commandments, people were profoundly touched, and many turned Anabaptist as a consequence of such an event. And this the Brethren knew and were unafraid of trial and suffering. There was a time, Loserth contended, when almost all of Tirol and Styria were in sympathy with Anabaptism. It was about the same everywhere in southern Germany.

The missionary zeal lessened somewhat toward the end of the 16th century when the situation in Moravia began to deteriorate, hence the incentive to come thither became weaker. But we still hear of mission work in Prussia (Joseph Hauser) and in Silesia in the early 17th century. Even after the Brethren had been expelled from Moravia and moved to Slovakia, they tried to continue their mission work although on a reduced scale. The last mission work was done around 1650-54 in Danzig, where individuals of the Polish (Anti-Trinitarian) Church were contacted (see Ehrenpreis).

Perhaps the most successful of all Hutterite missioners was the brother Hänsel Schmidt (q.v.) or Raiffer, who was burned at Aachen in 1558. R.F.

W. Wiswedel, "Die alten Taufgemeinden und ihr missionarisches Wirken," in Arch. f. Ref.-Gesch. XL (1943) 183-200; XLI (1948) 115-32; Loserth, Communismus, 228-31; Wolkan, Lieder, 206-9; T. W. Röhrich, "Zur Gesch. der Strassburger Wiedertäufer," Ztscht f. Hist. Theol., 1860 (115 n.); Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Ehrenpreis, Sendbrief (Scottdale, 1920); P. Rideman, Account of Our Religion (Bridgnorth, England, 1950): F. H. Littell, "Anabaptist Theology of Missions," MQR XXI (1947) 5-17; idem, The Anabaptist View of the Church (American Society of Church History, 1952) 94-112, chapter on "The Great Commission."

Hutterthal, a village of the Hutterian Brethren (q.v.) in the province of Taurida in South Russia. They came from Vishenka (q.v.), province of Tchernigov, in 1843 and established their village on a tract of steppe-land which Johann Cornies (q.v.) had leased for a long time previously. At the request of the government Cornies guided the entire venture and became the best friend and adviser of the new settlers. Many were very poor, unable to provide food or shelter for themselves for the winter; Cornies secured the necessary grain as well as a loan of 15,000 rubles from the crown. In 1844, 30 houses were finished, and soon the second village, Johannesruh (q.v.), founded. Economic prosperity came soon. By 1846 they had paid off their entire debt to the government. When universal military service was introduced in Russia, the Hutterites again abandoned their homes, and in 1874 emigrated to America. Their villages passed into Lutheran possession. (ML II, 384.) D.H.E.

Hutterthal Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Hutchinson Co., S.D., a member of the Northern District Conference, was organized in 1877 by noncommunal Hutterites under the leadership of John L. Wipf. The first meetinghouse was used from 1877 until 1899, when a new church was built, which was replaced by a modern brick structure in 1953. John P. Hofer, P. P. Tschetter, and Jacob B. Hofer have served as ministers. The 1954 membership is 220, largely rural. J.D.U.

Hutterthal Mennonite Church (GCM), located near Hitchcock and Carpenter in Beadle Co., S.D., is a member of the Northern District Conference. The congregation was first organized in 1906 under the leadership of Joseph M. Hofer. The original building was purchased from the Methodists and was replaced with a new structure in 1949. The membership has increased from 80 to 176 in 1954. In addition to Joseph M. Hofer, the congregation has been served by Elias J. Wipf, Joseph J. Hofer, and Paul J. R. Hofer, who is the present pastor. J.D.U.

Hutterville, a Hutterian Bruderhof near Magrath, Alberta, founded in 1927 by Brethren from the Rockport commune in South Dakota. Their preachers are Johann Waldner and Michael Hofer. In 1947 the Bruderhof numbered 147 souls with 70 baptized members. D.D.

Huybert op der Straaten, together with his wife Trijnken, Pieter ten Hove, and Lijsken te Linschoten, was beaten, robbed of his possessions, and banished from Homburg in 1601 because of his Anabaptist faith, at the instigation of Count Johann of Witgenstein. They were obviously of Dutch descent. (Mart. Mir. D 803, E 1102; ML II, 385.)

Huyberts, Claes, a deacon of the "Blauwe Schuur" (Blue Barn) congregation (United Flemish and High German Mennonites) at Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland. He served in the second half of the 17th century and promoted the union of 1672 between his congregation and the Waterlander congregation of Harlingen. In 1666 he negotiated with the Frisian government in the name of all the Mennonites of the different branches concerning a loan of 500,000 guilders to be made by the Mennonites of Friesland to equip warships. With much trouble this compulsory loan was raised by the Mennonites, each of them having to pay about a hundred guilders. A letter written by Claes Huyberts in 1666 concerning this loan, which enumerates several Mennonite branches in Friesland and their membership figures, is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library. A second loan for the same purpose was contracted in 1672 and again Claes Huyberts was middleman between the government and the Mennonites of Friesland. The son of Claes Huybertsz and his descendants assumed the family name of Braam. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 163, 176 f., 311; DB 1877, 125-27; Catalogus Amst., 348.

Huyge (Huych), Jacobsz Kraen (Craen), a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at The Hague on April 15, 1534, together with two anonymous martyrs; his wife Marritgen had been put to death at Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland, shortly before by being drowned. Huyge was a native of the Dutch village of Hazerswoude (q.v.), province of South Holland. According to van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, which erroneously gives 1532 as the year of his death, he was a peaceful Anabaptist, but the records studied by Vos and Mellink show that he was an adherent of revolutionary principles. In March 1534 he took part in a journey to Münster and was arrested en route at Bergklooster (q.v.). With his wife and some others he was first taken to Haarlem, where his wife was executed, then to The Hague. According to Vos he was a leader of the revolutionary Anabaptists of South Holland. He was a rather wealthy man, which was an exception among the early Dutch Anabaptists. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 34, E 441; DB 1917, 121 (No. 134) 124, 171; Mellink, Wederdopers, 190; ML II, 555.

Huygen, Jan, an otherwise unknown Dutch Mennonite, the author of Stigtelyke Rymen op Verscheyde Stoffen (Amsterdam, 1700, repr. Amsterdam, 1738). vdZ.

M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijveren (Amsterdam, 1745) 49.

Huygen, Pieter, a Mennonite, concerning whom nothing is known but that he was the author of Beginselen van Gods Koninkryk in den Mensch uitgedrukt in Zinnebeelden. This book was formerly very popular among the Dutch Mennonites. There have been at least nine editions (Harlingen 1689, of which there is no copy extant, Amsterdam 1700, another edition of 1700, Groningen 1715, Amsterdam 1724, 1735, 1738, 1740); in the third and following editions are inserted the Stigtelyke Rymen by Jan Huygen (q.v.), who was probably Pieter Huygen's son. vdZ.

Huyzen, Kornelius van, b. Aug. 24, 1667, d. Jan. 28, 1721, at Emden, was a preacher of the Mennonite church at Emden in East Friesland from 1701, elder from 1702 to his death in 1721. Van Huyzen was an advocate of audible prayer by the minister (stemmelijk gebed), and defended the thesis that the Mennonites are descended from the Waldenses (q.v.). One of his numerous works was titled Historische Verhandeling van de opkomst en voortgang, mitgaders de Godgeleerdheijd der Doopsgezinde Christenen (2 volumes, Emden-Hamburg, 1712); second edition with foreword by W. Houttuyn (Hoorn, 1734), a work which in a number of respects has value for the study of Mennonite history. It was thought that the book reflected Spinoza's views, giving rise to an unedifying pen-war, of which some writings are still extant. He was especially attacked by Harmen Reynskes van Overwijk (q.v.), a Mennonite preacher at Amsterdam, to whom he replied with Toetz-steen van de Leere der Doopsgezinden (Amsterdam, 1713) and De Grondslag van de Leere der Doopsgesinden (Amsterdam, 1715). Besides this he published Korte inhoud van de Leere des Geloofs. Geschikt nae de Algemeene Belijdenissen van de Doopsgesinde Christenen (Amsterdam, 1705) and two sermons: Ezechiels gehoorzaamheid (Emden, 1702) and Paulus Beede, the sermon preached when he was ordained as an elder (Amsterdam, 1703). vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. IV, 452-54; N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 898; Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, 611-27; DJ 1837, 96; DB 1867, 52-54; 1898, 62, 76 f.; ML II, 385.

Hydro, Okla., a town with a population of 750, is located 65 miles west of Oklahoma City on U.S. Highway 66, the "Main Street of America." It is noted mainly for its agricultural products—wheat, cotton, peanuts, and livestock. A small rock mining industry is in operation in a slightly mountainous area south of Hydro. Some General Conference

Mennonites settled south of Hydro in 1904 and Mennonites (MC) established themselves on the level wheatlands north of town soon after. W.W.K.

Hylaard, a hamlet in the Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert Bouwens baptized 21 persons in 1568-82; a congregation of Hylaard, however, is unknown; the newly baptized must have joined a congregation in the neighborhood. vdZ.

Hylkema, a Dutch Mennonite family, originally from Friesland. Sjouke Hylkes (whose children assumed the family name of Hylkema) was a farmer and a preacher of Oldeboorn, Nieuwe Huys congregation, in Friesland 1759-*ca.*1803. Some of his descendants were deacons at Akkrum (near Oldeboorn). The following members of this family went into the ministry after training at the University and the Mennonite Theological Seminary at Amsterdam:

(1) Kornelis (Cornelis) Bonnes Hylkema, b. 1870 at Akkrum, d. 1948 at Haarlem, who served the congregations of Den Helder 1896-99, Zaandam-Oost 1899-1908, and Haarlem 1908-36. He published a number of books: Reformateurs I (Haarlem, 1900, his doctor's thesis) and Reformateurs II (Haarlem, 1902), which contain important material for Mennonite history; De Rechtsverhoudingen in de Ver. Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Haarlem (Haarlem, 1918); Het predikambt (Haarlem, 19—); Werkelijkheids theologie (Haarlem, 19—). Besides this he published a number of papers on Mennonite history and other subjects: "De afzetting van Jacob Pieters Banning als leeraar te Wormer en Jisp, Anno 1698" (DB 1898, 78-106), "Isaak Molenaar aan Willem de Clercq" (DB 1911, 63-92), and "Jan Luyken" (De Gids, 1904).

(2) Tjeerd Oeda Ma Hylke Hylkema, b. 1888, pastor of the Giethoorn Mennonite Church 1912-29, Amersfoort 1929-36, and Amsterdam 1936-48. At first he was a liberal Christian as most Dutch Mennonites are, but while serving in his first congregation he was converted to a pietistic orthodoxy. Since then he has been active in behalf of what he calls "een belijdende en dienende vredesgemeente des Heeren" (a congregation of the Lord, whose character is peace and which is willing to serve and confess the Lord). Hylkema has been of considerable influence on the Dutch Mennonite brotherhood, both by his activities and his piety. He was (1917) the founder of the Vereeniging voor Gemeentedagen (see Broederschapswerk), of which association he was president 1917-27; he took the initiative in building the camping houses "Kraggehuis" and "Samen Een" on the lakes of Giethoorn. He was active in behalf of the Russian Mennonites in 1920; he promoted the foundation of the brotherhood-home "Fredeshiem" near Steenwijk in 1929; he was leader of the Mennonite peace movement and president of the Dutch Vredesgroep (Peace Group); he was one of the co-operators in the present Doopsgezinde Bundel (Dutch Hymnbook). He published a number of books, Woodbrooke en de Oud-Woodbrookers (Steenwijk, 19—, reprinted in 1913); Aan den Arbeid voor de Gemeente (Wolvega, 1917); De Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in Rusland (Steenwijk, 1920, repr. in 1921); also a German translation of the above: Die Mennoniten Gemeinden in Ruszland (Heilbronn, 1921); De betekenis van de Gemeentedagbeweging (Wolvega, 1922); Aan den Arbeid voor de Gemeente II (Wolvega, n.d.-1928); Dagelijks leven uit het Woord (1948); Wat de Bijbel zegt: dienende weerloze liefde ? of niet ? (n.p., 1953). Together with D. A. Wuite van Maasdijk, he published Het Evangelie naar de Beschrijving van Lukas met verklarende aantekeningen en uitlegging voor het persoonlijk leven (Haarlem, 1947).

(3) Oepke Trinus Hylkema, b. 1902 at Amsterdam, serving the congregation of Terschelling 1926-28, Almelo 1928-39, Bussum 1939-44, and The Hague since 1944. He published Levende Moraal (Bussum, 1951) and Wat Hemel en aarde verbindt (The Hague, 1953). vdZ.

Hymnology of the Anabaptists. Many of the early Anabaptists were hymn writers, at least 130 being identifiable by name. Among them were Felix Manz, George Blaurock, Michael Sattler, Balthasar Hubmaier, Sigmund Salminger, Jacob Dachser, and Hans Hut of the Germans, Menno Simons and Dirk Philips of the Dutch, and of the Hutterites a large number including Peter Riedemann (at least 46 of his hymns have been preserved), Paul Glock, Antony Erdforter, Offrus Griesinger, Hans Schmid or Raifer, Wolf Sailer, Hans Mändl, and Hauprecht Zapf. Many of the hymns of these writers were included in the several German and Dutch Anabaptist hymnals printed soon after the middle of the 16th century (1560, 1562, 1564, 1565), but many others circulated in manuscript form, particularly the Hutterite hymns. A captive Anabaptist of Urbach, Württemberg, in 1598 surrendered two Anabaptist hymnbooks, "a written one and a printed one" (TA: Württemberg, 725). Von Liliencron reports an Anabaptist codex in the Wolfenbüttel Library of ca. 1578, containing among other items 18 hymns, 8 of which he reprints (Zur Liederdichtung, 20-58). Th. Unger reports an Anabaptist hymn-codex of the 17th century in Graz, consisting of 460 folios. The Hutterite hymnal of 1914 (Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder) is based largely upon three codices of ca. 1600, 1650, and 1660. Just what the written hymnbook of 1598 was remains unknown, since the presence of numerous copies of the printed "Anabaptist songbook" in the Urbach area at that time is attested in the court records. (The burgomaster of Urbach bought one for his children.) Earlier (1573) at Maulbronn Matthes Binder had received a hymnbook (letter to Leonhart Reuss, TA: Württemberg, 708). This hymnbook and Menno Simons' Foundation-Book were the most common (and apparently only or chief) books in the possession of captured Anabaptists around the turn of the 16th century in Württemberg (TA: Württemberg, passim).

Many of the early hymns were written by prisoners or martyrs. George Blaurock wrote a hymn just before his death as a martyr in 1529, in which he gives his reason for writing in the final words of the hymn, "Therefore will I sing to the praise of Thy name, and eternally proclaim the grace which appeared to me." The oldest section of the Ausbund (1564) carries a title which indicates that its hymns were "by the grace of God composed and sung at Passau in the Castle by the Swiss Brethren." This occurred in 1535-37, when Swiss Brethren returning from Moravia were imprisoned at Passau en route. Paul Glock related in a letter he wrote in prison in Hohenwittlingen to Peter Walpot in 1573 that he had composed three hymns which he was sending to Walpot for improvement, and reported, "We read and sing to the glory of God and so pass our time" (TA: Württemberg, 373). Eager to comfort and encourage the brethren at home, the prisoners and martyrs wrote spiritual songs which became a part of the hymn treasury of the brotherhood.

The unusual number of Anabaptist hymn writers and hymns suggests that these hymns were much used among the Anabaptists for private personal and family reading and singing as well as in the congregations, although of course in times of worst persecution singing was little heard because of the danger. But the Anabaptists did sing; the hymns are assigned tunes in the hymnals, they were not merely literary vehicles. In 1596 it was reported of Peter Ehrenpreis of Urbach that he had won much favor with the people by his manner of life and "with his Anabaptist songs which he is accustomed to sing in his vineyards and elsewhere" (TA: Württemberg, 687). Without doubt the hymns were also a factor in Anabaptist evangelism, both read and sung. Christian Neff says (ML II, 86), "A flood of religious songs poured over the young brotherhood like a vivifying and refreshing stream. The songs became the strongest attractive force for the brotherhood. They sang themselves into the hearts of many, clothed in popular tunes. They were mostly martyr songs, which breathed an atmosphere of readiness to die and a touching depth of faith. And those that did not report on martyr steadfastness admonished the listener to a devout faith, which was to prove itself in love. Sanctification and its demonstration in life and death is their glorious content." Von Liliencron says (pp. 4-5), "Love is the great and inexhaustible theme of their hymnody; for love is the sole distinguishing mark of the children of God . . . . For the brethren love is the 'chief sum' of their being . . . . So these hymns immerse themselves in the concept of the love which is all in all, which takes up its cross with joy, which gives everything in the service of God and the neighbor, which bears all things, and out of which flows all humility and meekness, mercy, and peace." Seldom do the Anabaptist hymns have a dominant didactic or doctrinal character, although doctrine is not absent. Sebastian Franck's characterization of Anabaptist doctrine as teaching nothing but "faith, love, and the cross" (Chronica, 1531) may well be applied to their hymns.

There is evidence that before the production of complete hymnals some Anabaptist hymns were published as single numbers or small pamphlets. An illustration is a hymn by Hans Rogel (Ausbund, No. 53), presumably an Anabaptist, which appeared in three printed editions at Augsburg in 1539, and two other hymns by the same author which appeared separately at Augsburg ca. 1550 and at Strasbourg.

Apart from manuscript collections, real Anabaptist hymnals did not appear until after the middle of the 16th century. Then five hymnals appeared at almost the same time, two German and three Dutch. The Dutch came first, one a martyr hymnal, the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren with 25 hymns (later enlarged), published always with Het Offer in ten editions in 1563-99; another, a collection of spiritual songs, Veelderhande Liedekens, in six editions (1560, 1562, 1566, 1569, 1579, and 1580) with 257 hymns; the third, Een nieu Liedenboeck (1562, reprint 1582) with 289 hymns. Late in the century (1582) the noted Hans de Ries issued his Lietboeck, which had many reprints but really falls outside the Anabaptist period.

Germany also had an outspoken martyr hymnal, the Ausbund, first edition in 1564 (Etliche schöne Christliche Geseng, with 53 hymns), first full edition in 1583 with 130 hymns (later increased to 137), with a third edition in 1622 and nine additional reprints in Europe to 1838, as well as many in America beginning with 1742. It was the Swiss Brethren hymnal, and was used in Switzerland and South Germany until at least 1750-1830 in most places, until about 1900 among some of the Amish congregations in France. It is still used by 15,000 Amish members in the United States. The full titles of the editions of 1564 and 1583 are as follows: Etliche schöne Christliche Gesang, wie sie in der Gefengkniss zu Passaw im Schloss von den Schweitzer Brüdern durch Gottes gnad geticht und gesungen worden (n.p., 1564), 53 hymns in 119 folios; Aussbund Etlicher schöner Christlicher Geseng, wie die in der Gefengnuss zu Passaw im Schloss von den Schweitzern, und auch von andern rechtgläubigen Christen hin und her gedicht worden. Allen und jeden Christen, welcher Religion sie auch seyen, unparteilich und fast nützlich zu brauchen (n.p., 1583), 80 hymns in 432 pp. The second part of this edition is a reprint of the 1564 book with a slightly modified title as follows: Etliche sehr schöne Christliche Gesenge, wie diesselbigen zu Passaw, von den Schweitzerbrüdern, in der Gefengnuss im Schloss, durch Gottes gnad gedicht und gesungen worden. (n.p., 1583), 51 hymns in 347 pp. The 1583 edition is the first to carry the title Ausbund, but Petrus Dathenus, the presiding officer of the Frankenthaler Gespräch of 1571, specifically mentions a "geistliches Liederbuch, der Ausbund" in the course of the debate. There may be a lost edition between 1564 and 1571, unless the term "Ausbund" was used by the Swiss Brethren to refer to the 1564 edition.

The other 16th-century German Anabaptist hymnal was Ein schön Gesangbüchlein Geistlicher Lieder zusammengetragen aus dem alten und Neuen Testament durch fromme Christen und Liebhaber Gottes welcher Hiefür etliche seind gewesen aber noch viel darzu getan welche nie in truck ausgangen. In welchem auch ein recht leben und fundament des rechten Christlichen Glaubens gelert wird. Col. 3. Lehrend und ermanendt euch selbst mit gesangen und lobgesangen und Geistlichen Liedern in der gnadt und singend dem Herrn in ewren hertzen. The first edition with 122 hymns appeared about 1564, possibly in Cologne; the second with 133 hymns was printed after 1569; the third with a somewhat changed title and 140 hymns appeared about 1590.

This last edition incorporated four hymns from the Dutch Veelderhande Liedekens. It was apparently the hymnal of the Anabaptists of the Lower Rhine.

Unfortunately very few of the Anabaptist hymns carried over into the later Mennonite hymnals of Holland, Germany, and Russia. The reason for this is, at least outside of Holland, that the Mennonites of the 17th and 18th centuries, having lost much of the martyr spirit and some of the Anabaptist vision, and coming under the influence of Lutheranism and Pietism, or lacking resources and opportunities to print their own hymnals, actually used the state church hymnals of the areas where they resided, in many places for over a century. When they then began to compile and publish their own hymnals they naturally preferred to take over the hymns with which they had become familiar; they had lost touch with their own hymnological tradition. To be sure, many of the martyr hymns were too narrative in character to be suitable for worship; but the content of the Anabaptist hymnals was by no means exclusively of this type. Some Anabaptist hymns were included in the earliest German Protestant hymnals such as the hymnbook of the Bohemian Brethren by Michael Weisse (1531), and Joh. Zwick's hymnal published at Constance in 1536, Neu Gesangbüchle.

An outstanding early Anabaptist leader and hymn writer was Jacob Dachser (q.v.), preacher and leader of the Augsburg Anabaptist congregation from February 1527, when he was baptized and installed as assistant pastor by Hans Hut, to his recantation in May 1531. A graduate of the University of Ingolstadt and a teacher in Augsburg, he composed a number of hymns as an Anabaptist preacher which were published in the Augsburg hymnal of 1529 "and are among the best in the collection" (Hege). He was either the editor or coeditor of the second edition of the Augsburg hymnal in 1532, for which he versified six Psalms. The hymnal of 1537 (Der gantz Psalter), published by Sigmund Salminger, also a former Augsburg Anabaptist, contains in addition to several of Dachser's earlier hymns a translation of 42 Psalms by him. In 1538 Dachser published all the Psalms with notes (Der gantz psalter Davids), together with an appendix of hymns for church holidays and ceremonies which he wrote. Dachser's Psalter was, to be sure, produced after his recantation, but grew out of what had been begun while he was an Anabaptist preacher.

Chr. Hege has pointed out that the changing relationships of the several major groups of Anabaptists with each other can be traced through the interchange of hymns. In the early days the Swiss Brethren and the Anabaptists in Moravia had many hymns in common. Later the divergence and even opposition between the two groups is reflected in the fact that the Hutterites went their own separate way in the matter of hymns. The exchange between Dutch and Swiss-German groups found expression in their printed hymnals. The Schön Gesangbüchlein contained not only Swiss-South German hymns which also appeared in the Ausbund, but likewise translations of Dutch hymns. The 1583 Ausbund contained improved reproductions of these translated Dutch hymns, obviously taken from the Schön Gesangbüchlein. Thus the Swiss-South German Anabaptists-Mennonites, through the Ausbund, received both Dutch and Hutterite influences in the 16th century and later. The Anabaptists of the Lower Rhine region, the producers of the Schön Gesangbüchlein, apparently had few hymns of their own.

The outstanding work on Anabaptist hymnology, a most thorough and scholarly treatise, is Rudolf Wolkan's Die Lieder der Wiedertäufer, Ein Beitrag zur deutschen und niederländischen Litteratur- und Kirchengeschichte (Berlin, 1903), 295 pp. Besides the chapters, "The Oldest Hymns of the Anabaptists," "The Oldest Hymns of the Swiss Brethren," "Dutch Hymns," "Mennonite Hymns in Germany," "The Later Hymns of the Swiss Brethren," and "The Hymns of the Hutterites," the book includes a list of Anabaptist hymn writers (130 in number), a list of the Dutch Anabaptist hymns mentioned (119 in number), and a list of all hymns of the German Anabaptists (931 in number). Wolkan attempts to give the provenance of all the hymns in the two German Anabaptist hymnals. Philipp Wackernagel's Das deutsche Lied von der ältesten Zeit bis zu Anfang des XVII. Jahrhunderts, Vol. III (Leipzig, 1870) contains a section (pp. 441-86) headed "Die Lieder der ersten Wiedertäufer," in which 45 hymns, Nos. 498-542, are reprinted with annotations. The writers of some of these hymns were not really Anabaptists, as e.g., Thomas Müntzer with ten hymns and Ludwig Haetzer with three. The remaining authors in order are Hans Hut (4), George Blaurock (2), Felix Manz, Hans Koch, and Lenhart Meister, George Wagner (2), Hans Langenmantel, Leopold Scharnschlager, Oswald Glait (9), Henslein von Bilach, Leopold Schneider, Hans Schlaffer, Annelein von Freiburg, Jörg Steinmetz, Seven Brethren (2). Wackernagel's Lieder der niederländischen Reformierten aus der Zeit der Verfolgung im 16. Jahrhundert (Beiträge zur niederländischen Hymnologie, No. 1, Frankfurt, 1867) devotes pp. 79-147 to an exact reproduction of 68 Dutch Anabaptist hymns, 46 from Veelderhande Liedekens (edition of 1569), 21 from Een nieu Liedenboeck (edition of 1562), and one from Hans de Ries' Lietboeck of 1582. On pp. 194-208 Wackernagel reproduces eleven more Dutch Anabaptist hymns, three from the 1570 edition of the Lietboecxken of Het Offer, and eight from another printed source of 1577. The introductory section reproduces in bibliographically complete form the title pages, prefaces, and conclusions of all the above books. (See Neff, Gesang and Gesangbücher, ML II, 85-91; Hege, Liederdichtung, ML II, 652 f.) H.S.B.

Wolkan, Lieder; Wackernagel, Kirchenlied; idem, Lieder; H. S. Burrage, "Anabaptist Hymn Writers and Their Hymns," in Baptist Hymn Writers and Their Hymns (Portland, 1888) 1-25; Franklin Johnson, "Some Hymns and Songs of the German Anabaptists," in The Baptist Quarterly Review IV (1882) 370-78; A. J. Ramaker, "Hymns and Hymn Writers Among the Anabaptists of the Sixteenth Century," MQR III (1929) 93-131; R. Friedmann, "Devotional Literature of the Swiss Brethren," MQR XVI (1942) 199-220; H. S. Bender, "First Edition of the Ausbund," MQR III (1929) 147-50; E. Koch, Geschichte des Kirchenlieds und Kirchengesangs, 3d ed., 8 vv. (Stuttgart, 1866-77) with Anabaptist materials in II, 143-45, and VI, 185 f.; Rochus von Lilienkron, "Zur Liederdichtung der Wiedertäufer," in Abhandlungen der k. bayer. Akademie des W. III. Cl., Vol. XIII, Part I (Munich, 1875) 1-58; August Kamp, Die Psalmendichtung des Jakob Dachser (Greifswald, 1931); Th. Unger, "Ueber eine Wiedertäufer-Liederhandschrift des 17. Jahrhunderts," in Jahrbuch der Gesellschaft f. d. Gesch. der Protestanten in Oesterreich, 1892, 1894, 1896, 1897, 1899; S. Cramer, "Bijdragen tot de Geschiedenis van ons Kerklied en ons Kerkgesang," DB 1900, 71-124; 1902, 1-25; F. Mencik, "Ueber ein Wiedertäufergesangbuch" [Etliche schöne geistliche Lieder und Lobesang von vilen frommen Zaigen. Ausgeschrieben von Melcher Hipscher Anno 1655.] (Prag, 1896, Sitzungsberichte der k. böhm. Gesellschaft der W. 1896, XI); J. Loserth, "Aus dem Liederschatz der mährischen Wiedertäufer," Ztscht des deutschen Vereins f. d. Gesch. Mährens u. Schlesiens XXVII (1925) III/IV, 48-50; K. Rembert, "Die Liederdichtung des sogenannten Anabaptismus," Monatshefte der Comenius-Gesellschaft XV (1906) 139-49; J. P. Classen, "Taufgesinnte Liederdichter," Der Mennonit IX (1956) 100.

Hymnology of the Swiss, French, and South German Mennonites. The Swiss and French Mennonites never published a hymnal of their own, except the Ausbund (q.v., first ed., 1564), until 1955, when they joined in sponsoring the Neues Gemeinschafts-Liederbuch (Basel, 1955). The editorial sponsors (Herausgeber) are listed as the Mennonite Churches in Switzerland and Alsace, the Pilgermission St. Chrischona at Basel, and the Association of State Church "Gemeinschaften" of the Canton of Bern. Samuel Geiser, one of the elders of the Swiss Mennonite Conference, was one of the chief editors of this collection. This hymnal with its 436 hymns is of good quality, including 108 hymns taken directly out of the 1952 edition of the Gesangbuch der Evangelisch-reformierten Kirche der . . . Schweiz.

The Ausbund (q.v., see also Hymnology of the Anabaptists) was used until the 19th century in the Swiss congregations, both Mennonite and Amish, by the congregations in Alsace and France, which were almost exclusively Amish, and by the Amish congregations in South and Middle Germany, the last European editions of this hymnal being issued in 1809 (Basel), 1815 (n.p.), and 1838 (Basel). The 1815 edition bears the title, Christliches Liederbuch der Schweizer Brüder. Between the dated editions of 1564, 1583, and 1622, all without place, and the edition of 1809 six other editions appeared, all without place or date, but three each in the 17th and 18th centuries, publication place for some editions being doubtless Basel. From the 6th edition on the basic number of hymns was 137. The last four editions added an appendix of five hymns and eleven Psalms.

The Mennonite congregations of South Germany began earlier to use the hymnals of the state churches. One of the most popular hymnals, both in Switzerland and adjacent areas, was Lobwasser's book of Psalms (first ed. 1573, after 1700 with many hymns added), while in the Palatinate the hymnal of the Reformed Electoral Palatinate (first ed. 1749) was long used. The first Mennonite hymnal of this area was Christliches Gesangbuch, zunächst für den Gebrauch der evangelischen Mennoniten-Gemeinden in der Pfalz (Worms, 1832), with 383 hymns, sponsored by the conference of this area, and edited largely by Leonhard Weydmann, pastor of the Monsheim Mennonite Church. It appeared in two editions. The edition with the above title was apparently issued by Jakob Ellenberger, pastor of the Friedelsheim congregation, since it has a preface by him. The other edition bears the title Christliches Gesangbuch, zunächst für die Taufgesinnten in der Pfalz. Although many of the hymns were printed with tunes, many were not given tunes. Hence Ellenberger published a lithographed book of tunes in four-part harmony for use with the hymnal. A second hymnal, containing the majority of the hymns in the hymnal of 1832, but with other hymns from other sources, was published by the two congregations of Bildhausen and Rottenbauer in Franconia (northern Bavaria), with the title Christliches Gesangbuch zunächst für Mennoniten. Herausgegeben von der Mennoniten-Brüder-Gemeinschaft in Unterfranken (Würzburg, 1839), with 575 hymns. The introduction to this hymnal refers specifically to the previous use of the state church hymnal: "For a long time the hymnal of the Reformed Electoral Palatinate, published in 1749 at Mannheim and Frankfurt, served us and our forefathers in public services and family worship." The final form of the South German hymnal was Gesangbuch, zum gottesdienstlichen und häuslichen Gebrauch in Evangelischen Mennoniten-Gemeinden (Worms, 1854), with 600 hymns, without music, edited by three preachers (with the help of the hymn writer A. Knapp), J. Molenaar of Monsheim, J. Risser of Sembach, and J. Ellenberger of Friedelsheim. It contained an appendix of 32 pages with prayers for family worship, and an index to the hymn writers, and was reprinted unchanged in 1876 at Kaiserslautern. The tunes were printed at Dürkheim in 1856 in four-part harmony under the title, Vierstimmige Melodien zu dem Gesangbuch zum gottesdienstlichen und häuslichen Gebrauche in evangelischen Mennoniten-Gemeinden, lithographed, reprinted in 1874 at Dürkheim, and again in 1897 at Waiblingen, slightly revised. The next edition of the Gesangbuch, edited in revised form by Christian Neff and a "Gesangbuchkommission," appeared in 1910 at Ludwigshafen with 575 hymns, a new tune-book (Choralbuch) accompanying it. This edition was reissued in 1950 at Ludwigshafen.

The only other hymnbook published in South Germany was the one sponsored by the Amish congregations, Gesangbuch zum Gebrauch bei dem öffentlichen Gottesdienst und der häuslichen Erbauung, zunächst für einen Teil der Mennoniten-Gemeinden beider Hessen, der bayr. Pfalz, Rheinpreussens und des Herzogtums Nassau bestimmt (Wiesbaden, 1843, reprint Regensburg, 1859), with 286 hymns, and an appendix of 102 hymns entitled Gesänge für Religion und Tugend, all set to four-part music. The introduction is at pains to explain why the "old" hymnal, meaning the Ausbund, was no longer serviceable.

Another aspect of the hymnology of Switzerland and South Germany was the publication of small separate collections of new hymns in the late 17th and early 18th centuries. An illustration is: Zwanzig neue geistliche Lieder, Das Erste: von einem Drucker Gesellen Thomas von Imbroich genannt, Aufs neue gedruckt Anno 1758, first edition at least as early as 1699. In at least one instance the Dordrecht Confession was combined with a collection of prayers and a collection of hymns to form a devotional manual, printed in 1686. The title page runs: Christliche Glaubens Bekentnuss . . . wie auch Etliche Christliche Gebätt . . . worbey gefüget Etliche Geistlich Lieder, Alles zu Erbawung, Auffmunterung und Lehr, unser

Jugend zum besten gestellt und geordnet worden. Seven long hymns constitute the hymn section. Another edition of this same book appeared in 1691. One copy in the Goshen College Library contains bound with it the following hymn collections: Das Gebätt von Hans Rösch (Reist?) her, Darbey auch die fünf nachfolgenden Lieder zu finden; Ein Geistliches Lieder-Büchlein, Darinnen Diese zehen folgende neue Geistliche Lieder zu finden (after 1709); Zwanzig neue Geistliche Lieder (1758); Ein Send-Brieff samt einem schönen Gebätt und geistlichen Lied, worbey noch etliche andere Christliche Gebätt . . . Wie auch etliche geistliche Lieder. This section includes Unterricht vom Christlichen Singen just preceding the hymns. The GCL has several additional Sammelband volumes of similar character, one with many small hymn collections and single hymns, so that apparently this type of combination book was popular. It is possible that these "new spiritual hymns," as they are commonly called, were intended to supplement the Ausbund, which had more martyr hymns and fewer "spiritual hymns." It seems most likely that these materials were printed in Basel or Strasbourg from 1660 to 1760. This aspect of Swiss hymnology deserves a thorough study. H.S.B.

Hymnology of the Mennonites in the Netherlands. Anabaptists and Mennonites even in the earliest period sang hymns in their meetings when it was possible to do so. Mostly it was impossible to sing together, because in the period of persecution singing would attract the attention of the government officers, who eagerly tracked down the Anabaptists, and there are a few cases of meetings being surprised by the officers because the singing had betrayed them. But among the earliest Anabaptists many songs (liedekens) were known. Anneken Jans (q.v.) was arrested in January 1539 at Rotterdam, because a "heretical song" that she had sung in the ferryboat had betrayed her. In prison the martyrs often took up a hymn to comfort themselves and each other, and of a number of martyrs it is mentioned that they were singing a hymn while going to the execution places.

As to what kind of hymns they sang no definite answer can be given. Only in two or three cases do we have information. Reytse Aysesz, executed at Leeuwarden in 1574, on the way to his execution began the hymn, "Ic roep U, o Hemelsche Vader aen, Wilt myn geloove stercken" (I call to Thee, heavenly Father, wilt Thou strengthen my faith) (Mart. Mir. D 690, E 1,005). Another martyr sang, "Ic arm scaep aen groener heyde" (I poor sheep on the green heath), which is a well-known medieval song.

Soon there were in circulation a number of hymns composed by the martyrs themselves in prison (as is mentioned of many of them), or composed by others, all unknown poets, to celebrate their martyrdom. These hymns, rhymed versions of their trials and accounts of their sufferings and death, must have been clandestinely printed on separate sheets and circulated shortly after the death of a martyr, as is evident in the case of the "liedeken" on Anneken Jans, which was sung on the streets of Hamburg only a few weeks after her death (1539).

In the second half of the 16th century these single hymns were collected and compiled in songbooks. In 1562-63 a collection of hymns by and about martyrs was published, together with the oldest Dutch martyrbook, Het Offer des Heeren (q.v.). The name of the collection of hymns was Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (q.v.). This Lietboecxken was reprinted together with the Offer at least 10 times (last edition in 1599). Besides these historical hymns another type of hymns, called Schriftuurlijke Liedekens (Scriptural Hymns), or Geestelijke Liedekens (Spiritual Hymns) were used among the Mennonites, and soon pushed aside the martyr songs. As early as 1560 the first hymnary of this type was published by Nicolaes Biestkens (q.v.). It is entitled Veelderhande Liedekens (q.v.). This first edition has been lost, as was also a second edition of 1562; of the following editions of 1566, an undated edition, one of 1569, one of 1579, and one of 1580, copies are still extant. Of a second collection, printed in 1562 by Biestkens and entitled Een nieu Liedenboeck (q.v.), there is only one copy extant found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library. This Nieu Liedenboeck was reprinted at Amsterdam in 1582 by Biestkens under the title Het Tweede Liedenboeck (q.v.) (the second hymnary). Van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 665, E 683) mentions a Rotterdamsch Liedboeck. What kind of hymnary this was is unknown, since no copy of it has been found. These hymnbooks may all have been used in Mennonite congregations. They are all without notes and could be sung according to the melody which is announced at the top of each hymn. In most cases two melodies are given. These melodies are of well-known songs, both secular and spiritual, sometimes of a psalm used in the Reformed Church.

The Dutch Mennonites of the 16th century did not sing psalms as the Calvinists did. Reytse Aysesz about 1570 was accused by a Reformed preacher that whereas they (the Reformed) sang the Biblical Psalms of David, the Mennonites used songs made by man, but Reytse was comforted by the thought that their (Mennonite) hymns were made according to the Scriptures (Mart. Mir. D 686, E 1,001).

Among the authors of these Schriftuurlycke Liedekens are Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, Joost Eeuwouts, Jacques Outerman, Hans de Ries, Claes Ganglofs, Leenaert Clock, Jan Jacobsz, and Pieter Jansz Twisck, as well as a large number of anonymous poets.

In the early 17th century the Veelderhande Liedekens and other old songbooks were largely replaced. New hymnaries were composed and put into use. It is impossible to enumerate all of them, since more than 100 different hymnaries were published between 1582 and 1790. Some of the most important were Hans de Ries, Lietboeck of 1582 (many reprints under varying titles); Carel van Mander, De Gulden Harpe (1599); Leenaert Clock, Het Groote Liedeboeck (1625); Het Gheestelyck Kruydt-Hofken (1637); Het Rijper Liedtboecxken (1637); 't Kleyn Hoorns-Liet-boeck (1644-45); 't Groot Hoorns Liedtboeck (1647); Claes Stapel, Lusthof der Zielen (about 1680, 2d ed. 1682, 3rd ed. 1729); Lusthof des Gemoeds (1732); De Geestelijke Goudschaale, 1st ed. in 1662 at Franeker, 2d ed. 1683 at Leeuwarden,

4th ed. 1751. These songbooks were used in the different branches of the Dutch Mennonites. For example, the Waterlanders used de Ries's hymnal, the Old Flemish van Mander's Gulden Harpe, and the Groningen Old Flemish Lusthof des Gemoeds. Many of these hymnaries did not contain original hymns, but largely borrowed from each other. With the exception of van Mander's hymnbook the poetical quality of these hymns is rather mediocre or less. As is said in the preface of many of these hymnaries they were intended not only for congregational singing, but also for private use, or to be read "for the edification of souls."

As mentioned above, the early Anabaptists and Mennonites did not sing Psalms, but this changed in the 17th century. Quite early, Hans de Ries, a champion of Psalm-singing, had inserted in the 1624 edition of his hymnary all 150 rhymed Psalms after the version of Dathenus, and from then on singing of Psalms became more and more usual. In the Flemish congregation of Amsterdam about 1630 a fine had to be paid every time the preacher allowed any other hymn to be sung but a Psalm (DB 1865, 69). But the clumsy version of Dathenus did not satisfy; so the Lam and Toren congregation of Amsterdam introduced in 1684 a new Psalmbook, rhymed by the Mennonites J. Oudaen, D. R. Camphuyzen, Galenus Abrahamsz, and others. In 1713 the Haarlem congregation replaced Dathenus' version by a psalter rhymed by Vondel, Hooft, Westerbaen, Rooleeuw, and other poets in 1713. Some other congregations introduced either the Amsterdam or the Haarlem Psalter. The Amsterdam Zonist congregation used the Dathenus version until 1762, when it was replaced by a Psalmbook rhymed by the literary association "Laus Deo Salus Populo." This version too was used in a number of Dutch Mennonite congregations. In most cases some other hymnbook was used in addition to the psalter. From the end of the 18th century the singing of Psalms decreased in favor of hymns.

Since the old hymnbooks were no longer available, or were little appreciated, they went out of use, except in a few congregations like Ameland, where De Geestelijke Goudschaale was in use until 1818 (DB 1890, 7) and in Aalsmeer, Giethoorn, and Balk, which used the Kleyn Hoorns Lietboeck—reprinted as late as 1814—until the 19th century, Balk until 1854 (DB 1892, 56, 65 f.) and Aalsmeer even until 1862 (DB 1862, 147). The congregation at Grouw used the hymnal by Stapel (q.v.) until about 1800. A number of new hymnaries appeared, all bearing the traits of that rationalistic time. The congregation of Rotterdam introduced a new hymnary in 1776; the Amsterdam Lamist congregation compiled the Kleine bundel in 1791, the Amsterdam Zonist congregation the Groote bundel in 1796. Hamburg-Altona, then still using hymnaries in the Dutch language, composed the Altonasche Liederen in 1802. Haarlem introduced a new hymnary in 1804, Zwolle one in 1808. All these hymnaries were not only in use in the congregations which had compiled them, but also in other congregations, as was especially a songbook called Uitgezochte Liederen, composed by a committee and published in 1809, which was introduced in about 20 congregations. Most of the hymns of all these hymnaries were borrowed from older songbooks though the words of the hymns occasionally were much altered. Often the same hymns were found in all these songbooks, most of which also contained a number of Psalms. Some Mennonite congregations introduced the Reformed Evangelische Gezangen of 1805.

From about 1850 nearly all these hymnaries were replaced by new ones. After an attempt to get only one hymnary for common use by Dutch Mennonites had miscarried, both Amsterdam and Haarlem compiled new hymnaries, Amsterdam in 1848 (Christelijke Gezangen, 2 vv.) and again 2 vv. in 1895 (Doopsgezinde Liederen), to which a supplement was added in 1916, and Haarlem introduced new hymnaries, Christelijke Kerkgezangen in 1851 and Doopsgezinde Liederen and the Lutheran hymnbook, both in 1895. Both these Amsterdam and Haarlem songbooks came to be used by a number of other congregations, as was a new hymnary introduced in 1893 at Groningen and Deventer, 119 Christelijke Kerkgezangen.

In the meantime a number of Mennonite congregations had put into use a hymnary composed by the Union of Dutch (liberal) Christians (Nederlandsche Protestantenbond), which had been published in 1882, as well as the two hymnaries of the Remonstrants. In 1897 two Mennonite ministers, J. Sepp and H. Boetje, published Gezangen ten gebruike in Doopsgezinde Gemeenten. This hymnary, in 1900 enlarged by an anthology from the Psalms and usually called Leidsche Bundel (q.v.), became the songbook of many congregations, though it was not introduced in all congregations as the authors had hoped.

In 1900 the following hymnals were in use (some congregations used two or even four different hymnbooks): Het Boek der Psalmen (Reformed Psalter) in 82 congregations; Godsdienstige Liederen of the "Protestantenbond" in 31; Leidsche Bundel in 27; Groote Bundel in 26; Evangelische Gezangen (hymns of the Dutch Reformed Church) in 18; Vervolgbundel op de Evangelische Gezangen (appendix to the hymns of the Reformed Church) in 14; Uitgezochte Liederen in 13; Christelijke Liederen II (Amsterdam hymnbook of 1870) in 11; Doopsgezinde Liederen (Haarlem hymnal I and II, of 1895) in 9; Evangelische Gezangen, uitgegeven vanwege de Remonstrantsche Broederschap (Remonstrant hymnaries I and II) in 7; Kleine Bundel (1791) in 6; Christelijke Liederen (Amsterdam hymnbook I of 1870) in 6; Christelijke Gezangen uitgegeven door de Synode der Evangelisch-Luthersche Kerk, 1884 (Haarlem hymnal II of 1895) in 5; Christelijke Kerkgezangen (Haarlem hymnal of 1851) in 5; Het Boek der Psalmen volgens de overzetting van het dichtgenootschap Laus Deo Salus Populo of 1759 in 2; Zwolsche Liederen in 1.

In 1940 these figures were: Godsdienstige Liederen of the "Protestantenbond" in 73 congregations; Vervolgbundel van de Godsdienstige Liederen of the "Protestantenbond" in 60; Leidsche Bundel in 45; Het Boek der Psalmen in 20; Evangelische Gezangen in 7; vervolgbundel op de Evangelische Gezangen in 5; Christelijke Liederen II in 3; Doopsgezinde Liederen I in 3; Christelijke Gezangen, uitgegeven door de Synode der Evangelisch-Luthersche Kerk in 3; Aanhangsel (Appendix) to the Amsterdam hymnary (1916) in 2; Groote Bundel, Kleine Bundel, and Psalms Laus Deo, each in 1.

All these hymnbooks were put out of use in 1944, when a new hymnary, entitled Liederenbundel ten dienste van de Doopsgezinde Broederschap and commonly called Doopsgezinde Bundel, appeared. It came into being by the co-operation of the Mennonites, the Remonstrants, and the Dutch Protestantenbond. The Mennonites use the main body of 250 hymns, followed by a special appendix of 50 hymns, which are not inserted in the Remonstrant and Protestantenbond hymnaries. All Mennonite congregations, except three, introduced this new hymnary.

In the 16th and early 17th century only one hymn was sung at the beginning and one at the close of the meeting, and this remained the custom in conservative groups such as Groningen Old Flemish and Jan-Jacobsz group until the end of the 18th century. About the middle of the 17th century both Lamist and Zonist congregations, obviously influenced by the practice of the Reformed church, sang a hymn at three times. Nowadays most congregations sing a hymn three times during the services, but sometimes also four and five times. From about 1770 the churches gradually installed pipe organs (see Musical Instruments) to accompany the singing of the congregation.

Because the Dutch language continued to be used in worship in the Mennonite congregations of Hamburg-Altona and near by until the end of the 18th century, and in the congregations of East and West Prussia and Danzig until the beginning of the 19th, Dutch Mennonite hymnbooks long continued in use in these areas. Although most of these were imported from the Netherlands, some were expressly printed for these congregations in Prussia, and it is possible that two or three were actually printed there. As early as 1597 Sommige andachtighe ende leerachtige Gheestelicke Liedekens were published at Amsterdam but intended for the Mennonites in Prussia. Obviously they were used in the Frisian congregations. A 1638 edition of this hymnal (published at Haarlem, Holland) was used in the Frisian congregation of Montau, West Prussia. A Pruys Liedt-boeck inhoudende schriftuurlijcke nieuwe Liedekens (Amsterdam, 1604), with an Introduction by I.I. from Danzig, was followed by the Tweede Pruys Liedtboeksken in 1607. A number of Dutch Mennonite hymnals, mentioned before, such as the hymnal of Hans de Ries, the Kleyn Hoorns Lietboeck, and the Lusthof des Gemoeds, were also frequently used in the Prussian congregations. In the correspondence between the Prussian Mennonites and the congregations of Amsterdam and Groningen the request was frequently made to send Dutch hymnbooks to Prussia, and in 1753 (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1600) mention is made of a hymnal for Prussia which was printed in the Netherlands. (For further information on Dutch hymnals in Prussia, see the next article.)

The Flemish congregation of Hamburg-Altona, from 1685, used Gesanghboek of Gesanghen, om op alle feestdagen en vor en na de predicatie in de Vergaderingen te singen (Hamburg, 1685). The Christelijke Gezangen voor de openbaare Godsdienstoeffeningen of 1802, usually called Altonasche Liederen, was also in the Dutch language and printed at Amsterdam. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 759c; DJ 1837, 63-65; DB 1865, 67-94, 153-59; 1867, 72-77; 1887, 86-112; 1900, 71-124; 1902, 1-25; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 248 f., 293 f., 348; idem, Geschiedenis III, 28-37; N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) 110, 112-14, 165, 170, 243, notes 25 and 43.

Hymnology of the Mennonites of West and East Prussia, Danzig, and Russia. In an article entitled "Die Entwicklung des Gemeindegesanges in unsern westpreussischen Gemeinden" (Menn. Bl., April 1931) Abraham Driedger quotes a Danzig Mennonite chronicle for 1780, "In our meetings especially during the past century (17th) there was no singing." Although there were reasons in the days of the "hidden church" for not being too vocal in praising God in order not to attract too much attention to forbidden meetings, the above statement is obviously an exaggeration. The same article states that Hartwich is given credit for the information that the "fine" Mennonites did not sing in their meetings around 1700, while the "coarse" sang "Psalms and other Lutheran songs." This could indicate that the more conservative had some objections to singing in worship. It is also possible that the silence imposed earlier had become a sort of principle.

The same article, however, says that the Mennonites of the Vistula area used Carel van Mander's songbook, entitled De Gulden Harpe, published in 1626, which had as an appendix Bethlehem, Dat is het Broodhuys. . . . It is possible that this book was in use even before this time. It appeared in Holland first in 1599. Another source takes us even further back. In the list of Georg Hansen's Danzig Mennonite elders and ministers appended to the Danzig Mennonite Church Record, 1667-1836, there is a note in connection with one of its first elders, Giesbrecht Franssen, which reports that he died in 1607 "as it is stated in a hymn written in his memory which appears on page 139 of the Jacob Jacobsz Liedeboek and page 116 in the second part." This indicates that Dutch Mennonite hymnbooks were in use in the Danzig Mennonite Church around 1600.

This is very likely the same Liedt-boeck referred to by Hansen which he names the Jacob Jacobsz Liedeboek, which likely was printed in Danzig or for the Danzig congregation. Jacob Jacobsz (q.v.) was elected deacon of the Danzig Mennonite Church in 1606, minister in 1611, and elder in 1640, and died in 1648. In his article Gesangbücher (ML II, 88), Neff speaks of three editions of the Pruys Liedt-boeck. The first one, dated Alkmaer, 1604, by J. J., could be the edition quoted above; the second appeared at Alkmaer in 1607 by S. H., and the third one by H. v.D. (Danzig) without date. Unfortunately Neff does not give his source of information.

In his book, Das Siedlungswerk Niederländischer Mennoniten im Weichseltal (Marburg, 1952), Herbert Wiebe reproduces the title page of Sommigh Leerachtige Gheestelijcke Liedekens published at Haarlem by Hans Passchiers van Wesbusch in 1638.

A copy of this book was present at Montau. Further investigation, although most of the sources have been destroyed or are not accessible, would doubtless produce further evidence that the Prussian Mennonites used the hymnbooks of their Dutch home congregations from the early days of their settlement along the Vistula until the end of the 18th century. A thorough investigation of the hymnology and the role which singing played among the early Prussian Mennonites has never been made. (See the previous article, Hymnology in the Netherlands).

In 1724 the Prussian Mennonites ordered a print of Veelderhande Schriftuurlijke Liedekens Gemaakt uyt het Oude en Nieuwe Testament, zoo als voor desen in Druk (in verscheyde Boeken) geweest zyn. Beneffens nog eenige, die voor deen nooit in Druk geweest zyn. Nu weer op een nieuw te samen gestelt, om in de vergaderinge der Gelovigen te zingen (Amsterdam, 1724). In the preface the publishers state: "The reason which caused us to print this book is not that we do not have enough hymnbooks, but it is because of the convenience. Since various books had to be used it was inconvenient to carry them in a pocket." This would indicate that the Mennonites of Prussia at that time were using several hymnbooks and that they solved this problem and arrived at a unification by selecting from the various books those most frequently used, which they compiled in Veelderhande Schriftuurlijke Liedekens. Under this title (without the "Schriftuurlijke") Nicolaas Biestkens (q.v.) had published a hymnbook in 1560, numerous editions of which appeared in the century and a half following. In 1700 this hymnbook was published at Groningen by Berent Taeitsma, reduced to pocket size, many hymns having been dropped, while others never printed before were added. Some lines were adjusted to the music. The Prussian edition of 1724, printed at Amsterdam, was a reprint of this revised edition of 1700. A second edition was published at Amsterdam in 1752 for the Prussian Mennonites. The editors and publishers state in the preface that the edition of 1724 had been printed in haste, omitting the melody for a number of hymns, and that it was now exhausted. In the new edition they added some melodies in use in their surrounding German communities, omitted some hymns because the melodies were little known, and included other hymns in use, adding an appendix of 14 or 15 hymns. The hymns were arranged, not alphabetically as formerly, but according to topics. The edition consisted of 3,000 copies.

At the middle of the 18th century the change from the Dutch to the German language among the Danzig and Prussian Mennonites was nearly completed. The Dutch Biestkens Bible imported from Holland was replaced by the German Lutheran translation. In the Danzig Mennonite Church Record, 1667-1836, the change from the Dutch to the German language occurs in all entries consistently in 1784. The first German sermon was preached in the Danzig Mennonite Church in 1762, and by 1777 the change was almost complete (Mannhardt, 107). At this time the Dutch hymnbook was replaced by a German hymnal entitled Geistreiches Gesangbuch, zur öffentlichen und besonderen Erbauung der Mennoniten Gemeinde in und vor der Stadt Danzig (Marienwerder, 1780). In the preface the elders, ministers, and deacons state that the book was to a large extent the work of the late Elder Hans van Steen, assisted by Peter Tiessen, Jacob de Veer, and Hans Momber, the latter two furnishing a considerable number of hymns which they had written. Few of the hymns of the Dutch hymnbooks in use, if any, were translated. The editors selected from non-Mennonite hymnals "songs which in doctrine agreed with our faith and if this was not the case they were altered or abbreviated" (Foreword, p. 3). The book consisted of 620 songs and index, an appendix with prayers and another appendix of hymns. J. J. Kanter, Marienwerder, printed 2,000 copies.

In 1851 the Danzig Mennonite Church decided to publish a new hymnbook, prepared by a commission of eight assisting the pastor J. Mannhardt and his ministerial assistant, H. A. Neufeldt. It appeared in 1854 printed by Edwin Groening, Danzig, entitled Gesangbuch zur kirchlichen und häuslichen Erbauung. Für Mennoniten Gemeinden, containing 703 hymns, an appendix of prayers, biographical sketches of the hymn writers, an index of the hymns, and selected Scripture passages. In 1908 a revised edition was prepared by the pastor of the congregation, H. G. Mannhardt, who reduced the number of hymns from 703 to 445, of which approximately 100 were new. It appeared under the same title in 1908 at A. W. Kafemann, Danzig, and again in 1926. The appendix contained prayers and an index.

Even before the Danzig Mennonites published the German hymnal, the Prussian Mennonite congregations changed from Dutch to German, replacing the Pruys Lied-Boeck of 1752 by introducing the German Geistreiches Gesangbuch, worinn eine Sammlung aus denen 150 Psalmen Davids, und auserlesenen alten und neuen Liedern zu finden ist, zur allgemeinen Erbauung und zum Lobe Gottes herausgegeben, printed at Königsberg in 1767 (reprints 1775, 1784, 1794, 1803, 1819, 1829, 1835, 1838, 1843, and 1844, 1845, 1864). The fact that the Heubuden Mennonite Church in 1945 still had copies of the Dutch hymnal of 1752 indicates that the change from Dutch to German came so rapidly that they did not even wait until the old hymnbooks were worn out. In the preface to the German hymnal the editors state, "In order to satisfy the longing [for High German hymns] we have decided to publish the 150 Psalms in a well-known German version, as well as 500 spiritual songs. In this collection there are not only many known Dutch hymns translated into the German, but also many from the Halle, Stargard, Quandt, and Rogall hymnbooks, to which have been added some never printed before." The book contains 505 hymns and 150 Psalms.

Under the influence of the Dutch Reformed tradition the Mennonites of Holland and Prussia used rhymed Psalms for worship purposes. Hartwich (Menn. Bl., April 1931, p. 31) reports that at the turn of the century Psalms were in use among the Mennonites of Prussia. They were Dutch in the version of Dathenus, which were later replaced by the Lobwasser German version of the Psalms. However, the use of the Psalms gradually disappeared, likely under the influences of the surrounding Lutheran population. The second edition of the above hymnal carried only those Psalms which were actually used at that time, but the editor still felt it necessary to apologize for not including all of them. This edition had a preface by G. W. and was printed by D. Chr. Kanter, Königsberg, 1775. The fifth edition (Marienwerder, 1803) has the changed title, Gesangbuch worinn eine Sammlung alter und neuer Lieder zum gottesdienstlichen Gebrauch und zur allgemeinen Erbauung herausgegeben. The editor, signing himself P. S., states that the remaining 58 Psalms had been dropped and that a third appendix of hymns was added, making a total of 545. The sixth edition (Marienwerder, 1819), with the preface signed by J. A., containing 550 hymns, adds another part (Zweiter Theil), making a total of 725 hymns. In the preface to the seventh edition (Elbing, 1829) J. W. states that the second part had been omitted (there are copies with it). In 1835 appeared a "Neue Auflage mit der Siebenten übereinstimmend," printed by Lohde at Thorn and Culm without preface, which also contains the Zweiter Theil. The eighth edition (Marienburg, 1838) reprints the preface to the first edition with a brief additional statement that this was requested, and omits the second part. The ninth edition (Elbing, 1843) retains the first preface, but adds again the Zweiter Theil, while a Graudenz edition of 1845, called "Achte Auflage," reprints the preface of the sixth edition without the Zweiter Theil. In 1864 the tenth edition appeared in Danzig printed by Edwin Groening, with a special preface stating that there was a plan under way to publish a new hymnbook, but since it was not ready and there was a need for some copies an edition of 1,000 was being printed. This was the last Prussian edition of the Gesangbuch which since 1818 (sixth ed.) carried the title, Gesangbuch worin eine Sammlung geistreicher Lieder befindlich.

The Mennonites of Russia had been using this Gesangbuch since their settlement in the Ukraine. In 1844 they reprinted it in Odessa, calling it the tenth edition and the first in Russia. They added the Zweiter Theil, reprinted the preface of the sixth and added their own, signed by B. F. It consisted of 3,000 copies. In 1854 a second edition appeared and in 1859 a third, both printed in Odessa. The preface of the latter states that a total of 15,400 copies had been printed in Russia since 1844. The fourth edition (Odessa, 1867) had a dedicatory poem instead of a special preface. It was followed by undated fifth and sixth editions printed in Leipzig, while the seventh, also undated and printed in Leipzig, was distributed by Jacob Lötkemann, Halbstadt.

At the time when the Mennonites of Russia were about ready to prepare another hymnal the immigrants of 1874 ff. from Russia to the prairie states and Manitoba took with them the old Gesangbuch which had originated in Prussia. The first American edition appeared in 1880, being marked as "Erste Amerikanische Ausgabe," which was followed by a second, a third (1889, when "worin" was dropped from the title), and further editions (1895, 1903, 1907, 1916, and 1918), all printed at Elkhart. The Old Colony Mennonites moving from Canada to Mexico reprinted it there at Cuauhtemoc, Chihuahua, in 1940 and 1943, with five editions, a total of 32,000 copies, at Scottdale (1926, 1937, 1944, 1949, 1954). This book is still the hymnal of the Old Colony and Sommerfelder groups in Canada and Mexico.

The bibliographical history of the Geistreiches Gesangbuch, tracing it back to its first appearance in the German form and its Dutch predecessor as Veelderhande Liedekens to the Reformation in Holland, has been sketched in the preceding paragraphs; however, the extent to which the content of the hymns and its theology and spirit were retained has not been investigated. It is apparent that the Gesangbuch deserves as much attention along these lines as the Ausbund of the Swiss tradition.

A special hymnbook commission of the General Conference of Mennonite congregations in Russia prepared a new book which appeared under the title Gesangbuch zum gottesdienstlichen und häuslichen Gebrauch in den Mennoniten-Gemeinden Russlands, printed by P. Neufeld, Neu-Halbstadt, 1892. The editors state that they have printed many of the hymns from the former Gesangbuch, but have added a considerable number. The total of hymns was 725. The next edition was printed in Odessa in 1896 and distributed by David Epp, Chortitza. The fourth edition was printed and published with a brief additional preface by Peter Neufeld, Halbstadt 1903, in a smaller format, and by H. Braun, Neu-Halbstadt 1904, in a larger format. The fifth edition appeared in 1914, published by A. J. Unruh, Tiege; H. Braun, Halbstadt; and H. Born, Chortitza, in an edition of a smaller format with a special preface. The Mennonites migrating to Canada after World War I reprinted the songbook in 1929 in Germany, without a preface, stating that this was the fifth edition.

By 1865 the Prussian Mennonites felt that their old Gesangbuch was not quite meeting the needs of the day. A special commission was charged with the responsibility of preparing a new hymnbook, which appeared at Danzig in 1869 under the title Gesangbuch für Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Kirche und Haus. The second edition (Danzig, 1873) followed without change. The book consisted of 700 hymns with the traditional collection of prayers and an index of hymns and melodies. The fourth edition (1901) with the special preface contained 35 additional religious folk songs and Psalms from the Prussian Mennonite Choralbuch which had been published in 1898. Forty new melodies were added in the enlarged edition. Its preface shows that the new Gesangbuch had not only found acceptance among the Mennonites of Prussia, but that it was also used in Russia and America. The first three editions consisted of 8,000 copies, the fourth and fifth (Elbing, 1922) of 6,000.

The chief compilers and distributors of Mennonite hymnbooks in Danzig, Prussia, Poland, and Russia were originally the congregation of Danzig and the congregations of West Prussia, the hymnal of the latter being the most widely used. The Mennonites of Poland and Austria seem never to have printed their own hymnal, but relied on the Prussian hymnbook, as the Mennonites of Russia had in the early days. The Mennonites of the Samara and Trakt settlements in Russia probably used either the Prussian or the Russian songbook; although there exists a collection of hymns under the title, 120 Kirchenlieder zum Gebrauch in mennonitischen Schulen (Köppenthal, 1876), with ciphers, for use by the Mennonites of the Trakt settlement. As early as 1859 Elder David Hamm (q.v.) had a Choral-Buch für den Kirchen-Gesang der Mennoniten-Gemeinde an der Wolga printed in Danzig with ciphers, to be used in their congregational singing.

One of the best-known religious poets of the Mennonites of Russia was Bernhard Harder, whose Geistliche Lieder und Gelegenheitsgedichte were edited by Heinrich Franz, Sr., and published in 1880 (1,208 pp.), from which Peter Harder, a son of the author, selected some songs for a publication entitled Kleines Liederbuch. Geistliche Gelegenheitslieder, published by J. Friesen (Tiege, 1902.)

The Mennonite Brethren of Russia originally used T. Köbner's Glaubensstimme, the German Baptist hymnal. Since 1890 they also used Heimatklänge, and also Frohe Botschaft and Evangeliumslieder, both by E. Gebhardt, as well as the Zionslieder and others. Heimatklänge, first published in Russia for the Mennonites by Isaak Born at Halbstadt, was taken over in 1903 by the Raduga Publishing House of Halbstadt. Seven editions appeared in Russia, after which A. Kroeker published the eighth revised edition in America, in the year 1924, which was followed by a second one (1939?) with notes. In Russia as well as in Canada the three hymnals, Heimatklänge, Glaubensstimme, and Frohe Botschaft, were often bound together in one volume, mostly without notes. J. Ewert transcribed the notes of the melodies to Gebhardt's Frohe Botschaft into ciphers, which were published in Die Melodien der Frohen Botschaft (Gnadenfeld, 1884). Born published a monthly periodical with songs with notes for use in Mennonite homes and congregations.

In addition to the regular hymnals, from time to time other aids for singing have been in use in Mennonite congregations, homes, and communities. The Choralbuch (q.v., first edition 1898 in West Prussia, reprinted in 1935) was in use in various forms by the Mennonites of Prussia, Russia, and America. The Bethel College Historical Library has many dozens of handwritten songbooks with ciphers which were used by the Mennonites of Russia and in the early days in America. Interestingly a little booklet of hymn texts was printed to accompany the appendix to the West Prussian Choralbuch of 1898, and was reprinted three times, 1903, 1922, 1929, with the title Texte der geistlichen Volkslieder und Chorgesänge im Anhange dis Mennonitischen Choralbuchs, with hymn texts numbered 703 to 742. Wilhelm Neufeld (and K.W.) edited Choralbuch, dem neuen mennonitischen Gesangbuche entsprechend, zum Gebrauch in Kirche, Schule und Haus (Neuhalbstadt, 1897).

In the days of persecution and martyrdom the experiences, faith, steadfastness, and suffering of the Anabaptists were recorded in the form of poems and found their way into early hymnals. This practice of recording the life, work, and faith of outstanding leaders was continued even in more peaceful times. Such a poem written at the close of a life would sometimes be sung as a hymn at the funeral. It has already been pointed out that the life of Giesbrecht Franssen was narrated in a song which was printed in the Jacob Jacobsz Liedeboek. This practice was continued among the Mennonites of Prussia. For example, when Hans van Steen (q.v.), a well-known elder, died, his life and activities were commemorated in a song written for the occasion. Poems were sung to known melodies and were written for various anniversaries such as silver weddings, anniversaries of ministers, etc. Later in many cases familiar hymns were printed for the occasion. Numerous copies have been preserved in the Bethel College Historical Library. The West Prussian Mennonite congregations also had smaller songbooks for special occasions, for example: Einige Trauungs- und Begräbniss-Gesänge von alten und neuen Liedern, die von mehreren Autoren zusammengesetzt und auf verchiedene Fälle zu einem gottgeheiligten Singen gewidmet sind (Elbing, 1842), with 43 hymns; Christliche Trauungs- und Begräbniss-Gesänge nebst Tisch und andern geistlichen Liedern. Zum Gebrauch in Mennoniten-gemeinden besonders derer in Preussen und Russland. Vermehrte und veränderte Auflage (Danzig, 1888), with 83 hymns; Lieder zum Gebrauch für Missionsgottesdienste (Heubuden, 1896), with 85 hymns; Sammlung christlicher Verlobungs-, Trauungs-, Jubliäums- und Begräbnis-Gesänge (Elbing, 1908); and Vierundneunzig Lieder für Missionsgottesdienste. It is possible that many of them were in general use and not always specifically printed for the Mennonite congregations. They evidently were needed to fill in gaps in the standard hymnals. No comparable Mennonite publications appeared in America, but Der Sänger am Grabe (Philadelphia) was popular among the Franconia Mennonites through the second half of the 19th century.

"A Frequency List of Hymns in Mennonite Hymn Books" compiled by Walter H. Hohmann shows that the following hymns appear in at least 15 Mennonite hymnbooks out of 24 including all German hymnals in Europe and North America. This gives us an indication as to which of the hymns have been most commonly used among the Mennonites in various countries in a period of over two centuries. They are "Ach bleib' mit Deiner Gnade"; "Allein Gott in der Höh' sei Ehr' "; "Aus tiefer Not schrei' ich zu Dir"; "Befiehl du deine Wege"; "Es ist gewisslich an der Zeit"; "Gott des Himmels und der Erden"; "Herr Jesu Christ, Dich zu uns wend' "; "Komm, o komm, Du Geist"; "Liebster Jesu, wir sind hier"; "Lobe den Herren, den mächtigen König"; "Mache dich, mein Geist, bereit"; "Mir nach, spricht Christus, unser Held"; "Nun danket alle Gott"; "Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme"; "Was Gott tut, das ist wohlgetan"; "Werde munter, mein Gemüte"; "Wie schön leucht't uns der Morgenstern" (Outlines in Hymnology, 53 ff.).

The hymnbooks of the Prusso-Russian tradition were originally mostly without notes or ciphers and the melodies were transmitted from generation to generation by tradition. The introduction of notes and ciphers came at the beginning of the past century when individuals and groups began to copy melody books for use in home and choir singing. This led to the publishing of special choralbooks for use in school, at home, and in congregational singing. In Prussia the tunes were transcribed by means of the commonly used notes, while in Russia a certain cipher system was in use. The origin of both and their relationship in Mennonite use have not been investigated.

Four-part singing in Mennonite congregations is also of a rather recent date. It started with the introduction of hand-copied collections of songs with notes and ciphers and the publication of the choralbooks (see Choralbuch). Four-part singing in congregations was gradually introduced through choirs (q.v.), which were first school or community choirs and gradually found their place in the congregational worship. Just as in the case of the use of the musical instruments in Mennonite worship this innovation was not accepted without resistance. Now four-part congregational singing is accepted in all Mennonite congregations except the older conservative groups such as the Old Colony Mennonites.

This is a brief summary of the hymnbooks that have been compiled and used by the Mennonites in Prussia and Russia. No study has been made of the selective process when a new hymnal was to be produced or of the change in the spiritual and theological content of the hymns that has taken place through the centuries. There is possibly no other record that would lend itself as well to a study of the theological influences which the Mennonites have undergone and the views which they have held as the hymnals collected in our historical libraries. They reflect accurately, second only to the devotional books used, the source of their spiritual nourishment. Another valuable research project would be the effect of the change from one language to another upon the spiritual life of the Mennonites as it took place in Prussia and later in America. C.K.

H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinden (Danzig, 1919); Wolkan, Lieder (Berlin, 1903); H. P. Krehbiel, History of the General Conference of the Mennonites of North America I, 155, 174-79; II, 176, 391; Lester Hostetler, Handbook to the Mennonite Hymnary (Newton, 1949); Bruno Ewert, "Geschichtliches aus der Mennonitengemeinde Heubuden-Marienburg," Gem.-Kal., 1940, 48, F. C. Wieder, De Schriftuurlijke Liedekens (The Hague, 1900); A. Driedger, "Die Entwicklung des Gemeindegesanges in unsern westpreussischen Gemeinden," Menn. Bl. (January 1931) 30; S. Cramer, "Bijdragen tot de geschiedenis van ons kerklied en ons kerkgezang," DB 1900, 71; Catalogus Amst.; Danzig Church Record, 1667-1836; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 117 ff.; R. Jacobsen, Carel van Mander (1548-1606), Dichter en Prozaschrijver (Rotterdam, 1906); Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk Niederländischer Mennoniten im Weichseltal (Marburg, 1952); G. Kalff, Gesch. der Nederl. Letterkunde III, 387-413; W. H. Hohmann, Outlines in Hymnology with Emphasis on Mennonite Hymnology (1941); ML II, 86-91, 652 f.

Hymnology of the American Mennonites.

A. THE MENNONITE CHURCH (MC), INCLUDING THE AMISH. (1) German Hymnals. The Early Swiss and Palatine Mennonite immigrants to Pennsylvania brought with them the ancient Swiss Mennonite hymnal, the Ausbund (q.v.), first published in 1564 in Switzerland. This book was in common use in the early days. An American edition of the book was soon needed, and was the first Mennonite book published in America for Mennonite use. It was published by Saur at Germantown in 1742, and again in 1751, 1767, and 1785. At Lancaster, Pa., it was first published in 1815, reappearing there a total of eight times, last in 1912. Further editions were published by the Old Order Amish congregations of Lancaster County with the place given as "Lancaster County" in 1935, 1941, 1949, 1952, with an edition at Kutztown, Pa., in 1922. John F. Funk published editions at Elkhart in 1880, 1905, and 1913, obviously for the Amish of the Midwest. The Ausbund went out of use in Mennonite congregations early in the 19th century; since that time it has been used almost exclusively by the Old Order Amish congregations of Pennsylvania and west. The Alsatian, Bavarian, and Hessian Amish who settled in Ohio, Ontario, and Illinois from 1824 on brought the Ausbund with them (last European edition at Basel in 1838) and may also have purchased some of the Lancaster editions.

The American editions of the Ausbund all carry significant additional materials beyond the European editions as follows: a total of 140 hymns rather than 137, an index of hymns by first lines, an index of hymns which can be sung to the same tune, the Confessio, Oder Bekantnuss of Thomas von Imbroich (19 pp.), Ein warhafftiger Bericht, von den Brüdern im Schweitzerland in dem Zürcher Gebiet, wegen der Trübsalen welche über sie ergangen seyn um des Evangeliums willen (38 pp.), and an appendix called Anhang von fünff schönen geistlichen Liedern (40 pp.), first added in 1767, but becoming "sechs" (six) hymns in 1785.

Even before the Revolutionary War, the Mennonite congregations began to use other hymnbooks, particularly one of the Reformed Church, which was called Ambrosii Lobwasser's Neu-Vermehrtes Gesangbuch and was popular among the Mennonites in Switzerland in the 18th and early 19th centuries. The first American edition was published at Germantown in 1753, a second edition in 1763. A number of clean, unused copies of the 1763 edition of this Reformed hymnbook were found by the author in the attic of the Groffdale Mennonite Church in Lancaster County, in 1925, mute evidence of their early use there. That various non-Mennonite hymnbooks, in particular the Reformed, as well as the old Ausbund, were used in Pennsylvania as late as the turn of the 19th century is indicated by a letter written in 1821 by Deacon Martin Mellinger to relatives in Germany (MQR 1931, 57 ff.), which tells about the conditions leading to the preparation and publication of an official Lancaster Mennonite hymnbook in 1803-4. Mellinger says: "And now I want to tell you how it went when the first book was to be printed. Since we had all sorts of hymnbooks, the old Swiss songbooks [Ausbund] and Reformed hymnbooks [Lobwasser], and not enough of what we had, our brethren decided to have a hymnbook printed for ourselves. Brethren and choristers were to select beautiful and fitting hymns, after which they were to be collected and given over to three, four, or five men. These men were to select enough of the hymns which had been collected so that the hymnbook would not be too large. After a time two Skippack brethren [Franconia Conference] came together with two of our leading bishops in my house to examine the hymns which had been collected. The Skippack brethren, since they have a large and strong church as well as a large district and are well trained in singing, had collected enough hymns for a complete hymnbook and had taken 3,000 subscriptions in advance. We also had many hymns from Virginia, from Jacob's Creek [Westmoreland Co., Pa.], and from our vicinity, which were to go into the book. So it was feared that the book would become too large. In addition our brethren wanted to include a number of psalms and notes. In short, the difference was so great that the Skippack brethren said that their hymns had been handed in by so many brethren and dared not be omitted, and so many had already subscribed, and there was a lengthy discussion. The second day the Skippack brethren said that they were only delegates, and they saw no other way than to have their book [Die Kleine Geistliche Harfe, 1803] printed in Germantown where they had a good printer and bookbinder, which was so handy for them that they could look after everything, and we could print ours [Ein Unpartheyisches Gesangbuch, 1804] in Lancaster. And so the outcome was that they had as many printed as we. But that made no difference to us or them, for we love one another, and we visit them and they visit us every year. And still it is a pity that it had to be so. For many years many families have been moving to Virginia, Jacob's Creek, and Canada, and each has his hymnbook and then they have different hymnbooks when they come together. Although you will doubtless know most of the hymns in the books, you will probably find many beautiful and valuable hymns especially in the last appendix, which are unfamiliar to you and have never yet appeared in print" (MQR V, 1931, 56 f.). Actually, 56 per cent of the Lancaster hymns appear in the Franconia hymnal, while 48 per cent of the hymns of the larger Franconia hymnal appear in the Lancaster hymnal.

The first original Mennonite hymnbook edited and published in America was the Franconia Conference hymnal, Die Kleine Geistliche Harfe der Kinder Zions (Germantown 1803, 472 pp., further editions as follows: Germantown 1811 and 1820, Northampton 1834, Doylestown 1838, Lancaster 1870, Elkhart 1904). It had 40 select Psalms in a first section, followed by 474 hymns (475 from the second edition on) in a second section under a new title, Sammlung alter und neuer Geistreicher Gesänge. An appendix of 20 hymns, added in the second edition, grew to 34 hymns by 1870. It had no imitators or condensations as did the Lancaster hymnal. However, when the Church Hymnal, Mennonite, was published in 1927 a special edition was furnished with a German appendix of 135 hymns (56 pp.) chosen from the Harfe by Bishop Abram G. Clemmer of the Franconia Conference. As late as 1952 1,000 copies of this German appendix were printed and bound in with the Hymnal for Franconia use.

The first edition of the Lancaster Conference hymnal, called Ein Unpartheyisches Gesangbuch (the word Ein was dropped after the second edition), was published at Lancaster in 1804 as a good-sized book of 511 pages. It contained two parts: first 62 select Psalms set to music; second a selection of 390 hymns with a new title page, Ein Neues, Unpartheyisches Gesangbuch zum allgemeinen Gebrauch des wahren Gottesdienstes. Auf Begehren der Brüderschaft der Mennonisten Gemeinen, aus vielen Liederbüchern gesammelt mit einem dreyfachen Register versehen. Later editions added numerous additional hymns in the form of three appendices (1808, first appendix, 35 hymns; 1820, second appendix, 32 hymns; 1829, third appendix, 14 hymns). The compiling committee states that several were selected from the martyr hymns of the earlier church hymnal, meaning the Ausbund; actually 64 hymns (45 per cent of the Ausbund total) were taken from it, amounting to 17 per cent of the 390 basic hymns in the book. It was apparently the only Mennonite hymnal, European or American, which took over any substantial number of the hymns of the Ausbund). This hymnal went through 14 more editions 1808-87, all at Lancaster with a late edition in 1903 at the same place. Mellinger states that the earlier editions were for 4,000 copies each. The hymnal was published again in 1923 and 1941 in a special edition for the Old Order Amish and other branches in Lancaster County which still use the book. It also seems to have been used in Southwestern Pennsylvania, in Ontario, and in Virginia, at least for a time.

In 1839 a condensed version of the Lancaster hymnal, containing 102 of its hymns, small format, was published at Canton, Ohio, printed by "Peter Kaufmann and Co.," under the title Ein Unpartheyisches Gesang-Buch, zum allgemeinen Gebrauch des Wahren Gottesdienstes, probably for the newly established Mennonite congregations in Eastern Ohio. The Gemeinschaftliche Liedersammlung (Berlin, Ont., 1836), most likely edited by Benjamin Eby (q.v.), also small format, took two thirds of its 205 hymns from the Lancaster hymnal and most of the rest from the Franconia Kleine Geistliche Harfe, omitting many stanzas. It was reprinted eight times at Berlin (Kitchener) (1838, 1841, 1849, 1857, 1883, 1892, 1908, 1918), twice at Lancaster (1860, 1870), and once at Scottdale (1950). In 1860 another condensation of the Lancaster Unpartheyisches Gesangbuch with 152 hymns was printed by John Baer's Sons in Lancaster "for the publisher" under the title, Eine Unpartheiische Liedersammlung, small format, which was reprinted eight times by Baer's (1864, 1867, 1870, 1876, 1886, 1891, 1900, 1905), twice at Elkhart (1911, 1929), and eight times at Scottdale 1917, 1924, 1929, 1936, 1941, 1942, 1945, 1954). It is still used by the Old Order Mennonites of Lancaster County and the Old Order Amish ("das dünne Büchlein," in contrast to the Ausbund, "das dicke Buch"). This hymnal was published in a revised larger edition with 309 hymns, still small format, by S. D. Guengerich (q.v.), an Old Order Amish layman of Amish, Iowa, in 1892 (printed at Elkhart), which used somewhat less than half of the hymns of the older book, with many other hymns, but carried the same title with the addition, "Revidiert und vermehrt" (revised and enlarged). It was reprinted twice at Elkhart (1907, 1916), twice at Arthur, Ill. (1928, 1940), and once at Scottdale (1954). It has been used exclusively by the Old Order Amish in the Midwest and is still used in some places. Sometime before 1929 Guengerich published a 16-page booklet of 12 selections from it entitled Etliche Schöne Lieder. The Unparteiisches Liederbuch of the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite (Elkhart, 1906, Scottdale, 1915), small format, 353 hymns, has no connection with any of the above hymnals.

Three additional German hymnbooks of the Mennonite Church (MC) deserve notice. John F. Funk published in 1871 at Elkhart (later editions 1877, 1880, 1883, 1885, 1889) Die allgemeine Lieder-Sammlung zum privat und öffentlichen Gottes-Dienst mit Fleiss zusammengetragen. It had 329 hymns (2nd ed., 330) and an English Appendix of 23 hymns (1880 ed., 44 hymns). A German appendix of 19 hymns (Anhang) was added in 1877. This same hymnal was published in 1901 at Belleville, Pa., under the title Eine Sammlung von Schöne Lieder zum Gebrauch bei dem Gottesdienst, evidently for the Amish Mennonites of this community. It was reprinted in 1912 at Scottdale (Eine Sammlung von Schönen Liedern) and again in 1931, "With an appendix arranged and enlarged by a committee of the Amish Mennonite Church [tr. from the German] H. S. Yoder, C. W. Bender, J. B. Miller," all of the Conservative Amish Church near Grantsville, Md. The appendix contained German hymns numbered 331-80 (copyright by J. B. Miller) and the English appendix of 44 hymns of the Allgemeine Liedersammlung, edition of 1880. Deutsches Lieder- und Melodienbuch mit einem Anhang englischer Lieder zum Gebrauch in der Gemeinde, der Sonntagschule und dem Familienkreis (Elkhart, 1895, reprint Scottdale, 1926) was edited by a committee composed of J. S. Hartzler, C. Z. Yoder, J. S. Coffman, John Horsch, A. B. Kolb, W. P. Coffman, and John F. Funk. The preface states that it was published at the request of several conferences. It was the last of the German hymnals of the Mennonite Church (MC). Its English appendix reprinted the 457 hymns of the Hymns and Tunes (1890).

In 1855 Samuel K. Cassel edited and published at Skippackville, Pa. (Franconia Conference district), Der Christliche Sänger, eine Sammlung der vornehmsten und gebräuchlichsten Lieder zum Gebrauch des öffentlichen und privat Gottesdienstes für alle heilsuchende Seelen jeder Christlichen Benennung, small format, with 228 hymns. The family of Abraham A. Meyer (d. 1877) published after his death Christliche Lieder gedichtet und zum Theil gesammelt von Abraham A. Meyer an der Deep Run in Bedminster Taunschip, Bucks County, Pa. (Milford Square, 1877), small format, with 46 hymns, 28 by the author. The executors of Daniel Kreider published after his death Hinterlassene Lieder-Sammlung (Lancaster, 1865) with 13 original hymns, small format. George Funk, of Bowling Green, Clay Co., Ind., published The Little Hymn Book, A Selection of Hymns from Different Authors (n.d., 1864), with 23 hymns, small format. None of these four hymnals was of any historical consequence.

All of the above hymnals were without notes, except the Deutsches Lieder- und Melodienbuch, since the Mennonites and Amish up to the end of the 19th century generally (with increasing exceptions) sang one-part music only, and objected to published notes in their regular church hymnals. The only exception was a few tunes for the Psalms in the Franconia and Lancaster hymnals. All singing in church was a cappella, of course, since musical instruments in the church services were forbidden.

(2) English Hymnals. The English hymnals of the Mennonite Church (MC) began with a small format book published at Harrisonburg, Va., in 1847, entitled A Selection of Psalms, Hymns, and Spiritual Songs. From the Most Approved Authors, Suited to the Various Occasions of Public Worship and Private Devotion of the Church of Christ by a Committee of Mennonites [Joseph Funk, David Hartman, Joseph Wenger], with 363 hymns. It was reprinted by Joseph Funk at Singers Glen (q.v.), Va., six times (1851, 1855, 1859, 1868, 1872, 1877) at Lancaster four times (1862, 1864, 1869, 1875), at Elkhart three times (1880, 1882, 1884), and at Scottdale in 1948. In 1851 the title was changed from A Selection to A Collection and the number of hymns increased to 402, with a German appendix of 27 hymns, which grew to 37 in 1855, and changed to an English appendix of 48 hymns in 1875. This was the only English hymnal of the church until 1890, when Hymns and Tunes appeared at Elkhart. Joseph Funk's Harmonia Sacra (first published in 1816 as Die allgemein nützliche Choral-Music at Harrisonburg, Va., then in 1832 in English as A Compilation of Genuine Church Music, called Harmonia Sacra with the fifth edition in 1851) did not become a regular church hymnal, since it was in the long (horizontal) singing-school format and had three-part harmonizations (four-part harmonizations introduced by 1871). It did, however, furnish many of the tunes for the little English hymnal and was very popular. Called the New Harmonia Sacra in its 15th edition (1876), it is still being printed (21st edition 1952). A similar book was the Philharmonia compiled by M. D. Wenger and published at Elkhart in 1875 (reprint in 1881) under a double title in English and German: The Philharmonia, a collection of Tunes, Adapted to public and private worship, containing tunes for all the hymns in the English Mennonite Hymn Book, the Gemeinschaftliche, Unparteiische and Allgemeine Liedersammlungen, the Unparteiische Gesangbuch, and the Mennonitische Gesangbuch, with Instructions and Explanations in English and German, also English and German Texts to most of the Tunes, Metrical Indexes, etc., including a greater variety of Meters of Church Music than any other work of the Kind now Published. Compiled by Martin D. Wenger. (The "all" in this title was an overstatement.) An English Sunday-school hymnal, prepared by C. H. Brunk of Virginia, published at Elkhart in 1883 (reprints 1884, 1888) under the title Bible School Hymns and Sacred Songs for Sunday Schools and Other Religious Services, 40 pp., was really a hymnal for children. A similar book, The Christian Harp and Sabbath School Songster, designed for the use of the Social Religious Circle, Revivals and the Sabbath School, published in 1866 jointly by Ruebush & Kieffer of Singers Glen, Va., and H. B. Brenneman of Bremen, Ohio (printed by Joseph Funk's Sons at Singers Glen), has also been attributed to C. H. Brunk (Menn. Cycl. Dict., 44).

The first American Mennonite hymnal with printed tunes (for about one half of the hymns) was Hymns and Tunes for Public and Private Worship, and Sunday Schools Compiled by a Committee [H. S. Rupp, Samuel Shank, Emanuel Suter, C. H. Brunk, J. S. Coffman] (Elkhart, 1890), with 457 hymns and 216 tunes, sponsored by the Virginia and Indiana Mennonite Conferences. It was a transition hymnal between the German and the English books, especially in the Franconia and Lancaster Conferences, but was displaced in turn by the Church and Sunday School Hymnal of 1902.

The fully official English hymnbook of the Mennonite Church (MC) began in 1902 with the Church and Sunday School Hymnal, A Collection of Hymns and Sacred Songs, Appropriate for Church Services, Sunday Schools, and General Devotional Exercises. Compiled and Published under the Direction of a Committee appointed by Mennonite Conferences (Elkhart, Ind., and Freeport, Ill., 1902) with 412 hymns and a German appendix of 50 hymns. It also appeared in a word edition without music. It was reprinted at Scottdale in 1911 and 1926 and a number of times since, and in 1911 given a supplement (Church and Sunday School Hymnal Supplement), which increased the number of hymns to 532. (Selections from Church and Sunday School Hymnal was issued at Scottdale in 1911.) It was finally replaced in 1927 by Church Hymnal, Mennonite, A Collection of Hymns and Sacred Songs, Suitable for Use in Public Worship, Worship in the Home, and all General Occasions, J. D. Brunk, Musical Editor, S. F. Coffman, Hymn Editor, Published by approval of Mennonite General Conference, First Edition Fifteenth Thousand. Printed in Both Shaped and Round Notes (Scottdale, 1927). This standard hymnal, with 657 hymns, has gone through thirteen editions, with a total of 120,000 copies issued to 1956. However, the Church and Sunday School Hymnal of 1902 continues to be reprinted and enjoys a substantial patronage, with probably 80 per cent of the sales of the Church Hymnal of 1927; from 1925 to 1954, 73,000 were printed. Select Hymns and Gospel Songs Taken from the Church Hymnal for Use in Conferences and Special Meetings, with 77 hymns, appeared first in 1929, was issued in an enlarged edition with 132 hymns in 1934, and reached its final form in 1953 with 138 hymns, with the title Selections from Church Hymnal for Use in Conference, Special Meetings, with a total printing of 20,000.

To meet the demand for somewhat lighter music for Sunday-school use, the Mennonite Publishing House, using manuscript delivered by the Music Committee of the Mennonite General Conference, has published the following songbooks: Life Songs (1916) with 271 hymns and Life Songs No. 2 (1938) with 343 hymns, both books edited by S. F. Coffman, and Songs of the Church (1953) with 274 hymns, edited by Walter Yoder. The latter book contains numerous chorales and is definitely of a higher type than Life Songs. Selections from Life Songs No. 2 was issued in 1943 with 122 numbers. Sheet Music of Heaven, compiled by C. F. Derstine, published by the compiler, was printed at Scottdale in 1925 and 1926, with 300 hymns as a Sunday-school type of book, and reached a total of 10,000 copies printed. Life Songs appeared in five editions in 1916-30 with ca. 20,000 copies, Life Songs No. 2 in eleven editions, 1938-50, with 96,000 copies, and Songs of the Church in one edition with 15,000 copies.

Three hymnbooks for children have been published at Scottdale: Children's Hymns and Songs in 1924, with 143 hymns (no tunes), not officially sponsored; Songs of Cheer for Children, A Collection of Hymns and Songs Suitable for use in the Primary and Junior departments of our Sunday Schools, Authorized by Mennonite General Conference, Compiled by Music Committee (1929), with 155 hymns (152 tunes); and Junior Hymns for Juniors in Church, Sunday School, and Summer Bible School (1947) with 157 hymns and 146 three-part tunes, edited by Walter Yoder. Songs of Cheer has had seven printings with a total of 41,000 copies.

No careful study has yet been made of the sources of the hymn selections in either the German or English hymnals of the Mennonite Church (MC). However, it is clear that the English hymnals contain almost exclusively standard English and American hymns, supplemented by the American Gospel songs of the late 19th (with considerable influence from Ira D. Sankey's Gospel Songs Nos. 1-5) and early 20th centuries. Very few hymns have been contributed by Mennonite writers. Unfortunately very few of the standard German chorales have found their way into the English hymnals, in contrast to the hymnals of the General Conference Mennonite Church and the Mennonite Brethren Church, although good translations have been available.

In a class by itself is Amische Lieder, written and compiled by Joseph W. Yoder (published by the Yoder Publishing Company, Huntingdon, Pa., n.d., 1942). This book contains 114 pages, with 97 hymns, 38 of which are taken from the Ausbund (in each case 3 stanzas only) and set to its historic tune (one part only) which Yoder wrote down from actual singing by an Amish song leader. The remaining 59 hymns are taken from what Yoder calls the "Dine Bückley" (thin book), the Unparteiische Liedersammlung, which is also used in certain Amish services and sung with "faster tunes," also not printed in the book, and for which Yoder has transcribed the music. Yoder's avowed purpose is to help the Amish to conserve their hymn tunes and to contribute toward uniformity in the various Amish communities. A 14-page section, "Rudiments," closes the book.

B. The General Conference Mennonite Church (1) German Hymnals. The first hymnal of this group, the Gesangbuch zum Gottesdienstlichen und Häuslichen Gebrauch in Mennoniten Gemeinden (Philadelphia, 1873), was a republication of the hymnal of the South German Mennonites of 1856 (with the word "Evangelisch" dropped from the title), with its 600 hymns, but without 30 pages of prayers, and with the addition of an appendix of 22 hymns apparently chosen by the committee which the conference had commissioned to prepare a hymnal. It was reprinted in a "second improved edition" at Berne in 1885 with exactly the same content. Meanwhile those congregations in the General Conference which had come from Russia (1874 ff.) continued to use for some time the Gesangbuch in Welchem eine Sammlung geistreicher Lieder befindlich, zur allgemeinen Erbauung und zum Lobe Gottes, which they had used in Russia and which was reprinted in Elkhart, first in 1880 and seven times later (—, 1889, 1895, 1903, 1907, 1916, 1918), at Scottdale five times (1926, 1937, 1944, 1949, 1954, total 31,800 copies), and at least twice in Mexico (1940, 1943); and is still in use among the most conservative Mennonites in Canada and in Mexico. The General Conference successfully sought to unite, in church music, its eastern and western wings in the United States by issuing with notes a revised edition of the 1873-85 Gesangbuch under the title Gesangbuch mit Noten (Berne, 1890) with 600 hymns, of which it had only about half in common with the book of 1873, although it used all the 24 categories of the table of contents of that book. A total of some 50,000 copies of this popular book were distributed in its 15 editions (1890 twice, 1893, 1896, 1898, 1901, 1906, 1908, 1911, 1913, 1914, 1920 [?], 1925, 1927, 1936) and an edition of 1906 by the Mennonite Publishing Company at Elkhart, Ind., for the Amish churches. It was replaced, for the German-speaking congregations, in 1942 by the Gesangbuch der Mennoniten (Rosthern, Sask., 1942) with 550 hymns, prepared by a special hymnal commission of the Canadian Conference, but published by the General Conference, which was reprinted in 1944, 1947, and 1949, for a total of 20,000 copies. An appendix, Anhang zum Gesangbuch, with 60 additional hymns was published, which led to an edition of the main hymnal called Ausgabe mit Anhang (third edition, Newton, 1953). The appendix (Anhang) could also be purchased separately.

A selection of 132 hymns from the Gesangbuch mit Noten was published in 1892 at Berne by the Christliche Central Buchhandlung, Welty & Sprunger, under the title Evangelisations-Lieder aus dem Gesangbuch mit Noten, geeignet für Schulen, Bet- und Bibelstunden, u.s.w.

The Choralbuch of Heinrich Franz (Leipzig, 1860, 1880) was reprinted for the Mennonites of Manitoba four times (Elkhart 1878, 1918, and twice in Manitoba). It was further reprinted in condensed form by a group of four men from the Chortitz Mennonite congregation at Steinbach, Man. In 1935 a special Choralbuch was published by a commission appointed by the Ministers' Conference of the Conference of Mennonites in Canada. It bore the title Choralbuch in vierstimmigem Tonsatz zum Gebrauch in Kirche, Schule und Haus der Mennonitengemeinden, and contained two or three stanzas of 250 hymns with four-part music (ciphers).

Not to be overlooked is the Kleiner Liederschatz für die Schule und den Familienkreis. Gesammelt und geordnet von einigen Lehrern und Schulfreunden in Kansas (Newton, Schulverlag von Bethel College, 1901), reprints at Newton 1914 and 1928, with 126 songs. It was copyrighted "by David Goerz, in trust for the Western District Conference of the Mennonite Church of America." The Herald Publishing Company published the editions of 1914 and 1928. A similar booklet of 80 pages is Der Kleine Sänger (6th ed., Altona, Man., D. W. Friesen & Sons, 1947).

Meanwhile the Gesangbuch zum gottesdienstlichen und häuslichen Gebrauch in den Mennoniten-Gemeinden Russlands (first ed., Odessa, 1842) with its 725 hymns was reprinted in Germany in 1929 for the newer Canadian immigrants from Russia, with the title changed to substitute "Canada" for "Russland" (called erroneously "Fifth Edition").

J. A. Sprunger, formerly a minister in the Mennonite Church of Berne, Ind., after about 1898 a minister in the Missionary Church Association, edited, with H. J. Dyck, a Mennonite minister from Kansas associated with him in orphanage work at Birmingham, Ohio, Himmels-Harfe für Sonntag-Schulen, Jugendvereine und Evangelisations-Versammlungen at Birmingham in 1907, with 178 hymns, published by the Light and Hope Publishing Co., a publishing agency created by and largely owned by Sprunger.

(2) English Hymnals. The need for an English hymnal in the General Conference Mennonite Church was met by three successive books: (1) Mennonite Hymnal, Blending of Many Voices, Prepared and Arranged for Use in the Mennonite Churches of the General Conference of North America (Berne, 1894 and 1905) with 560 hymns; (2) Mennonite Hymn Book (Berne, 1927, 1928, and 1929) with 412 hymns, and (3) The Mennonite Hymnary (Berne and Newton, n.d., 1940) with 623 hymns. The first was, in spite of the assertion on the title page, only a reprint of the hymnal Many Voices, published by the non-Mennonite A. S. Barnes Co. in 1891. The Mennonite Hymn Book was the first English compilation by General Conference editors (leading members on the editorial committee were G. A. Lehman, A. D. Schmutz, and W. H. Hohmann), but it never became popular, less than 5,000 copies being sold of the three editions. A Selection of Songs Taken from the Mennonite Hymn Book (1929) with 69 hymns was donated to the General Conference session of 1929 by the Berne Witness Co. in an edition of 1,500. A new edition of this Selection, but with only 56 hymns, was printed in 1935. More popular was Treasure Songs for Schools and Churches, Compiled for General Use in All Religious Services, corresponding to the Kleiner Liederschatz of 1901. It was sponsored by the Western District Conference, but published by the Herald Publishing Company at Newton in 1937, in an edition of 2,000 copies. Intended as a supplement to the Mennonite Hymn Book, with a lighter type of music, it had 290 hymns including many children's choruses. A selection of 45 hymns of the book was published in 1936 (sic!), prepared by the Committee on Schools and Education of the Western District Conference, under the title, Selected Songs from the New Song Book. The committee which edited the Treasure Songs was composed of P. P. Buller, P. R. Voth, P. J. Wedel, and J. R. Thierstein.

The Mennonite Hymnary of 1940, edited by W. H. Hohmann and Lester Hostetler, was an outstanding success, selling 37,000 copies in nine editions up to 1955. Although all the General Conference hymnals have expressed the desire to carry on the tradition of the German hymn as one of their purposes, the Hymnary is most successful in this purpose, with 104 German hymn tunes, 58 of which are classified as chorales. Besides the standard English and American hymns the book has an important section of 26 Psalms and Psalm tunes, and also a good selection of 68 of the better Gospel songs. Although it began as a revision of the Mennonite Hymn Book, the Hymnary turned out to be a new compilation (about 63 per cent of the Hymn Book was taken over, constituting 41 per cent of the Hymnary). Lester Hostetler also edited 101 Hymns from the Mennonite Hymnary, with actually 113 hymns, in 1947 (2nd ed. 1953). His Handbook to the Mennonite Hymnary (Newton, 1949, pp. 425) "seeks to explain, as far as possible, the origin of the words and music of every hymn in the Hymnary." "Without a doubt, the Mennonite Hymnary is the best hymnal that the General Conference Mennonites or any other Mennonite conference has published" (Wohlgemuth). It has had great influence on the General Conference Church. The Mennonite Retreater was a camp hymnal with 121 hymns, published specifically for use at Camp Wood, Kan., in July 1939.

In 1956 The Youth Hymnary, also edited by Lester Hostetler, with 303 hymns, was published at Newton.

C. The Mennonite Brethren Church. Since this body is wholly of Russian origin, having immigrated to the United States in 1874 ff. and, with a much larger number of immigrants, into Canada in 1922 ff., it has until recently used the German books it brought from Russia, or reprinted in North America, or the songbooks of other related groups, chiefly of the Gospel song type. The first book used in Russia was the Glaubensstimme, the songbook of the German Baptists. This was reprinted in 1905 at Medford, Okla., by the M.B. Publishing House, edited by H. W. Grage, under the title Zions-Glaubensstimme, with 512 hymns with music. The Heimatklänge, by E. Gebhardt, published in seven editions in Russia, was republished twice in America, in a revised edition at Mountain Lake, Minn., in 1924 (?) by A. Kroeker, and in 1939 (?) at Winnipeg. Both in Russia and in America a popular combination was the Drei-Band (three volumes) Heimatklänge-Glaubensstimme-Frohe Botschaft, all of non-M.B. origin. The Mennonite Brethren Publishing House at Hillsboro, Kan., published the Sänger-Bote in at least five editions, Zions-Klänge and Neue Zions-Lieder (1919) by J. J. Franz and D. B. Towner, and printed A. G. Sawatzky's Lieder-Quelle für Kirche und Haus, which appeared quarterly in 1929-30. The Sängerbote was a periodical publication of an M.B. Association of Singers (Christlicher Sängerbund der Mennoniten Brüdergemeinde von Nord Amerika) beginning in 1912. Young People's Sacred Songs, edited by H. C. Richert, also published by the M.B. Publishing House at Hillsboro (1935), is really a collection of 25 numbers of the Gospel song type, partly for special groups, only 15 being of the hymn type for mixed voices.

The first official conference hymnals of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America, and the only ones to date, are: the Mennonite Brethren Church Hymnal, A Treasury of Hymns and Gospel Songs Compiled, Edited and Published by the Mennonite Brethren Hymnal Committee . . . Music Editor, Herbert C. Richert (Hillsboro, n.d., 1953), with 500 hymns; and the Gesangbuch der Mennoniten Brüdergemeinde Herausgegeben im Auftrage der Bundeskonferenz ausgewählt und zusammengestellt von dem Gesangbuchkomitee der Kanadischen Konferenz . . . (n.p., n.d., Winnipeg, 1953, with 4th edition in 1955) with 555 hymns. The English hymnal is composed largely of hymns of the Gospel song type of English and American origin; only 34 German hymn tunes appear, among which are only 10 chorales. The German Gesangbuch has a larger proportion of hymns of the German chorale type, but the number is still relatively small compared to the number of songs taken from Glaubensstimme, Reichslieder, Heimatklänge, Ausgewählte Lieder, and Evangeliumslieder, from which many selections were made. The Evangelical Mennonite Church (Kleine Gemeinde) formally adopted the M.B. hymnal in 1955 for regular use in all its services.

D. Smaller Groups. The groups with smaller membership naturally find it difficult to publish hymnals and therefore commonly use books of other groups. The Krimmer Mennonite Brethren German hymnal of 1884, Die Geistreiche Lieder, Auswahl für Familien und öffentliche Erbauungen mit Sorgfalt gesammelt von der Krimmer Mennoniten-Brüder Gemeinde (Elkhart, Ind., 1884) with 754 hymns, small format, was a brave venture for a very small group. It was not repeated. The same is true of the Evangelical Mennonite Church's (formerly Defenseless) one hymnal, Glaubens-Lieder, Eine Sammlung Geistreicher Lieder zur öffentlichen und häuslichen Erbauung und zum Lobe Gottes (Elkhart, 1890) with 600 hymns, small format, and an appendix of 50 English hymns. The somewhat larger Church of God in Christ Mennonites published their first hymnal in 1952, The Christian Hymnal, A Collection of Hymns and Sacred Songs Suitable for Use in Public Worship, Worship in the Home, Evangelistic Meetings, and General Occasions (Hesston, 1952), with 629 hymns, small format, prepared by a hymnbook committee of the General Conference with Harry D. Wenger as chairman. This hymnal shows considerable influence from the Church and Sunday School Hymnal (1902) of the Mennonite Church (MC), and also carries largely Gospel songs. A small booklet of 14 pp., called Der Köstlichere Weg. In Liedern, was published by Peter Töws of Stern, Alberta, in two editions, 1912 and 1914. Neither the Evangelical Mennonites (Kleine Gemeinde) nor the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren have ever published any hymnals of their own.

The Reformed Mennonites, founded in 1812 in Lancaster Co., Pa., by John Herr (q.v.), have had their own hymnals since 1847. In that year A Collection of Hymns, designed for the Use of the Church of Christ, by John Reist, Minister of the Gospel, small format, with 197 hymns, was published at Buffalo, N.Y. Reprints appeared at Lancaster in 1858 (bound with it Eine Kleine Lieder-Sammlung, zum allgemeinen Gebrauch des wahren Gottesdienstes für die Gemeinde Gottes also published at Lancaster in 1858, which had appeared at Harrisburg in 1837), in 1873 (revised), and in 1895.

The United Missionary Church (formerly Mennonite Brethren in Christ), whose beginnings date back to 1875, has had several hymnals. As early as 1876 Daniel Brenneman, one of its founders, published The Balm of Gilead: For Christian Workers and Reformers, A Collection of Psalms, Hymns, and Spiritual Songs "Old" and "New," for Public and Private Devotional Exercises. Especially adapted to the use of Revival, Prayer, and Fellowship Meetings; Family Worship, and the Sabbath School (Orrville, Ohio. H. A. Mumaw, Publisher, 1876), a booklet with 101 hymns. In 1881 the Evangelical United Mennonite Publication Society published at Goshen, Ind., A Choice Collection of Spiritual Hymns Adapted to Public, Social and Family Devotion and designed for the use of Evangelical United Mennonites and all Lovers of Zion, small format, with 834 hymns, prepared by a committee composed of Daniel Brenneman, Solomon Eby, and B. Bowman. A revised edition was published in 1893 at Berlin, Ont., with the number of hymns reduced to 791, but with a separate section added called Revival Hymns (189 hymns) with its own title page, which could also be purchased separately. It carried many standard English and American hymns, as did the next hymnal. In 1907 the M.B.C. Church published its Church Hymnal, A Choice Collection of Hymns and Meters for Public Worship in the M.B.C. Churches, compiled by Henry S. Hallman, with 774 hymns and 258 tunes, sponsored by three district conferences: Canada, Michigan, and Northwest. It was not reprinted since the denomination soon began to use the popular Gospel song hymnals of other groups, such as Gospel Hymns, Pentecostal Hymns, etc. In 1917 the Pennsylvania district conference published its own hymnal, Rose of Sharon Hymns, compiled by a committee of which H. B. Musselman was the leader. Its 727 hymns are very largely of the Gospel song type, and quite different from the Church Hymnal.

E. The Hutterian Brethren. Before coming to North America in 1874 ff., and in America until 1914, the Hutterian Brethren used only manuscript hymns, of which they had a large number, and which were to be found collected in numerous codices. Examples are: a codex of somewhat before 1600 containing 165 hymns on 550 pages, one of about 1650 with 140 hymns on 800 pages, and one of about 1660 with 80 hymns on 780 pages. These three codices were the chief sources for the first printed Hutterite hymnal, Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, Gesangbuch, Darinnen viel und mancherlei schöne Betrachtungen, Lehren, Vermahnungen, Lobgesänge und Glaubensbekenntnisse, von vielen Liebhabern Gottes gedichtet und aus vielen Geschichten und Historien der heiligen Schrift zusammengetragen, allen frommen Liebhabern Gottes sehr nützlich zu singen und zu lesen. Herausgegeben von den Hutterischen Brüdern in Amerika (Scottdale, 1914). This stately quarto volume of 891 pages, two columns to the page, probably prepared by Elias Walter with the aid of John Horsch, contains 276 hymns, written from 1527 to 1762, mostly with many stanzas each (up to 70 and 80 stanzas in some instances), arranged chronologically. It is clear that these hymns were not intended to be sung in full, but are often historical poems, relating the tribulations of the church and the experiences of the martyrs. A second edition of this hymnal was printed by the Christian Press of Winnipeg, Man., in 1953, with 632 pages, identical in content but using smaller type. A. J. F. Zieglschmid had prepared before his death in 1950 a scholarly edition of the Hutterite hymns in manuscript which is deposited in the Mennonite Historical Library at Goshen College.

An altogether different type of hymnal is the Gesang-Büchlein. Lieder für Schule und Häuslichen Gebrauch Herausgegeben von den Hutterischen Brüdern in Canada, which has appeared in small format in four editions thus far: 1919 (135 hymns), 1930 (137), 1940 (166), 1950 (186). The first edition had the following title page: Gesang-Büchlein. Lieder besonders zum Auswendiglernen für die Jugend in der Schule geeignet, meistens aus alten Handschriften gesammelt und herausgegeben von Elias Walter. The second edition indicates it was published by the Hutterian Brethren in Alberta. Not a single one of the hymns in the large hymnal of 1914 appears in the small book, nor do its hymns have any Hutterite character; rather they seem to be typically Lutheran or even Pietistic in type. There is no connection between this book and any existing German Mennonite hymnal. What manuscripts Elias Walter used is unknown, nor where the 52 additional hymns of the later editions came from, except that the author of the last hymn is given as Rev. A. G. Gross of Brentham, Alberta, in 1909, and the third last hymn is ascribed to Joseph Mändel of Elie, Man., both certainly Hutterites. How this quite un-Hutterite hymnal has come to be the popular book of the modern Hutterites must remain a mystery.

F. Apostolic Christian Church. This group, the "New Amish," had their hymnal Neue Zionsharfe, Eine Sammlung von Liedern und Gesängen für die Gemeinen der Gläubigen in Christo, Neue Auflage, with 275 hymns, printed by "John F. Funk and Bro." at Elkhart in 1875. In 1924 (reprint 1941) it appeared in English as Zion's Harp, A Collection of Hymns and Songs for the Apostolic Christian Church of America, Translated from the German, with 253 hymns.

G. Gospel Hymn Influences. The American "Gospel" hymn, often referred to in Germany as the "English" type hymn, which arose about the middle of the 19th century and became a widespread and very popular type of hymn and tune in both England and America largely as the result of the great Moody revivals of 1870-90, has also influenced American Mennonite Hymnology, and to a lesser extent that of the German, Swiss, French, and Russian Mennonites. Developing out of the earlier "White Spirituals" and religious folk music of the southern Mountains, and aided by campmeeting and Sunday-school hymns and tunes of the first half of the century, this type of hymn was published in an increasing number of hymnals in large editions from 1875 on. The two most important collections have been Gospel Hymns and Spiritual Songs (Nos. 1-6, 1875-94), the famous "Moody and Sankey songbook," and the Pentecostal Hymns (1894 ff.) series, published by the Hope Publishing Co. Gospel Hymns was translated into German as Evangeliums-Lieder (1891) for use in America and Germany. Similar additional Gospel song books published in Germany, some before and some after the Evangeliums-Lieder, were Glaubensstimme, Frohe Botschaft, Heimatklänge, Reichslieder, and Siegeslieder. In Europe it was the more pietistic and "Gemeinschaft" (q.v.) circles, and the Mennonites influenced by them in South Germany, France, Switzerland, and Russia, which used these books. In America, although some such German books were used by Mennonites, (for instance, all the K.M.B. congregations used the Evangeliums-Lieder until they changed to English, and most of the Kleine Gemeinde congregations in Manitoba used this book for Sunday school for the period ca. 1915-45, and began to use it in regular church services to displace the old Gesangbuch, Eine Sammlung geistlicher Lieder, which had been used from the beginning of their history) it was the English books mentioned above and others like them which had the greatest influence. Hymnals of Gospel songs were introduced directly into many Mennonite (MC) congregations at the time of the transition from the German to the English language from about 1890 on, though almost exclusively for Sunday-school use. Thus many congregations developed the practice of using two hymnbooks, the non-Mennonite Gospel type for Sunday school, the more standard Mennonite type of hymnal for "church" services. Some of the Gospel type books were actually "published" in imprint editions by Mennonite publishers, but most of them were bought directly by the congregations from such publishers at the Hope Publishing Co., and the Rodeheaver House, both in Chicago. The Mennonite Publishing Co. at Elkhart published soon after 1897 The Gospel Call, A Choice Collection of Standard Hymns and Gospel Songs, and about 1905 Songs of Faith and Hope. The issuance of Life Songs and particularly Life Songs No. 2 effectively replaced the outside publications, and has largely eliminated the use of the cheaper type of Gospel song in the M.C. group. In 1910 the Mennonite Book Concern of Berne, Ind., issued an imprint edition of Evangeliums-Sänger, edited by Walter Rauschenbusch and Allan Sankey. Similar publications by Mennonite Brethren publishers in the United States were Zions-Glaubensstimme (1905) and Neue Zions-Lieder (1919), the latter edited by J. J. Franz and D. B. Towner. Besides in the complete hymnals mentioned above, the Gospel hymns and tunes influenced American Mennonite hymnology by the deposit of smaller or larger numbers of Gospel hymns in every major English Mennonite hymnal published in America. The widespread use of such hymns and tunes has influenced the piety and even theology of Mennonites toward a heightened emotional emphasis and more emphasis upon subjective religious experience. This influence has been both wholesome and harmful depending upon the form it has taken and the extent of use. It has contributed in some quarters to a progressive detachment from the historic heritage and anchorage of Anabaptist-Mennonite background, accompanying and aiding similar outside influences in other areas of 20th century Mennonite church life, both in America and Europe. H.S.B.

W. H. Hohmann, Outlines in Hymnology with Emphasis on Mennonite Hymnology (n.p., Newton, 1941); Paul W. Wohlgemuth, "Mennonite Hymnals Published in the English Language" (unpublished doctoral dissertation in Musicology, Univ. of So. Cal., 1956, dealing primarily with the tunes); H. S. Bender, Two Centuries of American Mennonite Literature (Goshen, 1929); idem, "The Literature and Hymnology of the Mennonites of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania," MQR VI (1932) 156-68; ML II, 86-91.

Illustrations

Contents

I. Historic Places, Plates I to IV 3-6

- 1. Europe 3-5
    - Menno Simons House and Linden Tree, Oldesloe, Germany
    - Menno Simons Monument, Witmarsum, Netherlands
    - Wartburg Castle Tower, Eisenach, Germany
    - Lamberti Church Tower, Münster, Germany
    - Limmat River Scene, Zürich, Switzerland
    - House "Zur Eintracht," Zürich, Switzerland
    - Rathaus, Zürich, Switzerland
    - Tower Prison "Käfigturm," Bern, Switzerland
    - Emmental, Switzerland
    - Het Steen Castle Prison, Antwerp, Belgium
    - Passau Castle, Germany
- 2. America 6
    - Ephrata (Pa.) Cloister Press
    - Conestoga (Pa.) Pioneer Wagons
    - Waterloo Co., Ont., Pioneer Memorial Tower
    - Swiss-Volhynian Pioneer Memorial Stone, near Moundridge, Kan.

II. Historic Scenes, Plates V to VI 7-8

- First Immigrant Ship, Winnipeg, Man., 1874
- Immigrant House Interior, Newton, Kan., 1874
- Chortitza Oak, Russia, First Mennonite Settlement, 1789
- Mennonitische Flüchtlingsfürsorge Meeting, Oberursel, Germany, 1922
- Russian Refugee Camp, Prenzlau, Germany, 1929-30
- Russian Mennonite Refugees en route Berlin to Paraguay, 1947
- European MCC Relief Workers Conference, Basel, Switzerland, 1948

III. Homes for the Aged, Plates VII to IX 9-11

- 1. Europe 9
    - Haarlem, Netherlands
    - Thiensdorf, West Prussia, Germany
    - Enkenbach, Palatinate, Germany
    - Valdoie, France
- 2. North America 10-11
    - Frederick, Pa. (GCM)
    - Souderton, Pa. (MC)
    - Rittman, Ohio (MC)
    - Bluffton, Ohio (GCM)
    - Eureka, Ill. (MC)
    - Meadows, Ill. (GCM)
    - Newton, Kans. (GCM)
    - Corn, Okla. (MB)
    - Reedley, Cal. (MB)
    - Winnipeg (Bethania), Man. (GCM)

IV. Hospitals, Plates IX to XI 11-13

- 1. General Hospitals 11-12
    - Bloomington (Mennonite), Ill. (GCM)
    - Newton (Bethel Deaconess), Kans. (GCM)
    - Goessel (Bethesda), Kans. (GCM)
    - La Junta (Mennonite), Colo. (MC)
    - Winnipeg (Concordia), Man. (GCM)
    - Steinbach (Bethesda), Man. (general)
    - Winkler (Bethel), Man. (general)
    - Muntau, Molotschna, Russia
    - Friesland, Paraguay, and Fernheim, Paraguay

2. Mental Hospitals 13
- Prairie View, Newton, Kans. (MCC)
- Brook Lane Farm, Hagerstown, Md. (MCC)
- Kings View Homes, Reedley, Cal. (MCC)
- Bethesda, Vineland, Ont. (MB)
- Bethania, Molotschna, Russia, Staff
- Philhaven, Lebanon, Pa. (MC)

V. Hymnbooks, Plates XII to XIII 14-15
- Ausbund (Swiss) 1564 (Etliche schöne Christliche Geseng)
- Het Ryper Liedtboecxken 1664
- 't Kleyn Hoorns-Liet-Boeck 1646
- Veelderhande Schriftuurlyke Liedekens 1752
- Geistreiches Gesangbuch 1775
- Die kleine geistliche Harfe 1803
- Ein Unpartheyisches Gesang-Buch 1804
- A Selection of Psalms, Hymns and Spiritual Songs, 1847

VI. Portraits D-J, Plates XIV to XVII 16-19
- Hubmaier, Balthasar, Nikolsburg, Moravia (1480?-1528)
- Dirk Philips (z), Danzig, Germany (1504-68)
- Gerritsz, Lubbert, Hoorn, Netherlands (1534-1612)
- Galenus Abrahamsz, Amsterdam, Netherlands (1622-1706)
- Deknatel, Jeme (Joannes), Amsterdam, Netherlands (1698-1759)
- Denner, Jakob, Hamburg-Altona, Germany (1659-1746)
- Hoekstra Bz., Sytze, Amsterdam, Netherlands (1822-98)
- Feenstra, Pieter, Jr., Amsterdam, Netherlands (1850-1936)
- Friesen, Peter M., Halbstadt, Russia (1849-1914) EM
- Epp, David H., Chortitza, Russia (1861-1934) Menn.
- Dirks, Heinrich, Gnadenfeld, Russia (1842-1915) Menn.
- Harder, Bernhard, Molotschna, Russia (1832-84) Menn.
- Hege, Ulrich, Reihen, Ger. (1808-72) Verband
- Hege, Christian, Frankfurt, Ger. (1869-1943) Verband
- Hege, Jakob, Reihen, Ger. (1848-1911) Verband
- Horsch, Michael, Hellmannsberg, Ger. (1871-1949) Verband
- Huebert, Heinrich, Molotschna, Russia (1810-95) MB
- Duerksen, David Gerhard, Crimea, Russia (1850-1910) MB
- Ediger, Alexander, Berdyansk, Russia (1893-?) Menn.
- Geiser, Abraham, Chaux d' Abel, Sw. (1857-1928)
- Dyck, Isaak, Chortitza, Russia (1847-1929) Menn.
- Goerz, Abraham, Orloff, Russia (1840-1911) Menn.
- Ewert, Henry H., Gretna, Man. (1855-1934) GCM
- Grubb, Nathaniel B., Philadelphia, Pa. (1850-1938) MC
- Goerz, David, Newton, Kans. (1849-1914) MC
- Harder, David E., Hillsboro, Kans. (1872-1930) KMB
- Harms, John F., Hillsboro, Kans. (1855-1945) MB
- Funk, John F., Elkhart, Ind. (1835-1930) MC
- Eby, Solomon, Kitchener, Ont. (1834-1931) MBC
- Epp, Dietrich H., Rosthern, Sask. (1875-1955) GCM
- Hartzler, Jonas S., Elkhart, Ind. (1857-1953) MC
- Erb, Tillman M., Hesston, Kans. (1865-1929) MC
- Horsch, John, Scottdale, Pa. (1867-1941) MC

VII. Book Title Pages, Plates XVIII to XIX 20-21
- Concordantz vnd Zeiger (ca. 1550)
- Concordantie by Pieter Jansz Twisck, 1648
- Confessio by Thomas von Imbroich, 1558
- Güldene Aepffel in Silbern Schalen, 1745
- Protocoll, disputation held at Frankenthal, 1571
- Protocoll, disputation held at Embden, 1579
- Geschichtbuch, Chronicle of the Hutterian Brethren
- Ein Spiegel der Tauffe, 1744

I. Historic Places: Europe

1 Menno Simons House and Linden Tree, Oldesloe, Ger.; 2 Menno Simons Monument, Witmarsum, Neth.; 3. Wartburg Castle Tower, Eisenach, Ger., where Fritz Erbe was imprisoned 17 years; 4 Lamberti Church Tower, Anabaptist Cages, Münster, Ger.

Das alte Rathhaus nach Edlibach.
3

II. Historic Places: Europe

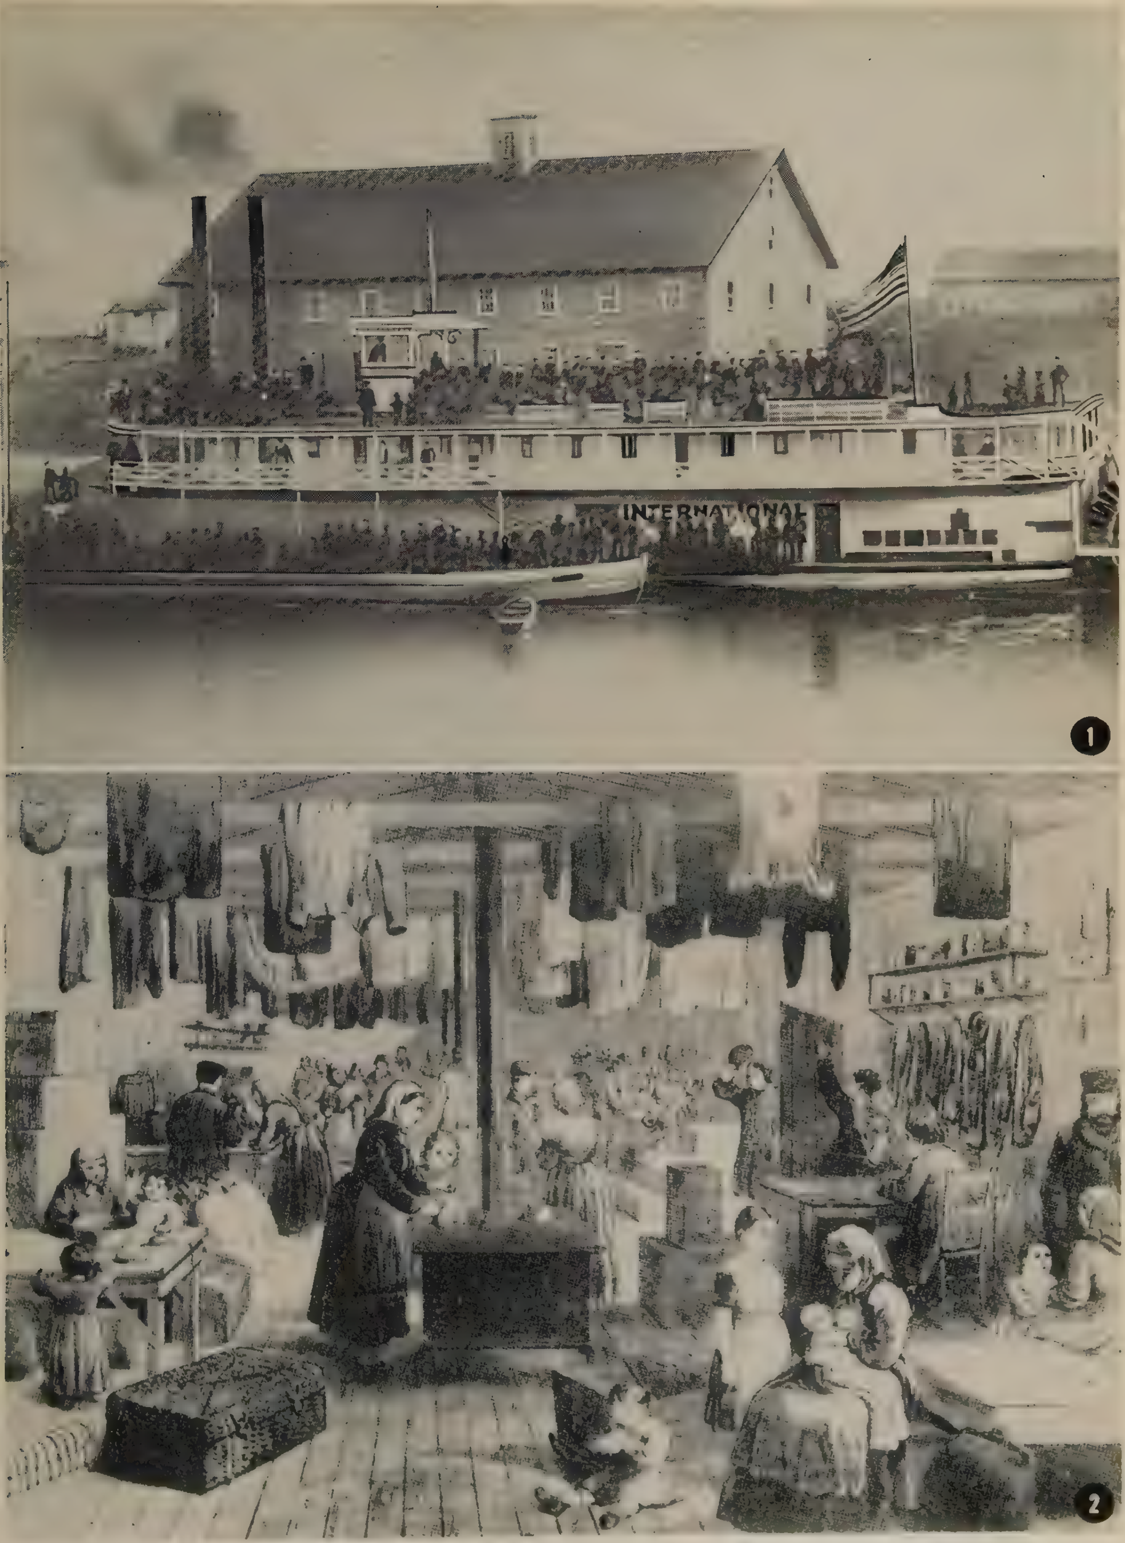
1. Limmat River Scene, Zürich, Sw., showing Zwingli's church and Scene of Felix Manz' Martyrdom 1527; 2. House "Zur Eintracht," Zürich, home of Conrad Grebel 1508-14 and 1520-25; 3. Rathaus, Zürich, where Anabaptist-Zwinglian Debates of 1525 were held.

III. Historic Places: Europe

1. Tower Prison, "Käfigturm," in Bern, Sw., where many Anabaptists were in prison, 2. Emmental, Canton Bern, Sw., home of Anabaptists since 1528; 3. Het Steen Castle Prison, Antwerp, Belgium, where many Anabaptists were executed; 4. Passau Castle, Ger., where Anabaptist prisoners composed one part of the Ausbund, ca. 1535.

IV. Historic Places: North America

1. Ephrata (Pa.) Cloister Press where Martyrs Mirror was printed in 1748-49. Sketch by O. W. Schenk; 2. Conestoga (Pa.) Pioneer Wagons, used in westward migrations. Sketch by O. W. Schenk; 3. Waterloo Co., Ont., Pioneer Memorial Tower near Doon; 4. Swiss-Volhynian Pioneer Memorial Stone, near Moundridge, Kan.



V. Historic Scenes

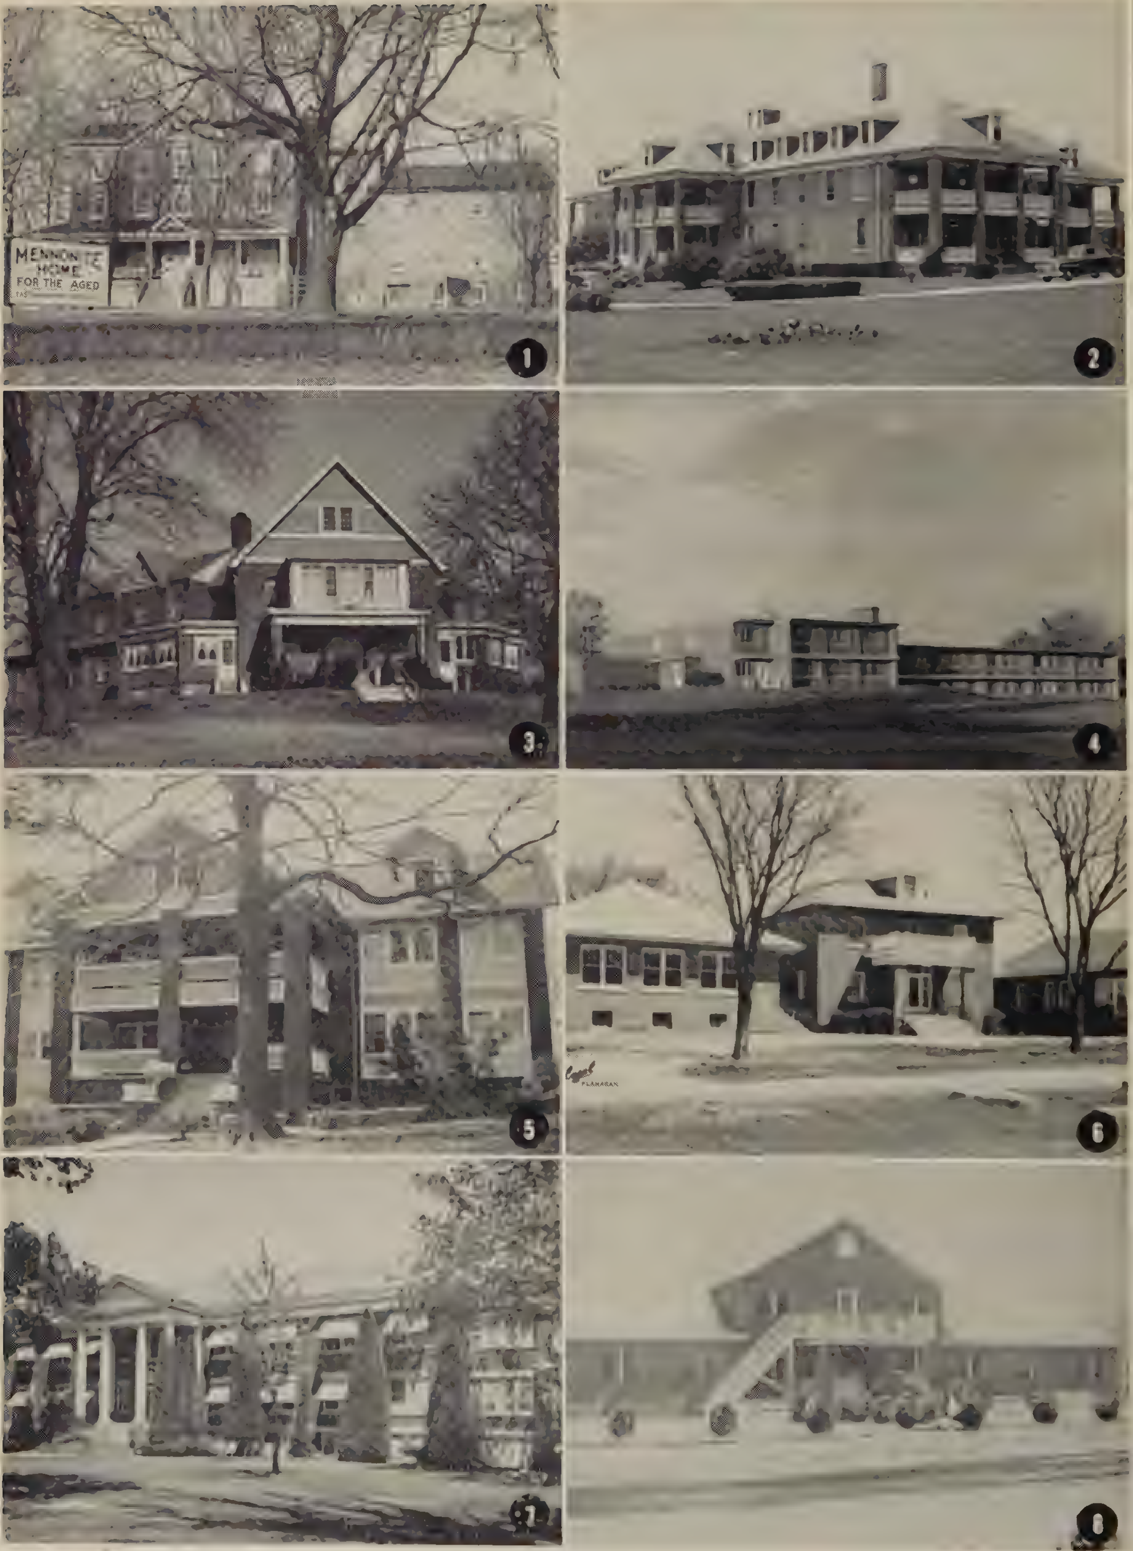
1. First Immigrant Ship of Russian Mennonites arriving at Winnipeg, Man., in 1874; 2. Immigrant House Interior near Newton, Kan.: Russian Mennonites arriving in 1874. (From Frank Lesslie's Illustrated Newspaper, New York, March 20, 1875)

VI. Historic Scenes

1. Chortitza (Russia) "Thousand-Year Oak," Landmark at beginning of settlement in 1789; 2. Mennonitische Flüchtlingsfürsorge Meeting, Oberursel b. Frankfurt, Ger., June 18, 1922; 3. Russian Refugee Camp Prenzlau, Ger., where many Mennonites stayed in 1930; 4. Russian Mennonite Refugees (Volendam Group) en route Berlin to Paraguay in 1947; 5. European MCC Relief Workers Conference Basel, Sw., 1948.

VII. Homes for the Aged: Europe

1. Haarlem, Neth.; 2. Thiensdorf, West Prussia, Ger.; 3. Enkenbach, Palatinate, Ger., 4. Valdoie, France.



VIII. Homes for the Aged: North America

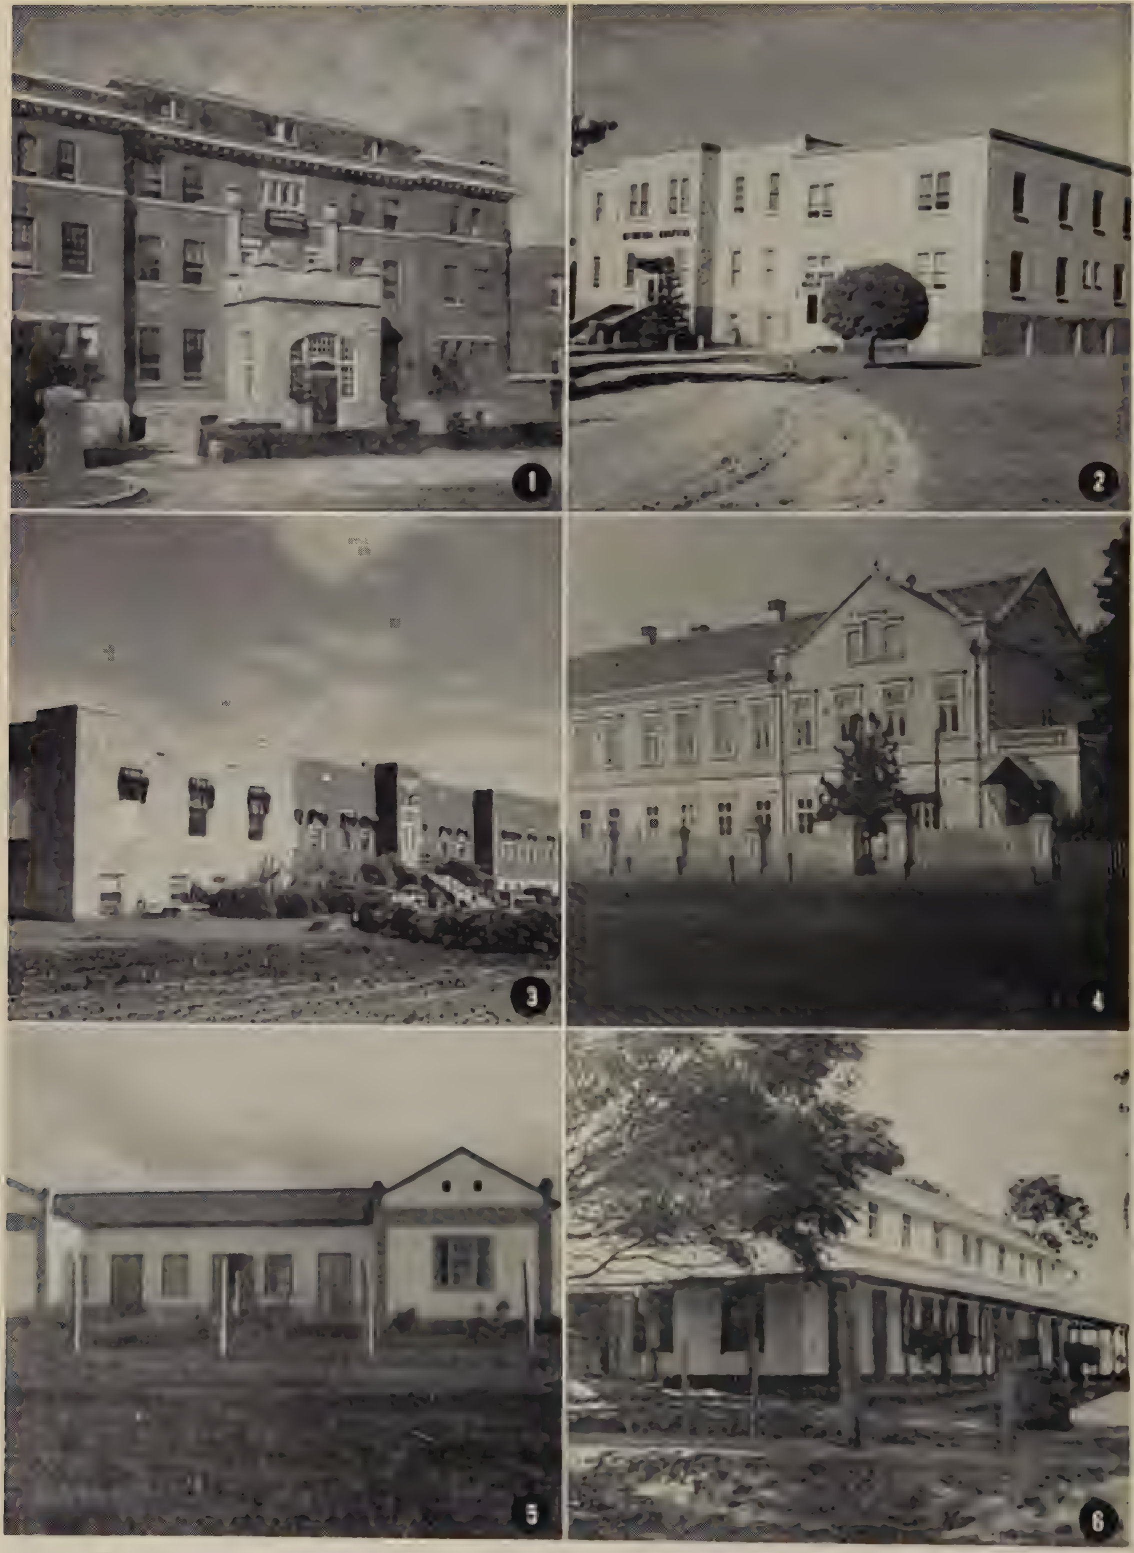
1. Frederick, Pa.; 2. Souderton, Pa.; 3. Rittman, Ohio; 4. Bluffton, Ohio; 5. Eureka, Ill.; 6. Meadows, Ill. 7. Newton, Kan.; 8. Corn, Okla.

IX.A. Homes for the Aged: North America

1. Reedley, Cal.; 2. Winnipeg (Bethania), Man.

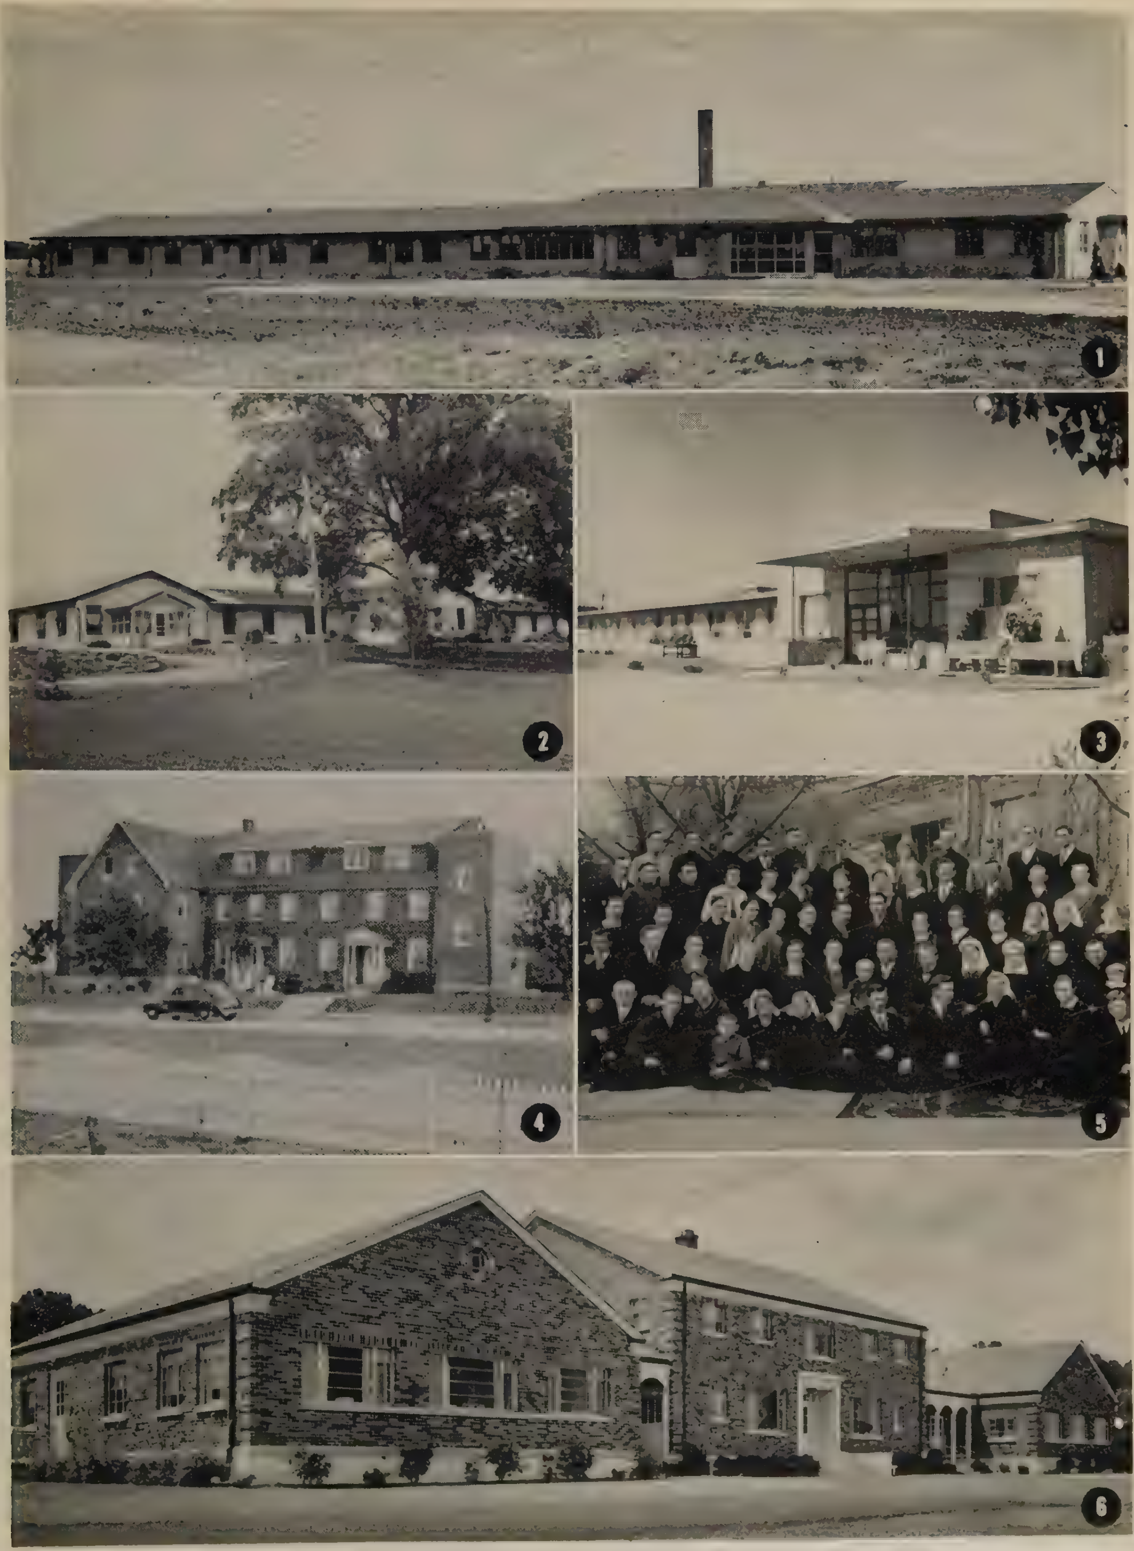
IX.B. Hospitals: General Hospitals

3. Bloomington (Mennonite), Ill., 4. Newton (Bethel Deaconess), Newton, Kan.; 5. Goessel (Bethesda), Kan.; 6. La Junta (Mennonite), Col.



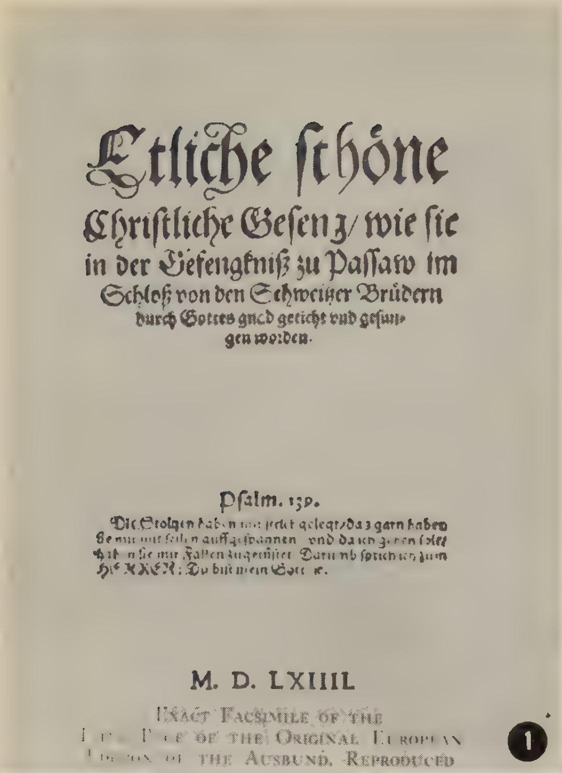
X. Hospitals: General Hospitals

1. Winnipeg (Concordia), Man.; 2. Steinbach (Bethesda), Man.; 3. Winkler (Bethel), Man.; 4. Muntau, Molotschna, Russia; 5. Friesland, Paraguay; 6. Fernheim, Paraguay.



XI. Hospitals: Mental Hospitals

1. Prairie View, Newton, Kan.; 2. Brook Lane Farm, Hagerstown, Md.; 3. Kings View Homes, Reedley, Cal.; 4. Bethesda, Vineland, Ont.; 5. Bethania (Russia) Staff, founded 1911; 6. Philhaven, Lebanon, Pa.



Etliche ſchöne
Chriſtliche Geſeng/ wie ſie in der Gefengkniß zu Paſſaw im
Schloß von den Schweitzer Brüdern durch Gottes gnad geticht vnd geſungen worden.

Pſalm. 139.

M. D. LXIIII.

Exact Facsimile of the Title Page of the Original European Edition of the Ausbund. Reproduced

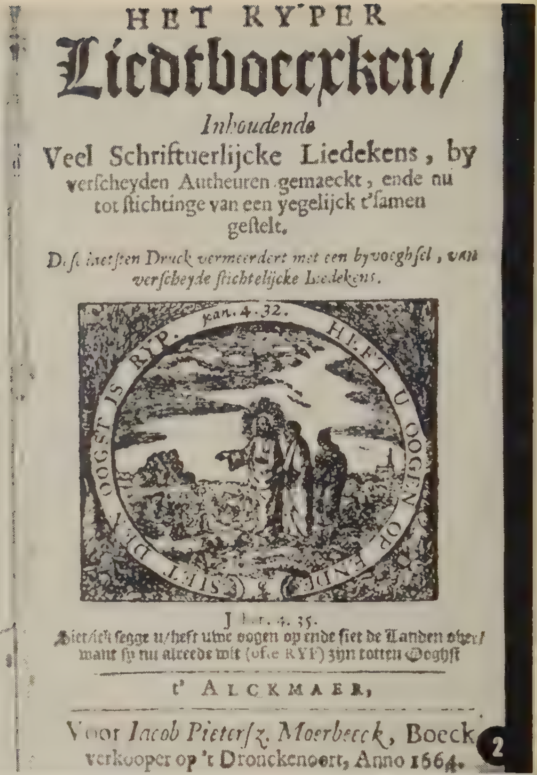
①



HET RYPER
Liedtboecxken/
Inhoudende
Veel Schriftuerlijcke Liedekens, by verſcheyden Autheuren gemaeckt, ende nu tot ſtichtinge van een yegelijck t'ſamen geſtelt.

Deſe laetſten Druck vermeerdert met een byvoeghſel, van verſcheyde ſtichtelijcke Liedekens.

Ian. 4.32.
HEFT U OOGEN OP ENDE SIET DEN OOGST IS RYP.

Joan. 4. 35.
Siet/ ick ſegge u/ heft uwe oogen op ende ſiet de Landen over/want ſy nu alreede wit (ofte RYP) zyn totten Ooghſt

t' ALCKMAER,

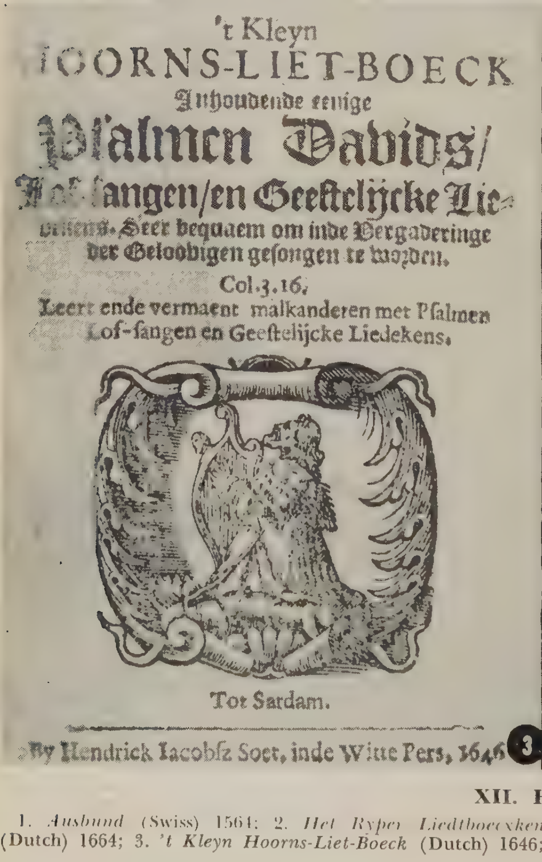
Voor Iacob Pieterſz. Moerbeeck, Boeckverkooper op 't Dronckenoort, Anno 1664.

②



't Kleyn
HOORNS-LIET-BOECK
Inhoudende eenige
Pſalmen Davids/
Lof-ſangen/en Geeſtelijcke Liedekens. Seer bequaem om inde Vergaderinge der Geloovigen geſongen te worden.
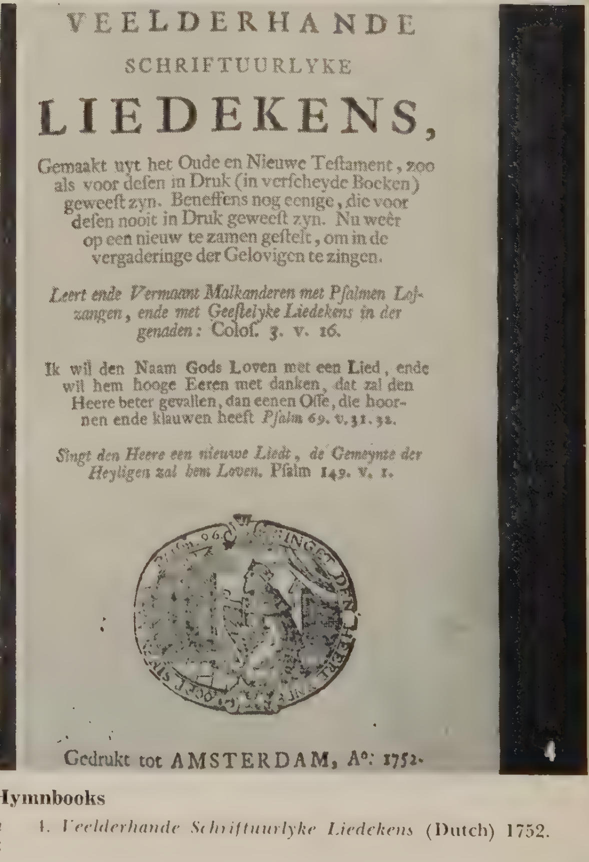
Col. 3. 16.
Leert ende vermaent malkanderen met Pſalmen
Lof-ſangen en Geeſtelijcke Liedekens.

Tot Sardam.

By Hendrick Iacobſz Soet, inde Witte Pers, 1646.

③



VEELDERHANDE
SCHRIFTUURLYKE
LIEDEKENS,

Gemaakt uyt het Oude en Nieuwe Teſtament, zoo
als voor deſen in Druk (in verſcheyde Boeken) geweeſt zyn. Beneffens nog eenige, die voor deſen nooit in Druk geweeſt zyn. Nu weêr op een nieuw te zamen geſtelt, om in de vergaderinge der Gelovigen te zingen.

Leert ende Vermaant Malkanderen met Pſalmen Lofzangen, ende met Geeſtelyke Liedekens in der genaden: Coloſ. 3. v. 16.

Ik wil den Naam Gods Loven met een Lied, ende wil hem hooge Eeren met danken, dat zal den
Heere beter gevallen, dan eenen Oſſe, die hoornen ende klauwen heeft Pſalm 69. v. 31. 32.

Singt den Heere een nieuwe Liedt, de Gemeynte der Heyligen zal hem Loven. Pſalm 149. v. 1.

Gedrukt tot AMSTERDAM, A°: 1752.

④

XII. Hymnbooks

1. Ausbund (Swiss) 1564; 2. Het Ryper Liedtboecxken (Dutch) 1664; 3. 't Kleyn Hoorns-Liet-Boeck (Dutch) 1646; 4. Veelderhande Schriftuurlyke Liedekens (Dutch) 1752.

Geiſtreiches
Geſangbuch,
worinn
eine Sammlung
aus denen
150. Pſalmen Davids, und auserleſenen
alten und neuen Liedern zu finden iſt,
zur allgemeinen Erbauung und
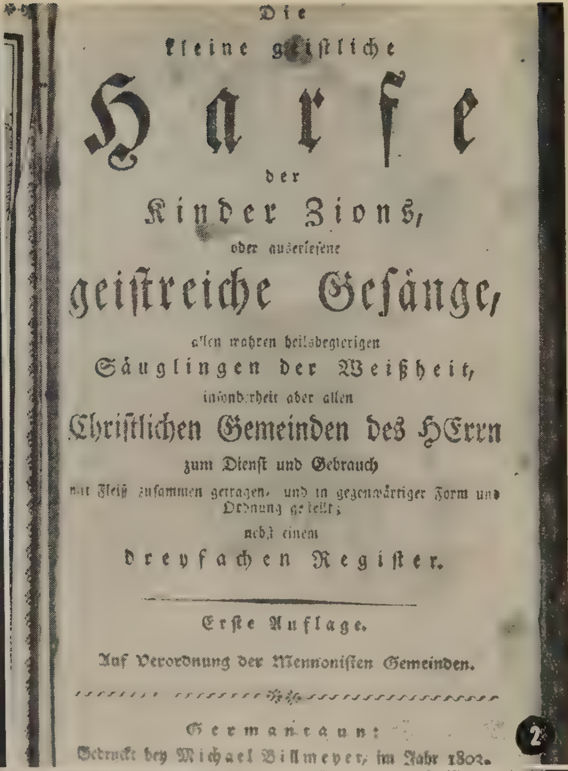
zum Lobe GOttes
herausgegeben.

Ich will dem HErrn ſingen mein Lebenlang; und meinen GOtt loben, ſo lang ich hie bin. Pſ. 104, 33.

Königsberg,
gedruckt bey Daniel Chriſtoph Kanter, Königl. Preuß. Hofbuchdrucker, 1775.

1



Die
kleine geiſtliche
Harfe
der Kinder Zions,
oder auserleſene
geiſtreiche Geſänge,
allen wahren heilsbegierigen
Säuglingen der Weißheit, inſonderheit aber allen
Chriſtlichen Gemeinden des HErrn zum Dienſt und Gebrauch mit Fleiß zuſammen getragen, und in gegenwärtiger Form und Ordnung geſtellt; nebſt einem
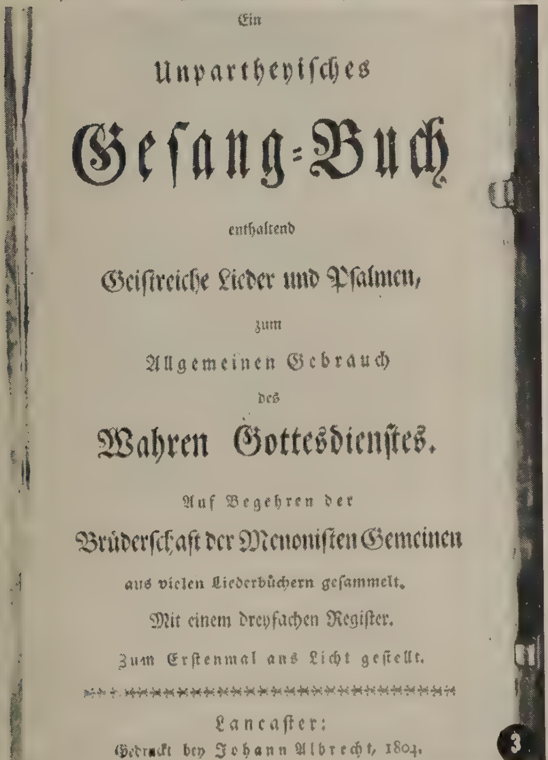
dreyfachen Regiſter.

Erſte Auflage.
Auf Verordnung der Mennoniſten Gemeinden.

Germantaun:
Gedruckt bey Michael Billmeyer, im Jahr 1803.

2



Ein
Unpartheyiſches
Geſang-Buch
enthaltend
Geiſtreiche Lieder und Pſalmen, zum
Allgemeinen Gebrauch
des Wahren Gottesdienſtes.
Auf Begehren der
Brüderſchaft der Menoniſten Gemeinen
aus vielen Liederbüchern geſammelt.
Mit einem dreyfachen Regiſter.
Zum Erſtenmal ans Licht geſtellt.

Lancaſter:
Gedruckt bey Johann Albrecht, 1804.

3

A SELECTION OF PSALMS, HYMNS AND SPIRITUAL SONGS,
FROM THE MOST APPROVED AUTHORS
SUITED TO THE VARIOUS OCCASIONS
OF
Public Worship and Private Devotion.
OF
THE CHURCH OF CHRIST.

By a Committee of the Mennonites.

HARRISONBURG, VA.,
J. H. WARTMANN & BROS. PRS
1847.

4

XIII. Hymnbooks

1. Geistreiches Gesangbuch (Königsberg, Ger., 1775); 2. Die kleine geistliche Harfe (Germantown, Pa., 1803); 3. Ein Unpartheyisches Gesang-Buch (Lancaster, Pa., 1804); 4. A Selection of Psalms, Hymns and Spiritual Songs (Harrisonburg, Va., 1847), first English Mennonite hymnbook.

1

2

3

4

5

6

7

8

XIV. Portraits

1. Balthasar Hubmaier (1480-1528), Nikolsburg, Moravia; 2. Dirk Philips(z) (1504-68), Danzig, Ger.; 3. Lubbert Gerritsz (1534-1612), Hoorn, Neth.; 4. Galenus Abrahamsz (1622-1706), Amsterdam, Neth.; 5. Jeme (Joannes) Deknatel (1698-1759), Amsterdam, Neth.; 6. Jakob Denner (1659-1746), Hamburg-Altona, Ger.; 7. Sytze Hoekstra Bz. (1822-98), Amsterdam, Neth.; 8. Pieter Feenstra, Jr. (1850-1936), Amsterdam, Neth.

1

2

3

4

5

6

7

8

XV. Portraits

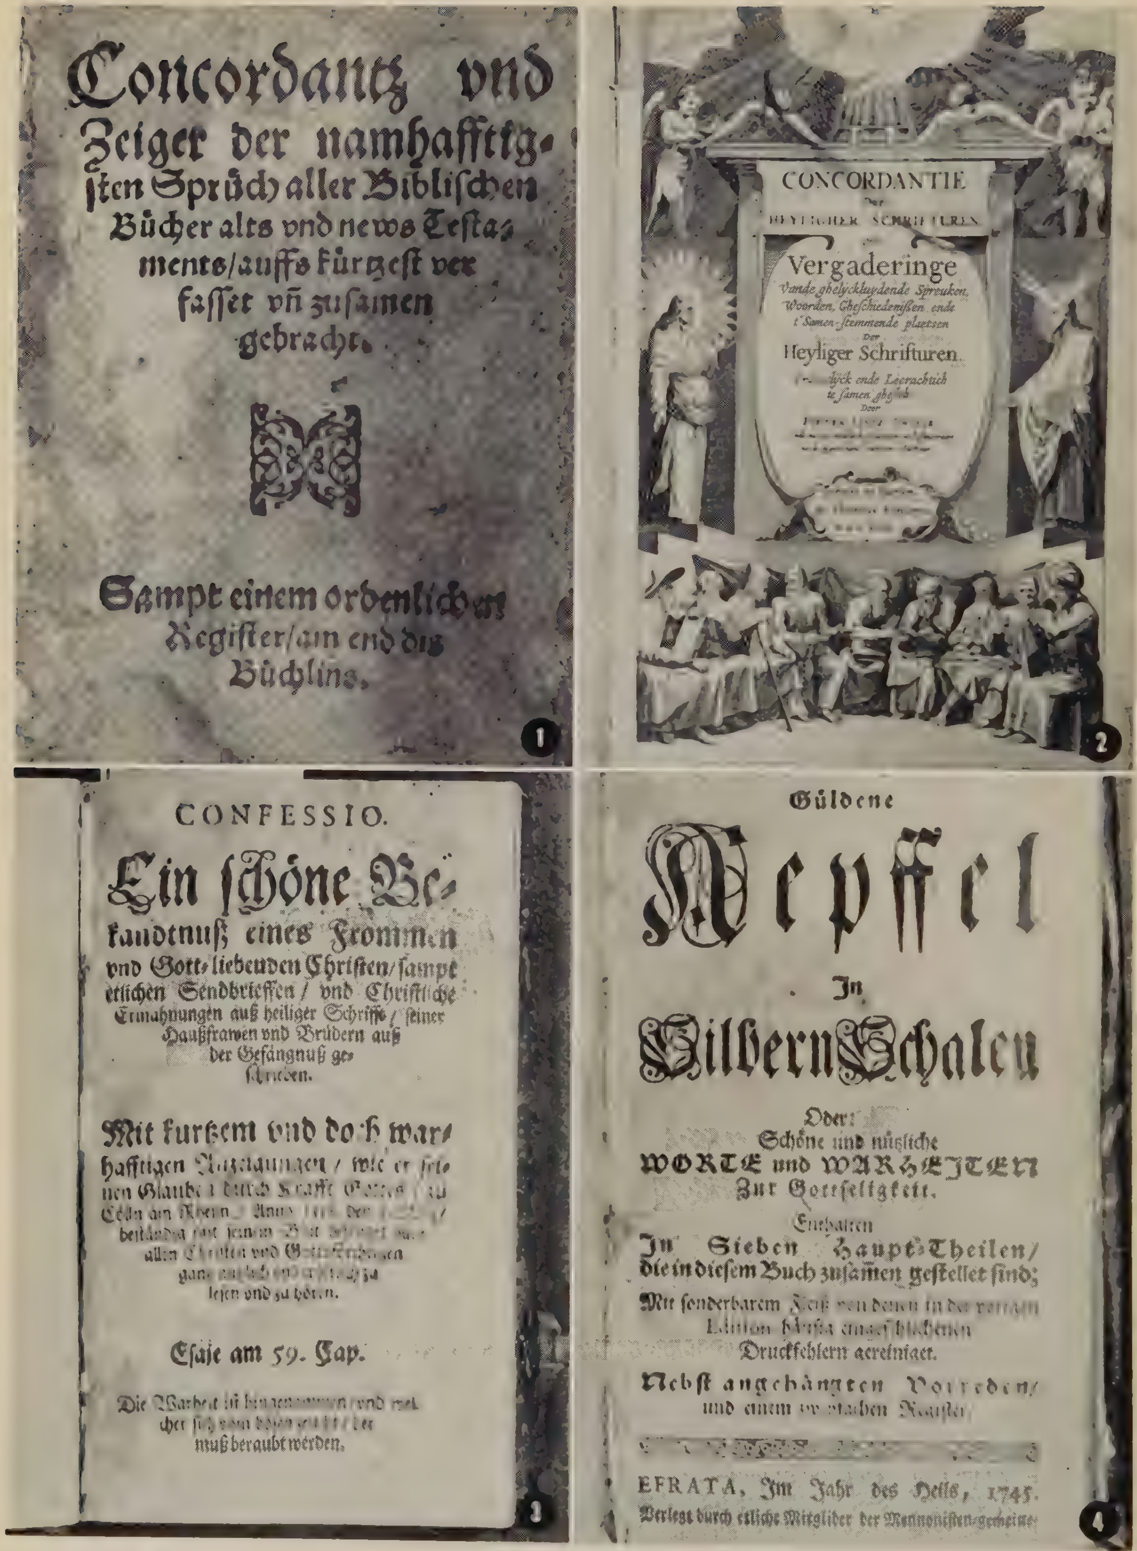
1. Peter M. Friesen (EM) (1849-1914), Halbstadt, Russia; 2. David H. Epp (Menn.) 1861-1934), Chortitza, Russia; 3. Heinrich Dirks (Menn.) 1842-1915), Gnadenfeld, Russia; 4. Bernhard Harder (Menn.) (1832-84), Moloschna, Russia; 5. Ulrich Hege (Verband) (1808-72), Reihen, Ger.; 6. Christian Hege (Verband) (1869-1943), Frankfurt, Ger.; 7. Jakob Hege (Verband) (1848-1911), Reihen, Ger.; 8. Michael Horsch (Verband) (1871-1949), Hellmannsberg, Ger.

XVI. Portraits

1. Heinrich Huebert (MB) (1810-95), Molotschna, Russia, first elder of the Mennonite Brethren Church in Russia; 2. David Gerhard Duerksen (MB) (1850-1910), Crimea, Russia; 3. Alexander Ediger (Menn.) (1893-?), Berdyansk, Russia; 4. Abraham Geiser (1857-1928), Chaux d'Abel, Sw.; 5. Isaak Dyck (Menn.) (1847-1929), Chortitza, Russia; 6. Abraham Goerz (Menn.) (1840-1911), Orloff, Russia; 7. Henry H. Ewert (GCM) (1855-1934), Gretna, Man.; 8. Nathaniel B. Grubb (GCM) (1850-1938), Philadelphia, Pa.; 9. David Goerz (GCM) (1849-1914), Newton, Kans.

XVII. Portraits

1. David E. Harder (KMB) (1872-1930), Hillsboro, Kan.; 2. John F. Harms (MB) (1855-1945), Hillsboro, Kan.; 3. John F. Funk (MC) (1835-1930), Elkhart, Ind.; 4. Solomon Eby (MBC) (1834-1931), Kitchener, Ont.; 5. Dietrich H. Epp (GCM) (1875-1955), Rosthern, Sask.; 6. Jonas S. Hartzler (MC) (1857-1953), Elkhart, Ind.; 7. Tilman M. Erb (MC) (1865-1929), Hesston, Kan.; 8. John Horsch (MC) (1867-1941), Scottdale, Pa.



Concordantz vnd
Zeiger der namhafftig-
ſten Sprüch aller Bibliſchen
Bücher alts vnd news Teſta-ments/auffs kürtzeſt verfaſſet vñ zuſamen
gebracht.

Sampt einem ordenlichen
Regiſter/am end dis
Büchlins.

CONCORDANTIE
Der
HEYLIGHER SCHRIFTUREN

Vergaderinge
Vande ghelyckluydende Spreuken,
Woorden, Gheſchiedeniſſen ende
t'Samen-ſtemmende plaetſen
Der
Heyliger Schrifturen.
[illegible]lyck ende Leerachtich te ſamen ghe[illegible]
Door
[illegible]

CONFESSIO.
Ein ſchöne Bekandtnuß eines Frommen
vnd Gott-liebenden Chriſten/ſampt
etlichen Sendbrieffen/ vnd Chriſtliche
Ermahnungen auß heiliger Schrifft/ ſeiner
Haußfrawen vnd Brüdern auß der Gefängnuß ge-ſchrieben.

Mit kurtzem vnd doch war-
hafftigen Anzeigungen / wie er ſei-nen Glauben durch Krafft Gottes zu
Cölln am Rhein [illegible] Anno [illegible] beſtändig [illegible]
allen Chriſten vnd [illegible]
gantz [illegible] zu
leſen vnd zu hören.

Eſaie am 59. Cap.

Die Warheit iſt hingenommen / vnd welcher ſich vom böſen [illegible] der muß beraubt werden.

Güldene
Aepffel
In Silbern Schalen
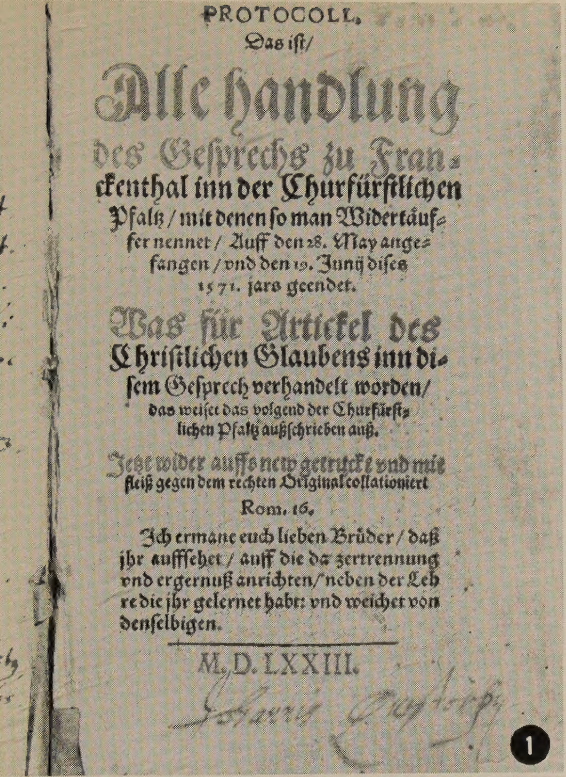
Oder:
Schöne und nützliche
WORTE und WARHEITEN
Zur Gottſeligkeit.
Enthalten
In Sieben Haupt-Theilen/
die in dieſem Buch zuſamen geſtellet ſind;
Mit ſonderbarem Fleiß von denen in der vorigen
Edition [illegible]
Druckfehlern gereiniget.
Nebſt angehängten Vorreden/
und einem [illegible] Regiſter.

EFRATA, Im Jahr des Heils, 1745.
Verlegt durch etliche Mitglider der Mennoniſten-gemeine.

XVIII. Book Title Pages

1. A German concordance (ca. 1550); 2. A Dutch concordance by Pieter Jansz Twisck (Haarlem, 1648); 3. A confession of faith of Thomas von Imbroich (Cologne, ca. 1558); 4. A devotional book used in America (Ephrata, 1745).



PROTOCOLL.
Das iſt/
Alle handlung
des Geſprechs zu Fran-ckenthal inn der Churfürſtlichen
Pfaltz / mit denen ſo man Widertäuf-fer nennet / Auff den 28. May ange-fangen / vnd den 19. Junij diſes
1571. jars geendet.
Was für Artickel des Chriſtlichen Glaubens inn di-ſem Geſprech verhandelt worden/das weiſet das volgend der Churfürſtlichen Pfaltz außſchrieben auß.
Jetzt wider auffs new getruckt vnd mit
fleiß gegen dem rechten Original collationiert
Rom. 16.
Jch ermane euch lieben Brüder / daß jhr auffſehet / auff die da zertrennung vnd ergernuß anrichten / neben der Leh re die jhr gelernet habt: vnd weichet von denſelbigen.
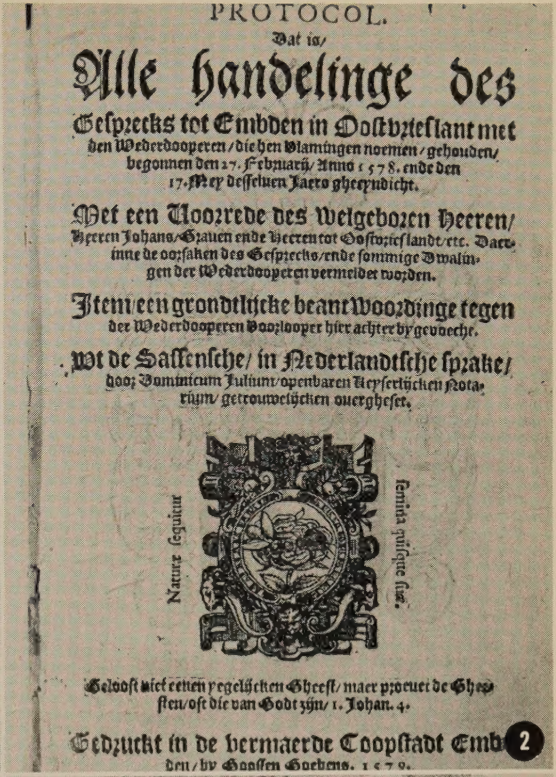
M.D.LXXIII.

①



PROTOCOL.
Dat is/
Alle handelinge des Geſpreeks tot Embden in Ooſtvrieſlant met den Wederdooperen / die hen Vlamingen noemen / gehouden/
begonnen den 27. Februarij/ Anno 1578. ende den
17. Mey deſſeluen Jaers gheeyndicht.
Met een Voorrede des Welgeboren Heeren/
Heeren Johans/ Grauen ende Heeren tot Ooſtvrieſlandt/ etc. Daerinne de oorſaken des Geſpreeks/ ende ſommige Dwalingen der Wederdooperen vermeldet worden.
Item/ een grondtlijcke beantwoordinge tegen
der Wederdooperen Voorlooper hier achter bygevoecht.
Vt de Saſſenſche/ in Nederlandtſche ſprake/door Dominicum Julium/ openbaren Keyſerlijcken Nota-rium/ getrouwelijcken ouergheſet.

Naturæ ſequitur ſemina quiſque ſuæ.

Geloooft niet eenen yegelijcken Gheeſt/ maer proeuet de Gheeſten/ oft die van Godt zijn/ 1. Johan. 4.
Gedruckt in de vermaerde Coopſtadt Embden/ by Gooſſen Goebens. 1578.

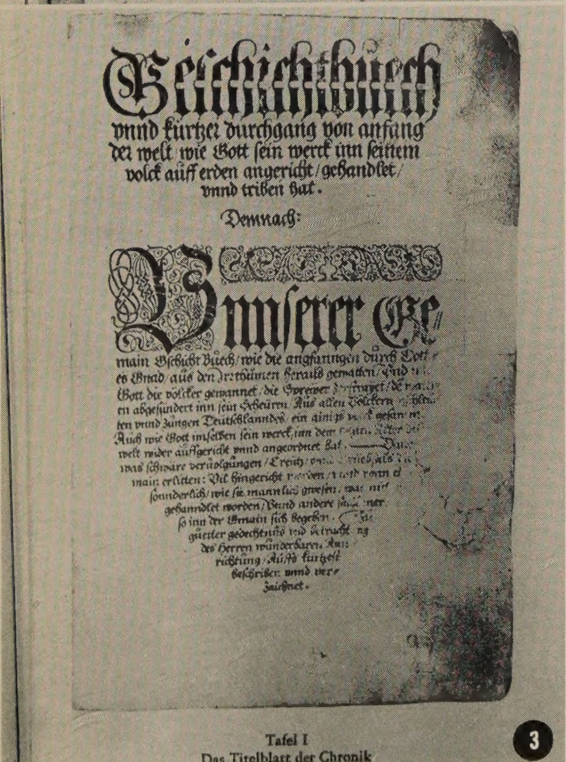
②



Geſchichtbüech
vnnd kürtzer durchgang von anfang der welt wie Gott ſein werck inn ſeinem volck auff erden angericht/ gehandlet/
vnnd triben hat.
Demnach:
Vnnserer Ge

Tafel I
Das Titelblatt der Chronik

③

Ein Spiegel
der Tauffe
mit Geiſt, mit
Waſſer, und mit
Blut.
Verfaſſet in neun Theil,
Aufs neue aufgeſetzt und ausgezogen aus dem
Heiligen Fundament-Buch/ des
Neuen und Alten Teſtaments, der Canoniſchen Bücher.
1 Epiſt. Joh. V. 8.
Drey ſind die da zeugen auf Erden, der Geiſt, und das
Waſſer, und das Blut; und die drey ſind beyſammen.
Gedruckt im Jahr. 1744.

④

XIX. Book Title Pages

1. Record of the disputation held at Frankenthal, Ger., in 1571; 2. Record of the disputation held at Emden, Ger., in 1579; 3. The Chronicle of the Hutterian Brethren; 4. Heinrich Funck's Mirror of Baptism (Germantown, 1744).

Index of Illustrations

Asterisk (*) indicates a portrait; italics, a book

Ausbund, 14
Bethania Mental Hospital (Staff), 13
Bethesda, Vineland, Mental Hospital, 13
Bloomington Hospital, 11
Bluffton Home for the Aged, 10
Book Title Pages, 20-21
Brook Lane Farm, Mental Hospital, 13
Chortitza "Thousand-Year Oak," 8
Concordantie by Pieter Jansz Twisck, 20
Concordantz, 20
Conestoga Pioneer Wagons, 6
Confessio by Thomas von Imbroich, 20
Corn Home for the Aged, 10
Deknatel, Jeme (Joannes)*, 16
Denner, Jakob*, 16
Dirk Philips(z)*, 16
Dirks, Heinrich*, 17
Dürksen, David Gerhard*, 18
Dyck, Isaak*, 18
Eby, Solomon*, 19
Ediger, Alexander*, 18
Embden, Protocoll, 21
Emmental, Switzerland, 5
Enkenbach, Palatinate, Home for the Aged, 9
Ephrata Cloister Press, 6
Epp, David H.*, 17
Epp, Dietrich H.*, 19
Erb, Tillman M.*, 19
Eureka Home for the Aged, 10
Ewert, Henry H.*, 18
Feenstra, Pieter, Jr.*, 16
Fernheim, Paraguay, Hospital, 12
Franckenthal, Protocoll, 21
Frederick Home for the Aged, 10
Friesen, Peter M.*, 17
Friesland, Paraguay, Hospital, 12
Funk, John F.*, 19
Galenus Abrahamsz*, 16
Geiser, Abraham*, 18
Geistreiches Gesangbuch, 15
General Hospitals, 11-12
Gerritsz, Lubbert*, 16
Geschichtbuch, 21
Goerz, Abraham*, 18
Goerz, David*, 18
Goessel Hospital, 11
Grubb, Nathaniel B.*, 18
Güldene Aepffel . . . , 20
Haarlem Home for the Aged, 9
Harder, Bernhard*, 17
Harder, David E.*, 19
Harms, John F.*, 19
Hartzler, Jonas S.*, 19
Hege, Christian*, 17
Hege, Jakob*, 17
Hege, Ulrich*, 17
Historic Places, 3-6
Historic Scenes, 7-8
Hoekstra Bz., S.*, 16
Homes for the Aged, 9-11
Horsch, John*, 19
Horsch, Michael*, 17
Hospitals, 11-13
Hubmaier, Balthasar*, 16
Huebert, Heinrich*, 18
Hymnbooks, 14-15
Imbroich, Thomas von, Confessio, 20
Immigrant House Interior, Kan., 7
Immigrant Ship, Man., 7
Käfigturm, Bern, 5
Kings View Homes, Mental Hospital, 13
Kleine geistliche Harfe, 15
Kleyn Hoorns-Liet-Boeck, 14
La Junta, Hospital, 11
Lamberti Church Tower, Münster, 3
Limmat River, Zürich, 4
MCC Relief Workers Conference, Basel, 8
Meadows Home for the Aged, 10
Menno Simons House and Linden Tree, 3
Menno Simons Monument, 3
Mennonitische Flüchtlingsfürsorge, 8
Mental Hospitals, 13
Muntau, Russia, Hospital, 12
Newton Home for the Aged, 10
Newton Hospital, 11
Passau Castle, 5
Philhaven Mental Hospital, 13
Portraits, 16-19
Prairie View Mental Hospital, 13
Prenzlau Refugee Camp, 8
Protocoll, Embden, 21
Protocoll, Franckenthal, 21
Rathaus, Zürich, 4
Reedley Home for the Aged, 11
Rittman Home for the Aged, 10
Russian Mennonite Refugees, Berlin, 8
Ryper Liedtboecxken, 14
Selection of Psalms, Hymns . . . , 15
Souderton Home for the Aged, 10
Spiegel der Tauffe, 21
Steen, Het, Prison, 5
Steinbach Hospital, 12
Swiss-Volhynian Pioneer Memorial Stone, 6
Thiensdorf, West Prussia, Home for the Aged, 9
Twisck, Pieter Jansz, Concordantie
Unpartheyisches Gesang-Buch, 15
Valdoie, France, Home for the Aged, 9
Veelderhande Schriftuurlyke Liedekens, 14
Wartburg Castle Tower, 3
Waterloo Co. Pioneer Memorial Tower, 6
Winnipeg Home for the Aged, 11
Winkler Hospital, 12
Winnipeg Hospital, 12
"Zur Eintracht," House, Zürich, 4

Explanation of Illustrations

The illustrations in the MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA appear as pictorial supplements at the end of each of the four volumes. They are grouped according to the topics they illustrate. For instance, pictures of Mennonite colleges are grouped under the heading "Colleges," and appear in Volume 1, since this volume includes the letter "C." In the case of portraits, however, pictures are presented only for those persons for whom articles appear within the volume. An alphabetical index indicates the location of the pictures by pages in the supplement. In the text of the volume itself, the symbol (†) at the end of the article indicates that an illustration for the article appears in the pictorial supplement of that volume. The choice of illustrations has been limited by availability.

The co-operation of the many individuals and institutions who have secured or contributed pictures is here gratefully acknowledged, even though individual recognition is not given. The larger number of illustrations have been drawn from two chief sources: the Bethel College Historical Library, North Newton, Kan. (Cornelius Krahn, director) and the Goshen College Mennonite Historical Library, Goshen, Ind. (Nelson Springer, curator). In addition the Archives of the Mennonite Church at Goshen College (Melvin Gingerich, custodian), the Library of the United Mennonite Church at Amsterdam, Netherlands (N. van der Zijpp, director), and the Library of the Mennonite Research Center at Göttingen, Germany (Ernst Crous, director), deserve recognition for their contributions. The following periodicals kindly granted us the use of pictures which they had published: Mennonite Life, North Newton, Kan., and Der Mennonit, Frankfurt a.M., Germany.

The principle of selection of pictures has varied according to the type of matter to be illustrated. Thus, only a few typical dwellings were chosen, in cases where the dwelling represents a distinct type. But in the case of meetinghouses and institutions, age, historic importance, style, and regional and denominational representation, have all played a part in the decision, along with the availability of good photographs. Under "Art" only works of genuine merit, and artists of established reputation, have been chosen. For title-pages chiefly first editions, where available, of titles of historic significance have been used.